Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Police Custody Cells (Dorset)

1. Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): How many police custody cells there are in police stations and courts in the Dorset area; and if he will make a statement. [59221]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): There are currently 58 police cells and detention rooms available in Dorset. The number of police cells is an operational matter for the chief constable and the police authority.Cells in the courts are under the ownership of Her Majesty's Courts Service and are not a police facility.

Mr. Ellwood: The number of arrests in Bournemouth on a Friday or Saturday night has increased, and by midnight Bournemouth police cells are full, which means that people arrested after that must be taken to other parts of Dorset. Will the Minister look into why the 16 serviceable cells that are part of the law courts are unavailable for the police to use?

Paul Goggins: May I begin by congratulating the police in Bournemouth on dealing so effectively with people who break the law, by arresting them in greater numbers? I understand that there are quite ambitious plans to improve the number and the quality of police cells in Bournemouth through a scheme that is being worked up. As I understand it, across the whole police force, 83 police cells will eventually be available. The police have to make an assessment about the facilities that they can afford and that are needed at any particular time, but with plans for more cells to be available and the kind of activity the hon. Gentleman outlined with regard to arresting offenders, his police force seems to be going in entirely the right direction.

Probation Service

2. Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress with the planned changes to the structure and role of the probation service. [59222]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): We are preparing legislation to restructure the probation service, which we will bring forward as soon as parliamentary time allows.

Mr. Gerrard: In the consultation on the proposals, four out of 749 responses were in favour of the restructuring proposed. Is it not a fact that most people were in favour of many of the other proposals in that consultation document to do with the need for partnership working, inter-agency working and so on? Would it not be better to concentrate on the aspects that have support than on the issue of contestability, which will end up with staff in the probation service not supporting what we are trying to do?

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Gentleman is right that many of the proposals had widespread support. In particular, the concept of end-to-end offender management is almost universally supported as one of the tools that we need in order more effectively to protect the public. We will shortly publish the full report on the responses and Members will then see how we are taking forward the issues that we have identified. However, I have to say to the hon. Member—[HON. MEMBERS: "Friend."] I thank hon. Members for the kind reminder. I have to say to my hon. Friend that we remain of the view that ensuring that the services delivered meet the identified needs, which is one of the key issues in contestability, will more effectively deliver probation services.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): The Minister knows that hardly a week goes by without another terrible crime being committed by someone released early from prison. Why does not the Minister provide the probation service and the National Offender Management Service with real political leadership and effective and strategic management? We do not need more legislation. We need the Minister to lead that increasingly demoralised service from the front. When will she get on with that?

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. and learned Gentleman is right to point out the shocking cases where we have failed to protect the public properly, and he is right to say that it is necessary for the ministerial team to lead the service from the front. That is why my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary commissioned Her Majesty's chief inspector of probation to produce a report following the tragic incident in which Messrs. Hanson and White were responsible for the murder of John Monckton. We have committed ourselves to implementing in full all the recommendations of Her Majesty's chief inspector, and we will make another report to the House about further action that we will take to improve public protection.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Is it not the case that the proposals that the Government are considering were taken wholesale out of the Carter report, and that without any consultation, debate or testing, they plan to implement them without reservation? Is that not a fragile base for major restructuring, and does it not sound the death knell of a publicly accountable probation service in its 100th year?

Fiona Mactaggart: I do not quite understand what my hon. Friend is claiming, because he will have heard his hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) speak earlier about our having received more than 700 responses to our consultation and the fact that we will shortly publish that. A claim that we are ramming through reforms willy-nilly without public consultation on them is frankly not well founded.

I suggest that my hon. Friend awaits publication of the results of the consultation, which will give a clearer direction on how we plan to implement the proposals, and also the forthcoming publication of the contestability prospectus, which will show how we intend to roll out change so that we can ensure that we get the best of being able to offer these services to public contest and not merely decide that we know all the answers before we put them into practice.

Police Restructuring

3. Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): What representations he has received on the proposed merger of the Essex police with neighbouring forces; and if he will make a statement. [59224]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): The Home Office received a business case from Essex police force and police authority in December, as well as a large number of other submissions, including, recently, a letter from a number of Members of Parliament, including the hon. Gentleman, to which I shall reply today. Since then, Home Office officials, together with experts, have been assessing the various options outlined in that business case to determine which are operationally and financially the most viable.

Those assessments are now complete, and based on them, I announced earlier today by way of written ministerial statement that I am minded to merge Essex with Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire to form a strategic force. I am meeting representatives today from those forces and authorities to consider taking forward the option for police that will in my opinion be of greatest benefit to their communities. I will invite the police authorities concerned to respond by 7 April and will then make a final decision on how to proceed in these areas. Clearly, we will continue to have discussions with all key stakeholders, including Members of this House.

Mr. Francois: There will be both anger and dismay in Essex at today's announcement, not least as it transpires that both Kent and Hampshire are being allowed to stand alone, but apparently not us. Can the Home Secretary confirm that the police authorities of Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire and Essex have offered him a voluntary merger on a Beds and Herts and Essex stand-alone basis? Why did he reject that voluntary offer, which was put to him directly by the police authorities themselves?

Mr. Clarke: As I said, I will discuss later today with representatives of the police authorities and the forces the options for the region. In particular, the reason why we decided on advice from Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary not to go along the line of the Beds-Herts voluntary merger, along the lines the hon. Gentleman suggests, is that its professional assessment is that such a force would not have the capacity to deal with the protective services level that is necessary to protect their people, and by extension, people of the wider region, including those in Essex.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): As the only Labour Back Bencher in Essex, may I say to the Home Secretary that I hope he will think again and acknowledge that there is still an opportunity for me and others to persuade him? The inspectorate would not have taken into account wider Government policy on the Thames Gateway. As a Back Bencher, I am sick and tired of trying to support the ODPM's policy for a Thames Gateway, only to see other Departments go in the opposite direction. I have had enough. I think it is time we had a coherent policy from this Government, so that they sing from the same song sheet as they expect me to do. I think it is time we had one Essex—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I think the hon. Gentleman was as well to quit when he was ahead.

Mr. Clarke: I shall certainly try to keep going, even if I am not ahead.

The fact is that we made it clear from the outset that our strong preference was to respect Government offices for the regions boundaries in the reorganisation that we did. I say to my hon. Friend that that was one consideration about looking at the Thames Gateway approach, as he advocated. I can give him the confirmation that he wants. We are now in the process of going down a line that could take up to four and bit months for people to make their representations about the proposals that we have. I have no doubt that representations will be made; he has just indicated that he will be among those making representations. Of course, I shall take those representations seriously before coming to the final decision and laying an order before the House.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Many people find it difficult to believe that the Home Secretary will take representations fully into account, because they regard his decision today as completely ignoring the numerous representations against the proposals that his Department has already received. Will the Home Secretary give me a categorical answer to this narrow question: if Essex were to have a properly run referendum on whether it should remain as a stand-alone authority or whether it should be merged, and there were an emphatic vote for a stand-alone police force, would the Home Secretary be prepared to accept the verdict of the people of Essex?

Mr. Clarke: I can give the hon. Gentleman a categorical answer, which is no. It is my duty to consider policing protection for the whole of the country—for Bedfordshire and for Hertfordshire as well as for Essex—and that is the basis on which I will examine all the proposals. That is the basis on which I considered the Essex situation, and it is the basis on which I consider all the situations. I assure the hon. Gentleman that whatever views are expressed, I shall take them seriously, but when I consider the policing of the country, I will not be bound by a proposal to hold a referendum in a particular force area that does not look at the wider needs of the whole community.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Will the Home Secretary explain the logic by which Kent on one side of the Thames should remain as a single force while Essex on the other side should be amalgamated with Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire, when there is no logical community of interest between, for example, Colchester and Leighton Buzzard? If the case for Essex is as good as that of Kent, why is Kent being left as a stand-alone force while Essex is not?

Mr. Clarke: I can explain the logic, which I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has not grasped. In the south-eastern region, in which Kent is located, there is one set of relationships between forces and their capacity to deal with protective security, and there is another set of relationships in the eastern region. The decision did not involve a comparison between Essex, Kent, Hampshire or any other force; it involved looking at the overall protective security requirement for policing in each Government office region, which is the appropriate and correct stance for us to take.

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): Just more than a year ago, a joint Home Office-strategy unit report warned that "Evidence from other sectors suggests that merger can be a costly, protracted exercise which does not always deliver expected benefits and inevitably causes distraction for management and staff".

Why has the Home Secretary ignored the warning in his own report?

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be surprised to hear that I regard the considered view on policing of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary as carrying greater weight than that of the Prime Minister's delivery unit, however expert it may be. [Interruption.] I am sorry, but that is my duty as Home Secretary. By the way, the Prime Minister's delivery unit would not claim to conduct a rigorous assessment of policing in the same way as Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. My job—as I have done it—is to ask Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary to make its assertions, which is what it has done and which is where we stand.

Neighbourhood Policing

4. Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the neighbourhood policing pilot schemes. [59225]

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): All 43 neighbourhood policing basic command unit pathfinders—there is one in every force—are making good progress in developing and implementing locally specific models for neighbourhood policing, and they are supported by an Association of Chief Police Officers-led neighbourhood policing programme team.

Mr. Wright: Next Thursday, I shall launch the neighbourhood policing pilot model in Hartlepool. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Thank you. As part of that pilot, we will get an additional 36 police officers, which will help to reassure the people of Hartlepool. In order to maximise such reassurance, however, the public need to be confident that they can get hold of those additional officers. What steps will my right hon. Friend take to ensure that the punters on my patch can get hold of local police teams?

Hazel Blears: My hon. Friend has a long, consistent and proud record of campaigning on crime, disorder and antisocial behaviour in his constituency. I know that he will be delighted that his area is one of the pathfinders for the programme and understand that 15 ward-based teams and three support teams will be in place by 3 April. All the details of the dedicated neighbourhood officers will be publicised in advance, so the public will know who those officers are, how to contact them and how to have their say on local priorities in Hartlepool.

Derek Conway (Old Bexley and Sidcup) (Con): The Minister will understand why those of us with a suspicious mind think that this roll-out may have something to do with the elections on 4 May. The trial schemes that we have had in Bexley from the Metropolitan police are very welcome, but we need the assurance that these are not notional jobs and that real policemen are to be allocated to these schemes, which are then left in place. In practice, we have seen that they are sometimes taken away and so become somewhat fictitious.

Hazel Blears: I had the pleasure of visiting Bexley just a week or so ago. I assure the hon. Gentleman that that is no coincidence in terms of the local elections. In the past few weeks I have also been to Barnet and to Hackney to see the safer neighbourhood teams. There are now 285 safer neighbourhood teams across London, and there will be teams in every ward by the end of April. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that they comprise real, substantial police officers and that they form part of the extra 14,000 police officers whom the Government have introduced, together with the extra 6,000 community support officers whom we have introduced and funded.

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): I very much welcome the fact that in my constituency a neighbourhood policing pilot area is due to start shortly, and I welcome the extra police officers and police community support officers whom we will get as part of that. Is the Minister aware, however, that people from ethnic minority communities who have worked for the local council as neighbourhood wardens are proving reluctant to move over to become police authority employees as PCSOs, and does she have any plans to address that issue?

Hazel Blears: I am delighted that so many Members are now experiencing the benefits of neighbourhood policing. The particular issue that my hon. Friend mentions has not been raised with me, but I will certainly look into it. I am delighted not only that many of our PCSOs are members of a variety of ethnic minority communities, but that a much higher proportion of them are women than is the case among police officers. PCSOs therefore represent a good way in which to get extra diversity into our police service.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The Metropolitan police has announced that in order to complete its safer neighbourhood team project and have a community police team in every ward this year, it will be necessary to transfer a significant number of officers from serious crime squads in the capital. These are both important priorities. Does not the Minister agree that instead of robbing Peter to pay Paul, it would be better to cut bureaucracy and paperwork?

Hazel Blears: I think that the hon. Lady will acknowledge that the safer neighbourhood teams comprise additional officers and additional police community support officers and that they are extra resources for the people of London to ensure that they have very good, dedicated local neighbourhood policing. Clearly, serious crime must also be dealt with, and I have no doubt that the Metropolitan police is doing just that. In terms of tackling bureaucracy, the hon. Lady will know that we have not only abolished a whole series of forms but introduced video identification, which is saving police officers thousands of hours of officer time. The introduction of fixed penalty notices has also saved a huge amount of officer time and led to much more effective policing.

Kurdish Asylum Seekers

5. Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): What UK immigration policy is on returning failed Kurdish asylum seekers to Turkey. [59226]

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): The UK immigration policy on returning asylum seekers to Turkey is the same as elsewhere. All failed asylum seekers from Turkey who have exhausted their appeal rights are expected to leave the UK. If they do not, we consider it entirely reasonable for us to enforce the return of that individual where it is safe to do so.

Mrs. James: I thank my hon. Friend. I have given him advance notice of my question about the case of Mrs. Ayse Siringul. Mrs. Siringul is a Kurdish asylum seeker from Turkey who has suffered severe abuse in that country and very poor treatment here in Britain. She is making a valuable contribution to her local community in Swansea, East, and I would be extremely concerned about her and her children's welfare should they have to return to Turkey. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would look again at this case.

Mr. McNulty: I thank my hon. Friend for giving me notice of the case. She will know that I am unable to discuss the specific case of an individual at the Dispatch Box. However, I am aware of the background and I will write to my hon. Friend in due course about the points that she raises.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): In view of the Government's intention to reintroduce the obligatory use of vouchers for failed asylum seekers, can the Minister clarify what has happened since April 2002, when the use of those vouchers was scrapped by the then Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), who described them as "too slow, vulnerable to fraud, and felt to be unfair by asylum seekers and local communities"?—[Official Report, 29 October 2001; Vol. 373, c. 627.]

Mr. McNulty: As ever, the hon. Gentleman, who speaks for the Liberal Democrats, is wrong. He should read things other than The Guardian and get a life. We are not reintroducing vouchers. From April 2005, when section 4—a prelude to removal from the country—support was introduced, it came with vouchers. The amendment that the House of Lords passed and that we will discuss when we consider the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill would provide for far more flexibility than simply granting vouchers for food and accommodation. It would expand provision to support in kind and for goods and services, which is more than sufficient for the extremely limited group of failed asylum seekers who are on section 4 support. The hon. Gentleman should not talk about the reintroduction of things when he clearly does not know what was introduced in the first place.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I urge my hon. Friend to be careful about returning asylum seekers to the Kurdish part of Turkey, given that the Turkish Government have a long way to go on human rights, especially for Kurds, and because of the concerns that Amnesty International, among others, has raised about article 301 of the penal code and the restrictions that that places on peaceable democratic dissent in Turkey, especially from the Kurdish community. Will he assure me that he will reconsider the position of the Kurdish community in Turkey given the human rights situation?

Mr. McNulty: I thank my hon. Friend for returning us to the question—that was kind of him. On a country-by-country basis, we always keep our information about minorities under review. In the context of the 1951 convention, the individual circumstances and history of each case are paramount in determining not only the asylum claim but whether, if the claim fails, it is appropriate to return individuals to their country of origin.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Does the Minister accept that there is some inconsistency in our considering asylum cases and sometimes granting asylum to Kurdish and other Turkish citizens while supporting Turkish accession to the European Union? How, in principle, could a common arrest warrant apply if Turkey was a member of the EU?

Mr. McNulty: Unusually, the hon. Gentleman confuses six different aspects of Government policy. I hope that he takes a generous view of all six.

Voluntary/Community Organisations

7. Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): What steps he is taking to support the work of voluntary and community organisations. [59228]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): Government support for the voluntary and community sector is at record levels. We will continue to work closely with the sector in promoting a wide range of activity, including volunteering, civil renewal and public service delivery.

Jim Sheridan: I am sure that my hon. Friend acknowledges the good work of all our voluntary organisations in our communities. Perhaps one way to encourage them is through accommodating volunteers in the honours system. Will he consider early-day motion 1324, in my name, which unfortunately has little support from the Opposition parties? It encourages the recognition of volunteers in organisations and communities by the honours system.

Paul Goggins: As an assiduous reader of early-day motions, I have had the opportunity of reading early-day motion 1324. I appreciate that it reflects a strong view that people in, for example, sport, have already had their reward financially and through fame, and that the genuine heroes are the army of volunteers who work in my hon. Friend's community and those of all hon. Members. The answer is that both categories deserve recognition. I am delighted that, nowadays, half those who receive public honours do so on the recommendation of ordinary members of the public. That is welcome. However, people who volunteer do not do that for the reward but for the difference that they make.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I agree with the Under-Secretary's last comment. The Public Accounts Committee report criticised the yearly bidding round for grants as wasting the time of staff in both the Department and voluntary organisations in putting together applications. The bidding round was also criticised on the ground that the annual uncertainty led to voluntary organisations losing staff. The report concluded:

> "The Home Office has a lead role in promoting good practice in engaging with the voluntary sector and yet some 72 per cent. of its own funding contracts are for less than one year."

Why?

Paul Goggins: The Public Accounts Committee is right to say that the Home Office has a lead role in supporting and encouraging the voluntary and community sector. I also agree with its recommendation that we all need to think more long-term about the grants that we give to support voluntary organisations. Sometimes, grants are given for specific time-limited projects, but it is still important that we should think long-term. That is why we are introducing the compact, and the compact commissioner, who will oversee the relationship between public funders and voluntary organisations. That will provide the long-term sustainability that the hon. Gentleman seeks.

Identity Cards

8. John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): What discussions he has had with the First Minister of Scotland on the introduction of identity cards. [59229]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary meets his colleague the First Minister regularly to discuss a range of issues, including identity cards. It has always been for the Scottish Executive and Parliament to decide whether ID cards should be used for accessing devolved public services, and the First Minister and my right hon. Friend are entirely in agreement on that.

John Barrett: The Minister will be aware that the devolved Executive have stated clearly that they do not wish to use identity cards for access to devolved services. Will further meetings be arranged to find out the true feeling of the Scottish Executive and of the Scottish people, who would prefer to spend their money not on this expensive scheme but on additional police and security services? Will the Government accept the will of the public and of the majority of Members in this House, who believe that the ID card scheme is fatally flawed?

Andy Burnham: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Home Office is always assiduous in its research. In answering his question, I can go the extra mile and be even more authoritative, because I visited the Gyle shopping centre in his constituency on 14 September with the biometrics roadshow. If he will permit me, I will read the first three entries in the public comments book from that day.

"Good demonstration, and it worked."

"Great idea. Wonderful demonstration."

"It is good to see new technology being utilised for something that is so useful to our society."

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman speaks for his constituents with authority, but I, too, have consulted them, and there is strong support among them for our proposals.

Violent Crime

9. Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): What assessment he has made of the trends in the level of violent crime recorded by the police over the last five years for which figures are available. [59230]

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): Total violent crime recorded by police in England and Wales rose from 703,000 in 1999–2000 to 1,185,000 in 2004–05. However, the introduction in April 2002 of the national crime recording standards and of more proactive policing practices has had the effect of increasing recorded violent crime. The British crime survey, which gives a better indication of trends over time because it has measured crime in a consistent way, shows a fall in violent crime of 30 per cent. between 1999 and 2004–05.

Mr. Jackson: Two months ago, the Prime Minister said:

"Crime figures are the measure of whether this Government is succeeding or failing".

Violent crime has risen by 96 per cent. since 1998, and there are now more than 1 million violent crimes committed each year. When will the Government tackle this problem effectively instead of relying on short-term political gimmicks and wasting millions of pounds of taxpayers' money on unwanted police mergers?

Hazel Blears: I thought that I had made it clear that the British crime survey found that violent crime had come down by 30 per cent. The British crime survey has been going for 25 years, so it is not a short-term gimmick. Operation Eagle ran in the hon. Gentleman's own constituency recently as part of the alcohol enforcement campaign. This involved a dedicated team of officers focusing on violent crime and drunk and disorderly behaviour in order to make Peterborough a safer place for people to live in by tackling those problems. Does he regard that as a short-term gimmick, or does he welcome the fact that dedicated, focused policing is reducing violent crime in this constituency?

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the increase in reported crime in Luton is actually a success story in regard to domestic violence—if there can be such a thing? Following the introduction of the domestic violence courts and the doubling of the number of police in the domestic violence units, victims are now confident to report violent crime and to see its perpetrators being caught. But is she aware of the growing concern, as evidenced in my casework, about victims of violence associated with forced marriage? Will she ensure that the police are trained to deal with that form of violent crime, as well as increase the training to combat domestic violence?

Hazel Blears: My hon. Friend has a proud record of campaigning on domestic violence and crimes against women in particular. I confirm that we take those issues extremely seriously and are currently involved in a campaign to highlight issues around forced marriages. It is fair to say that some police forces have more extensive experience of those issues than others, and I encourage them to share that good practice to make sure that the police are able to respond rigorously.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): The Minister will be aware that four of the gang responsible for the murder of my constituent, Mary-Ann Leneghan, a 16-year-old, were under probation supervision at the time of the killing. In those circumstances, will the Home Secretary promise a full independent inquiry into what went wrong with the system and the supervision of those murderous young men?

Hazel Blears: Clearly, this is a matter of the utmost concern, not just to the families involved but to all of us. It is very important that we have a system that provides proper protection to the public. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will address that issue, together with others, in a statement to be made in the near future. It is important that we understand how to tackle them and make sure that people are protected. The hon. Gentleman has properly raised serious concerns, and the Department wants to make sure that it responds.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): When the Home Secretary initiated his Statistics Commission review of crime I had hoped that we would see an end to the Government burying their head in the sand about the increase in violent crime. The simple truth is that it is not a statistical artefact; our constituents witness it day in, day out in their towns and cities, and it is not a mirage. The doubling of gun crime is not a mirage. The increase in knife crime is not a mirage. The 35 per cent. increase in murder is not a mirage. When will the Minister recognise that violent crime is on the increase? Most importantly, will she tell the House what she thinks is the cause of that increase?

Hazel Blears: The right hon. Gentleman paints a picture that is simply not true in many respects. In relation to gun crime, he will know that the number of fatalities has decreased. He will also know that the Violent Crime Reduction Bill contains strong measures to tackle gun-related crime, including a ban on imitations, the use of which has increased. I hope that his party will support us in those measures. He will also be aware that we are introducing a nationwide knife amnesty, and, again, the Violent Crime Reduction Bill contains further powers to tackle knife crimes. In relation to the recent alcohol enforcement campaign, he will know that violence decreased by 11 per cent. in the areas taking part, due to good, early intervention, proactive policing and good tactics to tackle violent crime. The right hon. Gentleman does a disservice by painting a picture that is not a true reflection of the facts. We are constantly struggling to make sure that we tackle violent crime and make our streets safer.

David Davis: I have listened to the Minister give an incredibly selective set of statistics. Let me give her a single figure: the 35 per cent. increase in murder, leaving out the Dr. Shipman murders, since the Government have been in power. What she said does not answer that. The Government got elected on the phrase, "Tough on the causes of crime". Two of the primary causes of violent crime in this country are drugs and alcohol, but this Government's policy on drugs and alcohol is out of control, which is why violent crime is spiralling out of control. What are they going to do about it?

Hazel Blears: Everyone in the House, and across society, will be concerned about homicides and murders, which are crimes of the utmost seriousness. As I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would agree, we have one of the lowest murder rates compared with many other countries. We also have some of the toughest gun laws across the world. That is internationally acknowledged. I am also afraid to say that both he and his party predicted that we would see mayhem on our streets and an explosion of violent crime as a result of the liberalisation of the licensing laws, but the reverse has been the case. There has been an 11 per cent. reduction in violent crime, because thousands of young people are not spilling out on to the streets at the same time. We have well-managed town centres with good, effective policing, and I would like him to acknowledge that.

Hooliganism (World Cup)

10. Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): What assessment he has made of preparations to prevent football hooliganism by British fans at this summer's World cup. [59231]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I recently received a detailed assessment of the comprehensive multi-agency preparations that will be in place for the World cup. They will include an extensive policing operation at home and abroad, including the deployment of police officers and prosecutors in Germany. Co-operation with the host authorities is excellent, and I recently signed an agreement with Herr Schäuble, the German Interior Minister, regarding UK-German governmental, police and judicial co-operation.

A great deal has been achieved in recent years. Levels of English football disorder have fallen dramatically, and I am satisfied that everything possible is being done to prevent disorder in Germany.

Mr. Hands: The Home Secretary says he is confident that everything possible is being done, but I fear that the Government are sleepwalking into disaster this summer. Does the Home Secretary agree that one of the most important steps that could be taken would be for the Germans to suspend the Schengen agreement temporarily, as happened during Euro 2004 in Portugal, so that fans going in and out of Germany—whether law-abiding or otherwise—could be subject to proper border controls?

Mr. Clarke: That is a matter for the German Government. The Schengen agreement allows particular security provisions to be applied at national borders within the Schengen area, but, as I have said, that is a matter for German Ministers and not for me.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): The question refers to "hooliganism by British fans", but surely the reference should be to hooliganism by English fans, as everyone knows that Scottish fans are a perfect joy. [Interruption.] Let me tell those who are remarking that Scotland has not qualified that qualification for the World cup is now a devolved responsibility.

Has the Minister been watching the Commonwealth games, at which the anthems of Scotland, England and Wales have been played? Has he noticed that none of those countries use "God Save the Queen"? That is because they distinguish between nationalities. Would it not be appropriate for England to have its own anthem?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to point out that I referred to English fans in my answer, although the question referred to British fans, because I was particularly sensitive to the point that he has made. I am well aware of the famous sporting achievements of Scottish sportspeople, for example in curling, and I hope that they will take place more widely.

Police Restructuring

11. Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with Welsh police authorities on proposals for restructuring police forces in Wales. [59233]

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): The Home Secretary has met the chief constables and chairs of all four police forces and authorities in the Welsh region. The purpose of those discussions has been to proceed with the option that will be the most effective in protecting the people of Wales, namely a single strategic force for Wales. We will continue to have discussions with all key stakeholders in Wales.

Mr. Jones: As the Home Secretary has announced twice that he intends to proceed with the all-Wales option despite the opposition of the Welsh police authorities, what is the purpose of the consultation? Could anything possibly be said by the Welsh authorities that might change the Home Secretary's mind, or is this simply an exercise in window-dressing?

Mr. McNulty: Not unusually, the hon. Gentleman's opening premise is entirely wrong. The Home Secretary's initial written ministerial statement triggered a four-month consultation, which is currently taking place. When it has ended, my right hon. Friend will present his view to the House.

The consultation is serious, and all stakeholders—including the hon. Gentleman, perhaps on the right premise rather than otherwise—should take part in it.

12. Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): What recent representations he has received on his proposals to amalgamate police forces. [59234]

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): Unsurprisingly, the Home Secretary has received a substantial volume of letters and views from police forces and individual officers and staff, from police authorities and their members, from local government associations and members, and from members of the public. We continue to have discussions with all the key stakeholders.

Mr. Hoban: I am grateful to the Home Secretary for listening to representations from Hampshire and I am glad that Hampshire will remain a stand-alone force, but will the Minister assure us that where mergers are forced through, there will be enough support for them to ensure that resources are still spent on front-line policing and not diverted to meeting the considerable set-up costs of the merged forces?

Hazel Blears: Even where forces stand alone, it will be absolutely vital for them to carry out a thorough assessment of their services to ensure not only that they can provide really good local neighbourhood policing, but that they can enhance their protective services capability, so that they can be certain that they can cope with increased threats from serious and organised crime, and can counter terrorism and ensure public order. We are absolutely determined that every strategic force in the country will be able do both those parts of policing extremely well and to the best of their ability. That is what the public expect.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend assure us that these amalgamations and mergers will lead to better police response times, particularly in Coventry and the rest of Warwickshire?

Hazel Blears: The police authority amalgamations are designed to ensure not only that we can cope with the threat from serious crime, but that local neighbourhood response is improved. We want to ensure that local neighbourhood police officers are not drawn away from the front line to deal with serious incidents. My hon. Friend may be aware that we are introducing national call-handling standards from November this year. That will be the first time that members of the public have had such standards, and they can expect the police to respond in timely manner to their concerns.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Does the Home Secretary believe that he is infallible and, if not, why does he not listen to local people?

Hazel Blears: The Home Secretary is absolutely determined—[Interruption.] I was not going to say that he is absolutely infallible; I doubt whether there is such an expression. He is a man of great wisdom and he will be assiduous in ensuring that he takes into account all the representations made to him. As the hon. Gentleman of course knows, when proposals are made they are subject to a four-month consultation period during which people can make representations. All such representations will be properly considered before final decisions are taken and orders are laid before this House.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Staffordshire is an early candidate for a merger with the west midlands regional force—probably the second biggest in England—just as we are developing a county-wide community policing system. That system is very welcome, especially in rural areas, as I saw last Friday when I walked the beat with PC Ellie Sewell in Wheaton Aston. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that those large regional forces will not draw police officers away from very important community work in rural areas?

Hazel Blears: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance, which is not merely warm words. We are putting £88 million into neighbourhood policing this year and £350 million next year, to make sure that we recruit the 24,000 community support officers who will form an integral and essential part of the neighbourhood policing teams. The amalgamation of forces will enable us to respond to serious crime and to ensure that the neighbourhood policing teams are not drawn away from the front line, which is exactly where the public in my hon. Friend's constituency want them to be.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): In his statement today, the Home Secretary is proposing amalgamating the Norfolk constabulary with Cambridgeshire and Suffolk. That gives rise to a raft of questions, not least whether the new force is to be known as the North Anglia constabulary. When will the Home Secretary produce some firm proposals on, for example, political responsibility? When will we know the size of the police authorities and whether the figures will change? When will we know about resources and who is to be the chief constable? As yet, we have no information on those fundamental questions.

Hazel Blears: Those are perfectly proper questions and we will discuss those important issues, about which the public are also concerned, with the chairmen and the chief constables in the forthcoming period. I am pleased to say that Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire have a history of collaboration, and I am sure that the amalgamation will work well. As we have pointed out, we want to ensure that every top-tier local authority has a place on the new strategic police authorities, and that there is a strong connection between the authorities' democratic element and their local communities. All those issues will be discussed and scrutinised properly as we take this matter forward.

Sudanese Asylum Seekers

13. Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): What steps he has taken to support those who have fled from atrocities in Darfur to the UK. [59235]

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): All applications for asylum, including those from Sudanese nationals from Darfur, are considered case by case. We will grant asylum or other forms of protection to those who are found to need it. As with all nationalities, Sudanese Darfuris applying for asylum in the UK are supported by the National Asylum Support Service for the duration of their asylum claim, where they meet the requirements for such support.

Lynda Waltho: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer, although I wonder whether the support may be too limited. Has he considered working with the Department of Health to provide or create a specialist health centre that could assist with assessing the physical and mental needs of survivors from Darfur and any future survivors of war crimes and crimes against humanity?

Mr. McNulty: I take my hon. Friend's point extremely seriously, but we feel that, as and where such support is necessary, it is provided around the country via the national health service, rather than there being one central location.

Early Release (Risk Assessment)

14. Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): If he will make a statement on the risk assessment of offenders who are being considered for early release from custody. [59237]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): For prisoners who are eligible for release on parole or life licence, the Parole Board is required to conduct a thorough assessment of risk, considering reports prepared by the probation service and the Prison Service and other experts such as psychologists and psychiatrists. Its overriding duty is to protect the public.

Prisoners who have been convicted of the most serious sexual or violent offences are deemed unsuitable for early release on the home detention curfew scheme. Those who are eligible are subject to a careful risk assessment, undertaken by the prison governor.

Mr. Mackay: I am sure that the Minister will agree that there have been too many horrendous cases recently involving people who have been released early from prison, which has caused the public to lose confidence. What are the Government going to do about that?

Fiona Mactaggart: The right hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that those cases have caused real concern—rightly so. That highlights the importance of our delivering effectively on our duty to protect the public. We are using three key tools to improve the situation. First, there are the new sentences under the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which includes extended public protection sentences and indefinite sentences for public protection. Some 728 of the first type of sentence have already been passed since April 2005, and 679 of the other type. Secondly, there are improvements in our risk assessment system—the offender assessment system, or OASys, tool—and, thirdly, there is better management of risk by probation officers in the community.

Security Guard Companies

16. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the Security Industry Authority approved contractors scheme for security guard companies. [59239]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I announced the details of the Security Industry Authority approved contractor scheme on 16 February. The ACS should become a symbol of quality that will indicate to prospective clients and their insurers that an ACS firm conforms to industry standards.

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his response. In authorising that approved contractor scheme, he also gave authorisation for other existing schemes to be able to passport through authorisation for companies to operate in this field, but it appears that the Security Industry Authority has precluded any other approval company from operating in the sector because of its insistence that every other scheme complies with every aspect of its own scheme. Will he consider that matter again with a view to allowing the other schemes entry into the area, as he first envisaged?

Paul Goggins: My hon. Friend is something of an authority in this subject and I would be happy to consider his point more carefully, but he is aware that, after considerable consultation, we put in place the approved contractor scheme, which can be reached in two different ways: either by using the Security Industry Authority handbook or through other existing standards. The important thing is to make sure that we have a high level of quality in the security industry as a whole. As a result, those who are on the ACS are able to deploy a small number of their staff, pending the issuing of their licence. However, I am happy to consider his suggestions and have some further discussion with him.

Custodial Suicides

17. Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): What assessment he has made of the trend in the number of suicides of those held in custody over the last five years. [59240]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): Suicide rates in prisons are falling at present and the reduction in the number of self-inflicted deaths is demonstrated by a reduction in the three-year rolling average. The number of self-inflicted deaths this year is lower now than in 2000–01 and we expect the total number of deaths this year to have fallen for the third consecutive year.

Mr. Lancaster: Why do local male prisons house just 35 per cent. of the prison population, yet account for 60 per cent. of suicides?

Fiona Mactaggart: That is partly because of the throughput. We know that the greatest moment of risk for the self-inflicted death of a prisoner is in the early days—the first few days—in prison. That is one of the reasons why we have put so many resources into improving a prisoner's initial reception into a prison.

Local prisons of the kind to which the hon. Gentleman refers have the most receptions and are thus the prisons in which the highest number of people spend their first few days after admission. Those are the places where we really need—we have been putting a lot of effort into this—to step up our protection methods so that we reduce the distress that people feel following their receipt into prison and thus reduce the risk of them killing themselves.

Licensing Laws

18. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the impact of the new licensing laws on drink-related crime and disorder. [59241]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): The Home Office is currently evaluating the impact of the new Licensing Act on levels of alcohol-related crime and disorder in England. The final results will be available by the end of 2007.

Hugh Bayley: I congratulate the Government on introducing changes to the licensing regime, which have resulted in a significant decrease in drink-related crime and disorder in my constituency of City of York. Only a small number of people go out for a drink and then cause trouble, but will my hon. Friend consider widening the range of offences that can lead to a penalty of being banned from licensed premises?

Paul Goggins: I am happy to consider my hon. Friend's suggestion. The police and other agencies in his area should be warmly congratulated on the successful work that they did during the alcohol misuse enforcement campaign. I am sure that he will be delighted that during the six weeks of the campaign, alcohol-related violent disorder reduced by 20 per cent. in his constituency.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What assessment has the Minister made of the extent to which the powers in the 2003 Act to close premises that are linked to violent behaviour have been used since the law came into force?

Paul Goggins: We are still looking carefully at the emerging evidence. I assure the hon. Gentleman that those powers will be used by the police and licensing authorities when particular establishments are seen to be a focus of alcohol-related disorder. We will not tolerate that, and the powers are there so that the police and local authorities can act.

Police Restructuring

19. Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress with his plans for police force restructuring in the north-east. [59242]

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): The Home Secretary's ministerial statement of 3 March provided a further update on the position on restructuring, including his decision with respect to the north-east region. That instigates a four-month statutory consultation period and allows forces, authorities, and local authorities to comment on the Home Secretary's proposals. We will provide further support, through existing links with Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary and the Home Office, for all forces in the region in any preparations that they may wish to make in respect of implementation planning.

Dr. Kumar: I thank the Minister for that reply. When the final option has been considered by the Home Secretary—I think we all know that the option will be the one that he has outlined so far—will he be willing to put it to a referendum of the people of the north-east? After all, we had referendums on the mayor and the north-east assembly, so why should we not have one on such an important matter as police restructuring?

Hazel Blears: I understand the strength of feeling that my hon. Friend expresses on behalf of his community, but it is right and proper that we take into account the professional and expert advice that we have from HMIC on getting the right level of protective services for people in the whole of the region. It is important that we examine policing across England and Wales to ensure that we can respond to the serious threats that face us and establish neighbourhood policing—I am sure that he welcomes that in his constituency—that does not get abstracted to deal with serious incidents. I am afraid that I cannot promise my hon. Friend that he will get the referendum that he wants.

20. Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): What assessment he has made of the likely impact of his proposed police force amalgamations upon neighbourhood policing. [59243]

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): Since the beginning of the consultation process in September 2005, the Home Secretary has made it consistently clear that the main focus of restructuring the 43 police forces in England and Wales is to enable forces to provide the full range of protective services at level 2. This must be done while maintaining and enhancing neighbourhood policing at a local level in all police forces. The basic command unit will remain as the primary tool in ensuring that the Government pledge that neighbourhood policing is extended to all communities by 2008 is achieved.

Mr. Gale: The lead spokesman on neighbourhood policing of the Association of Chief Police Officers has expressed the view publicly that the introduction of the mergers of police forces is likely to distract attention and resources from neighbourhood policing and is likely to weaken the cause of the one element of the Government's policy that might just do something about antisocial behaviour. Given that the Home Secretary has indicated that he prefers to listen to the police rather than the Prime Minister's delivery unit, why is he not listening to the police about that?

Hazel Blears: We work extremely closely with Matt Baggott, the chief constable of Leicestershire, who is leading the neighbourhood policing programme team. He is doing an excellent job and he welcomes the additional resources that this Government have put into neighbourhood policing—£88 million this year, £350 million next year and an extra 14,000 police officers over and above the number that the Conservatives were able to put into policing. I have no doubt that the amalgamations will enable us not only to tackle the serious nature of organised crime, but to enhance our neighbourhood policing teams, which are being established across the country. The hon. Gentleman will have heard from colleagues on both sides of the House how much they welcome that, and I am determined to keep our focus where the public want it to be.

Party Political Funding

3.31 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): With permission, I wish to make a statement on amendments to the Electoral Administration Bill. The Government intend to amend the Electoral Administration Bill, currently before the House of Lords, to make it compulsory for political parties to disclose any loans they receive. That is an issue that affects all political parties—[Laughter.] I hope that the Government, all the political parties of this House and the Electoral Commission will be able to work constructively together to find a solution that allows for transparency and fairness.

My intention is to achieve as great a transparency for loans made to political parties as applies to donations under the regime in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs has today written to the leaders of all political parties represented at Westminster, and to the Electoral Commission, seeking their views on the elements of a reporting regime, including whether it should be retrospective. I have placed a copy of his letter in the Library of the House.

The Prime Minister has announced that Sir Hayden Phillips will conduct a review of the funding of the political parties. The terms of reference of the review were announced earlier today, and I have placed a copy in the Library.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I thank the Minister for her usual courtesy in giving me early sight of her short statement. I welcome the inquiry into the funding of political parties under Sir Hayden Phillips and the terms of reference to which she referred, a copy of which is in the Library. An inquiry was inevitable, given the revelations of the past few days, and we are happy to give our full co-operation to Sir Hayden. However, why is he undertaking the review and not the Electoral Commission? It seems inexplicable. The Government set up the commission to oversee such matters. The Minister knows that the commission has produced a report already on the funding of political parties and it has a credibility on the issue that, frankly speaking, no politician or civil servant is likely to match. Despite Sir Hayden's ability, surely the commission was the obvious choice.

Is the Minister able to shed any light on how it was possible for such large amounts of money to enter Labour coffers in loans without the full knowledge of Labour's leading figures? Perhaps it is understandable that the Deputy Prime Minister would not be told, but can it really be sustainable that the treasurer of the Labour party was not informed? Why were the fundraising activities—[Interruption.] I hear the words "purer than pure", but I do not think that we need to go back to those long-ago days. Why were the fundraising activities centred on 10 Downing street rather than Labour headquarters? Does not that raise concerns that civil servants may have been put into situations too close to politics, and not for the first time under this Government?

The only leading figure who knew what was happening was the Prime Minister. Does the Minister agree that he acted wrongly in not being open with his colleagues, his party and the country? His behaviour caused the crisis.

The Minister says that loans should be declared and she wants to change the Electoral Administration Bill—[Interruption.] I will treat that positively and co-operatively. However, that Bill was in the House for months and nothing would have been done if Jack Dromey had stayed silent.

Can the Minister explain why Sir Hayden is apparently to have so long—until the end of 2006—to report? Does not that mean that further changes to the law will have to wait for 18 months, given the timing of the Queen's Speech? Does she agree that the matter is urgent? Does she also agree that the review of party funding must include trade union donations, just as much as company and individual ones?

An important part of solving the crisis should be cross-party co-operation—sitting down together to work out a fair and transparent system of funding and how to take honours out of the funding of politics. The Minister knows that my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) is writing today to the Prime Minister and to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) suggesting such talks. Will the Government sit down with the Opposition and other parties to discuss the important proposals put forward by the Conservatives to clean up party political funding?

Bridget Prentice: I would have hoped that the hon. Gentleman could come to the House in a slightly more conciliatory fashion, given that my statement specifically says that we want all parties to be involved in the discussions.

The hon. Gentleman asks why Sir Hayden Phillips has been asked to conduct the review. The hon. Gentleman, like many Members, knows that Sir Hayden is an extremely well-respected and experienced civil servant, who has dealt with all parties and who will certainly look at the issue with a view to helping all parties to come to a proper conclusion.

The hon. Gentleman asks why the issue had not been included in the Electoral Administration Bill, but when discussions about party funding took place in 2000 no one in the House suggested that loans should be part of the Bill. That Bill is currently going through the House of Lords and we can include amendments to it this very week, so when he asks for urgency in the matter I can tell him that no one is acting with more urgency than the Government.

The hon. Gentleman asks that trade union donations be taken into account. He might want to reflect on the fact that not only trade union donations but donations from all sorts of individuals and institutions should be taken into account. He will remember that the Government prevented donations from people living outside this country ever being part of our party political system.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman asks why the report would be at the end of 2006. If it is possible for that timetable to be brought forward, no doubt it will be. However, I hope that in the spirit of co-operation, which he remembered to mention towards the end of his questions, he will make sure—as we want to do—that every political party, the Electoral Commission and all the stakeholders involved have an opportunity to contribute properly, so that we reach a decision that will sit properly and benefit our democracy for the future—[Interruption.]

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The House should recognise that it is probably under very close inspection from the public where this matter is concerned. We do our reputation no good if we trade insults from either side. Before further questions are put, I remind the House that the Minister is here in her departmental responsibility, answering for her Department and not for any political party.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): From the Prime Minister's announcement of a general review of funding of political parties on Thursday to the Government's conversion to disclosure of loans to political parties on Monday is a welcome and, if I may say so, speedy direction of travel—even if Thursday's announcement was extremely late, given all the press that there has been in past years, hesitant, and made in undesirable circumstances.

I have four specific questions for the Minister, representing her Department. Does she and do her colleagues agree that loans are potentially much more significant in terms of influence on the political process than outright gifts, because people can renounce claiming them back or ask for them back, and therefore have much more influence during that process? Obviously, they need to be treated in the same way.

Do Ministers now agree that significant loans made in the past 10 years should all be disclosed? If that is not done, the public will not be able to judge what the link is between fees and funds on the one hand and favours on the other.Do Ministers now accept that in a modern, pluralist democracy, nobody should be able to buy their way into a seat in either of the Houses of Parliament? Do Ministers, from the Prime Minister downwards, agree that it is time that we converted the funding of political parties in Britain back to a system in which ordinary people influence and control political parties according to their interest and their commitment and not according to their wealth?

Some people would ask why loans should be regarded as more significant than donations—after all, a commercial loan has an interest rate attached to it, so some would argue that a donation would be a more influential form of funding. However, Sir Hayden's review will take account of all of those issues.

The hon. Gentleman asked about publicising loans made in the past 10 years. I cannot say at this stage whether there will be retrospectivity—if that is the correct word— in that respect, but I understand that the Labour party is today publicising all those people who have given it loans. I hope that his party and the others in the House will do the same.

Finally, on the hon. Gentleman's question about anyone being able to buy a seat in this House or any other, we would all deprecate any suggestion of that happening.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I welcome what my hon. Friend has said today and recognise the changes in relation to political donations that the Government have brought about—changes that the Tories refused to make prior to 1997. Is it not essential at long last to separate the giving of large donations to political parties and the award of peerages and knighthoods—a practice that we know has been going on for years? I believe that the public want a clear separation between the two, and I hope that our earlier reforms will be consolidated by further changes during this Parliament.

Bridget Prentice: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: it is important that we separate the two and that the two are seen to be separate. In the past few days, we have learned that perception is always key in politics and that it is important to give the public the reassurance that everything done in this House and in the other place is done openly and with transparency. We are introducing amendments to ensure not only that that is the reality, but that that is the perception, as well.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): I have great sympathy with the Minister because I assume that, prior to Jack Dromey blowing the whistle last week, she was kept in the dark, as was the treasurer, the Deputy Prime Minister and the chairman of the Labour party. The Minister says that we will have transparency in relation to loans. That is right, but should we not also consider limiting the level of loans and barring any Minister from giving any loans to any political party?

Bridget Prentice: The question of a limit will be discussed during the review, and I hope that all hon. Members and political parties will play an active and constructive part in it. I have had discussions with various colleagues over the past few days about the funding of political parties, and there are almost as many views on the subject as there are Members of Parliament. I welcome the debate, I hope that it will be constructive, and I look forward to hearing from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): Welcome though today's announcement is, does my hon. Friend agree that we need to go much further if we are to re-establish public confidence in the funding of political parties? Will Sir Hayden Phillips consider, among other things, imposing a far more drastic cap on what can be spent nationally by political parties, and imposing a very drastic cap on what can be donated by individuals? Could he look at whether small donations should be made tax deductible for the political party of one's choice, as that is the one form of funding of political parties that the public might support? I appreciate that some of those matters are for my hon. Friend's many superiors, but will she undertake to pass the word on?

Bridget Prentice: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's remarks. I thought that we were a little more egalitarian in this party than to espouse the idea of having superiors but, nevertheless, I accept what he said. It might be helpful if I briefly tell the House that Sir Hayden's review will examine the case for state funding, including whether or not it should be enhanced in return for a cap on the size of donations. He will consider, too, the transparency of funding of political parties, so I hope that that covers some of the questions asked by my hon. Friend.

I remind the House that Sam Younger said in The Times:

"Political parties are important in a democracy. They need funds in order to organise themselves, develop policies and put themselves forward to the electorate."

It is a question of getting the balance right between state and private funding, and that is part of the debate.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Why did the Minister decide to make her statement today?

Bridget Prentice: Because the Prime Minister and the Government thought that it was important, given that the Electoral Administration Bill is proceeding through the House, to take the opportunity to make a statement at this time.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that, contrary to all the talk in the media, the sad fact is that over the past 20 years or more there has been a disinclination among the public either to join parties or to contribute to them? They then complain, wherever the money comes from. Can I suggest to my hon. Friend that the last people we want lectures from are the party of Ashcroft, Aitken and the rest? We do not need any lectures about a Swiss rollover by the Liberal Democrat— but if we did go further we could abolish the House of Lords and the honours lists so that there would not be very much left to buy.

Bridget Prentice: My hon. Friend leads me very temptingly down a path that it is not appropriate for me to take, given the nature of the statement. It deals with the funding of political parties, so he is quite right to refer to other political parties. This is something in which we all have a stake, so we should all work on it together. As for the reform of the House of Lords, he will wish to know that we look forward to proceeding with change there very speedily indeed.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): The Minister just said that perception is important in politics, so does she agree that the public perception of this sorry affair is that the Prime Minister has been caught red handed, selling peerages in return for party funding?

Bridget Prentice: The Prime Minister, in his statement last week, took responsibility as the leader of the Labour party. I think that that was right and proper, and something that I would expect him to do.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): I welcome the Minister's statement today. It is quite right that all political parties should declare any loans that they receive and it is right to review party political funding, but I would err on the side of caution in going down the road of state funding for political parties, which would go down like a lead balloon with the public. The way forward has been mentioned already—we should make the cap on spending at elections much lower than at present. I am sure that members of the public will not mind if they only receive one DVD instead of three. [Interruption.]

Bridget Prentice: Of course, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House says, it might depend on whom those DVDs are from. However, I hear what my hon. Friend says about state funding. She reflects a view that, I suspect, is held quite widely. That is part of the reason why the debate about getting the balance right is important. As I have already said, a reference to the cap on funding is in the review.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): I am of the view that most party political funding is wasted anyway on embarrassing and probably counter-productive advertising campaigns and dubious spin doctors, on the part of all the major parties. Was the hon. Lady, in her response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), seriously trying to tell the House that the occasion of her statement today had nothing whatever to do with the scandal and revelations of the past few days? If so, I fear that she may be unnecessarily damaging her own credibility, as well as setting a very poor example of candour in the House. Does she accept that not to reveal a loan, as a financial relationship, is thoroughly disingenuous and misleading?

Bridget Prentice: Obviously, the discussions that have been taking place over the past few days are ones to which we must all respond. It is not perhaps in the hon. Gentleman's best interest to try to say that this is something that affects only one political party—[Interruption]—or to imply that that is so. I hope that he agrees that it is necessary for us all to work together.

As I said earlier, it is important to re-engage the public in democracy. It is important that they see that we are transparent in the way that we are funded. There is a dichotomy: we do not want political parties to be funded by shady individuals from abroad; nor do people necessarily want to pay for them through their taxes. We must find a way that gets the balance of party political funding right—whether partly through the state or partly through private donations—but whichever way that is done, it must be transparent, and that is what we hope to achieve.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Has the Minister noticed that Sir Hayden has been honoured? Is there not a case for appointing a real person to conduct the review, rather than a member of the establishment, the glitterati, that magic circle that runs the country, whether it has a Labour or a Tory Government? Will she support an amendment to disqualify from getting a peerage anyone who makes a substantial loan or payment to a political party? That is what is necessary, and on that, with the greatest respect, the Prime Minister—she might find this hard to believe—is wrong.

Bridget Prentice: I think that all political parties in the House that propose people for appointment as working peers would say that they put forward the names of people who have contributed greatly in public life, so I would not want to go down the road of banning every form of donation. I am sure that Sir Hayden will be more than delighted to hear my hon. Friend's views on what should be in the review.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): The hon. Lady's statement is most welcome today, but it would have been even more welcome if it had been made before last week's revelations. She referred twice in her statement and once in an earlier response to the word "transparency". In the interests of transparency and gaining some ground back on the way in which the public consider politicians in general, can she tell the House whether there will be an investigation of recent events by the Labour party under the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925?

Bridget Prentice: There has been no abuse under the 1925 Act.

"We didn't publish the names, because that was not the law, and we've complied with the letter of the law, we've followed it absolutely."

That was said by the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) on a broadcast made yesterday. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) should be aware that the 2000 Act allowed for loans to be made in the way that they have been made. We are tabling an amendment to the Electoral Administration Bill to ensure that there is transparency.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I welcome the Minister's statement and her announcement that the Labour party is opening its books in respect of the loans and gifts made to it. Embarrassing as it may have been to Labour party members to discover that we were in receipt of loans, will my hon. Friend confirm that although Labour Members knew next to nothing about those loans, the House knows absolutely nothing about loans and gifts made to the Tory party during the same period? Will she confirm that the terms of Sir Hayden's inquiry will include a 10-year retrospective on loans as well as gifts, and that it will explore the terms of loans and whether they varied during the period of the loan? Will he make recommendations on the most effective way of severing any connection between financial assistance to political parties and the honours system?

Bridget Prentice: My hon. Friend is right. It might be appropriate to remind the House that it was this Government who brought in the 2000 Act and set up the Electoral Commission. We have said that we want to make the system even more transparent. I know nothing about loans to the Tory party and it is not my place to make any comment on them from the Dispatch Box. Nevertheless, I can assure my hon. Friend that Sir Hayden's review will be able to examine funding right across the board and, if he comes to a conclusion about the retrospective nature of that funding, I am sure that he will bring it to the attention of the House.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that it is vital to dispel any notion that the funding of any political party secures access to the legislature, is it not the most important and urgent responsibility of the Government to bring forward proposals for a predominantly elected House of Lords, because that is the only credible and defensible basis upon which to constitute the upper House in the 21st century?

Bridget Prentice: As I mentioned earlier, the reform of the House of Lords is a matter that we are studying closely. I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. I know that there are various views in the House. I may not entirely share his views in that respect. It is relatively new for the Conservative party to believe in a non-elected House—

John Bercow: Not for me. I have always believed that.

Bridget Prentice: It may not be new for the hon. Gentleman, but that is a debate that we can continue.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that we on the Labour Benches are entitled to be proud of the 2000 Act, which introduced a new procedure for donations? Acknowledging that there is a loophole that allows parties to receive commercial loans, does my hon. Friend accept that her statement—[Interruption.] Opposition Members might allow others to speak. I think that they are a little on the defensive. [Interruption.] Yes, I do. No one tried to amend the legislation before. Will my hon. Friend confirm that we are going for maximum transparency in respect of all loans and all donations to all political parties as soon as possible?

Bridget Prentice: My right hon. Friend is right. When the Act was passed in 2000, no one in the House thought about the effect of loans. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier today, the system has not been cleaned up enough and we need to change it. That is why we are introducing the amendment to the Electoral Administration Bill. We have a proud record of trying to bring about greater transparency, and we shall continue to do so.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Does the Minister think that the British public should regard this Government and their Prime Minister as whiter than white? If not, what advice would she give to the Prime Minister about his future?

Bridget Prentice: The Prime Minister, along with this Government, has made radical changes in this country. We have introduced the minimum wage, put more money than anyone else has done before into hospitals and schools, reduced unemployment and made the economy more sound. The record of this Government and Prime Minister is second to none, and I ask the hon. Gentleman to reflect on that before he goes any further.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I listened very carefully to the answers given to the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) and my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson). Does the Minister accept that, in disclosing the nature of the loans given over the past 10 years, we need to know why the people making those loans thought it necessary to keep their names secret; what conditions were placed on them by the people making the loans; what interest rates were paid on them and whether those interest rates have varied during that period? If there is to be any confidence in the political system, it has got to be absolutely open and above board as to why people felt it necessary to keep their names secret while making any loan to any political party.

Bridget Prentice: There are a variety of reasons why people wish to keep their names secret when they give loans or even donations to political parties. I think we are all pretty much aware of what they are. However, we feel that we need to go further than we went in the 2000 Act, which is why we are bringing forward the amendments. I hope that my hon. Friend will also contribute to the debate on how political parties should be funded. The bottom line, if I may put it that way, is that we make things as transparent as possible, so that people have confidence in the democratic process and so that political parties re-engage with the public in the way that we would all like.

NHS Redundancies (Staffordshire)

4.2 pm

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 24, to discuss a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely, the announcement last Thursday of up to 1,200 staff reductions at the University hospital of North Staffordshire. I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I am a little out of breath; I thought that the statement would continue rather longer.

My local hospital is one of 18 NHS trusts in the country earmarked in January by the Secretary of State to receive the attention of turnaround teams. It is the first to announce its financial recovery plan. Locally, of course, the cuts are devastating. They include 573 nurses, midwives and auxiliaries, and one in five of all nursing staff. The situation at the hospital, however, illustrates more fundamental issues about governance, management and control across the NHS.

This was a hospital that was allowed to drift by its strategic health authority and the NHS Executive, and right up to the desk of the former NHS chief executive, the soon-to-be Lord Crisp. It was allowed the luxury of letting its former chief executive serve one year's notice before quitting for personal reasons. Even then, last year, it could appoint only an acting chief executive, who was moved on in January. That followed the resignation of the chairman and all the non-executive directors days before Christmas. Throughout this period, it employed accounting staff who evidently found numbers troublesome. That is all the more surprising as the numbers have to add up for a brand-new private finance initiative hospital that has been planned for years.

Since Christmas, local MPs have been trying to get to the bottom of the hospital's projected £18 million deficit this year. We have failed to be able to do so. At a meeting in mid-February, we were promised the details by the SHA, but instead, all we had last Thursday, out of the blue, was talk of £43 million savings over two years. The document issued to staff giving 90 days' notice of redundancy is a disgrace in content and tone. This is a hospital, not a business going bankrupt. This is no way to secure the continued staff good will on whose basis our NHS operates. Despite its consequences, the notice was issued on no higher authorisation than that of the acting chief executive of the hospital. Much of the deficit is down to national policies, the consequences of which are coming home to roost. A great deal of change is taking place, but it is important that the response to the deficits does not veer out of control.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have listened carefully and, in the circumstances, sympathetically to the hon. Gentleman. I must give my decision without giving any reasons: I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 24, and I cannot therefore submit the application to the House. However, I am sure that he has noted that there is an estimates debate this afternoon on the NHS financial deficit, and I commend that thought to him.

Points of Order

4.5 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, The Mail on Sunday yesterday contained an article that included what were purported to be details of the living away from home allowance claims made by a right hon. Member of the House. I have absolutely no idea whether those details were correct or whether the complaints made about them are sustainable—they may have been completely invented. If there has been a leak from the Fees Office—prima facie, someone in the Fees Office may have sold information available to them in the course of their duties—will you ensure that an inquiry is undertaken to remove that terrible suspicion from people who serve the House on the whole extremely honourably and well?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have no reason for supposing that there has been any lowering of standards by an Officer of this House, and I did not necessarily take that implication from that article, which I also saw. There is a procedure to deal with that matter, and if there is any ground for suspicion, I am sure that it will be brought up in the proper manner with the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards.

Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I draw your attention to a statement made by the Leader of the Opposition at Prime Minister's Question Time on 15 March:

"We believe in parliamentary scrutiny—I know that the Prime Minister probably cannot even spell those words, but we happen to think that it is important."?—[Official Report, 15 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1452.]

May I subsequently draw your attention to the Ninth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation, which considered the important Civil Proceedings Fees (Amendment) Order 2005, because not a single Opposition Member turned up and the matter was discussed in their absence? Should the Leader of the Opposition be admonished for misleading the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not even a point of order for the Chair.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in view of the importance of this matter to many hon. Members, have you received any indication from the Government that a Minister will come to this House to make a statement or answer in detail on the ill-considered and apparently inconsistent merger of police forces?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have not received notice of an intention to make an oral statement to the House, but I note that the Home Secretary is due to make a written ministerial statement this very day. I know nothing else at the moment that relates to hon. Members' understandable interest in the matter.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I seek your guidance. Given that last Thursday afternoon, in a move that was certainly unusual and arguably somewhat discourteous, the Government withdrew from the consideration of the House their own business, namely Lords amendments to the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill, have you received an indication that a Minister intends to come to the House and tell hon. Members when we will have an opportunity to debate the business that we were supposed to consider on Thursday afternoon?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have no such information that I can share with the hon. Gentleman, but it is possible that the matter will be alluded to in the next business statement, or perhaps he can contrive that it should be.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Further to the advice that you gave me a moment ago, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You said, rightly, that if there is any suggestion of an abuse by a Member in the allowance system, that is a matter for the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards to investigate. Of course, I accept that that is right. My point, however, related to the possibility of corruption by a member of the staff of the Fees Office. I am not aware that the parliamentary commissioner has any jurisdiction over employees of the House of that kind, and my question to you really concerns what procedure might be available to investigate such a suspicion if unfortunately it were to arise as a result of the article to which I referred.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is now making a very grave allegation, having previously said to me that he had no idea whether there was any truth in the matter at all. I think that one should be very careful in making an allegation against someone who cannot answer back to this House. If there is any breath of a suggestion of impropriety on the part of a member of staff, I am sure that the head of the department, at the very least, will examine that possibility to see whether there is the slightest bit of truth in the matter. I think that it is probably better left there.

ESTIMATES DAY

[2ND ALLOTTED DAY]

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 2005–06

Ministry of Defence

[Relevant documents: Fourth Report from the Defence Committee, Session 2005–06, HC 980, on Costs of peace-keeping in Iraq and Afghanistan: Spring Supplementary Estimate 2005–06; and Ministry of Defence Annual Report and Accounts 2004–05, HC 464.]

This Estimate is to be considered in so far as it relates to costs of peace-keeping in Iraq and Afghanistan (Resolution of 16th March).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the year ending with 31st March 2006, for expenditure by the Ministry of Defence—

(1) further resources, not exceeding £1,776,067,000, be authorised for use as set out in HC 827,

(2) a further sum, not exceeding £1,889,814,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to meet the costs as so set out, and

(3) limits as so set out be set on appropriations in aid.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have imposed a time limit of 10 minutes on Back-Bench speeches which applies after the opening speech.

4.10 pm

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Because of that time limit, I shall do my utmost to keep my own remarks to 10 minutes, as I know that many Members want to speak in both debates.

The motion before us seeks the House's approval for the Ministry of Defence's spring supplementary estimate—a request for an additional £1,890 million, of which the largest part is to meet the costs of peacekeeping in Iraq and Afghanistan. I know that in making a speech one is meant to begin at the beginning, but I wish to begin at the end, so I shall go straight to the conclusion of the Defence Committee's report:

"We do not propose that the House should refuse the request for resources set out in the MoD's Spring Supplementary Estimate. On the contrary, we believe it is essential that peace-keeping operations in Iraq and Afghanistan should be properly funded."

If anything, we are concerned that too little is being spent, not too much. The Defence Committee, of which I have the great honour to be Chairman, hopes that the House will approve this request for resources. We believe that our service personnel should have the equipment that they need. However, we have several concerns about the way in which the Ministry of Defence presents its estimates to Parliament and thought that the House should have an opportunity to consider them before it approves the spring supplementary estimates. We are therefore grateful to the Liaison Committee for agreeing that our report should be debated.

First, we are concerned about the inadequacy of the information that the Ministry of Defence provided to Parliament in support of the request for resources—a request for a very large amount of public money. The initial estimates memorandum, which all Departments provide to their Select Committees with the estimates, is printed in the evidence with our report. It does not add very much—only a breakdown between the operations for Iraq and Afghanistan. That is in table 1 of our report. We thought that that was not good enough and asked the Ministry of Defence for more information. Its more detailed breakdown is set out in tables 2 and 3 of our report. We hope that next time the Ministry of Defence will give that level of information in the estimates memorandum when the estimates are first published. That will give us enough time to report to the House, if necessary, in good time for the estimates day debate.

Secondly, we are concerned about the high level of contingency that is contained in the estimate. Tables 2 and 3 of our report show that the estimate contains £69 million contingency in resources and £77 million contingency in capital, so we asked the Ministry of Defence why such a large amount of contingency was necessary, especially at such a late stage in the financial year. The response was that it was "due to the often rapidly changing operational situation"

"need to be able to respond to the rapidly evolving threat to our forces".

The Defence Committee fully accepts the need for the Ministry of Defence to have financial flexibility to respond to changing threats, buy new equipment and so on when the operational need arises. There may be different views on whether it is a good thing to deploy in Iraq and Afghanistan, but there can be no such difference about the need for our forces to be properly and fully protected. Force protection, especially against increasingly sophisticated improvised explosive devices, is a matter of life and death for our service personnel as they serve this country in Iraq and Afghanistan. Equipment often needs to be developed at short notice. Urgent operational requirements cost a lot of money and we need to ensure that it is properly managed.

In January, the Committee visited the Defence Procurement Agency and were briefed by the special projects integrated project team on the acquisition of urgent operational requirements. We were impressed by the speed and efficiency of the acquisition process. The team's close connection to operations gave its members a strong motivation and they fed back lessons from the field. We were told that, in one project, the contract was let within three days of notification of the requirement and the equipment was in the field in three weeks. That is an extraordinary achievement.

We accept the need for flexibility, but that does not absolve the Ministry of Defence of the requirement to make proper financial forecasts. We shall look closely at the out-turn costs in the annual report and accounts to ensure that the Ministry is not routinely overestimating the costs of operations. Our report recommends that the annual report should contain significantly more detail on the cost of operations than it has done in the past.

Our third concern is about arrangements whereby the Ministry of Defence waits for the spring supplementary estimates before seeking Parliament's approval of expenditure on operations. I am afraid that we did not understand why the Ministry does that. It may be a surprise to some hon. Members that the Ministry makes no provisions in its main estimates for operations, even if they are well established. In effect, we are being asked to authorise expenditure in arrears.

The Ministry's explanation for that arrangement is that

"we cannot provide a detailed forecast at the beginning of the financial year that is accurate to the standards which we would normally place before Parliament for figures for that financial year."

In our view, the fact that the Ministry cannot provide information that is accurate to a high standard is no reason for not providing Parliament with any information at all. We therefore recommend that, in future, provisions for operations that are well under way should be made in the main estimates in the usual way—if necessary, with a large element for contingency.

We also recommend that the Ministry provide to our Committee regular updates of the cost of operations, in the same way as it provides information to the Treasury. That would be a welcome demonstration that the Ministry recognises the need for public accountability. It should give us the clear impression that it regards Treasury approval of its expenditure plans as no more important than parliamentary approval. Parliamentary approval should not be a rubber stamp.

Perhaps the attitude of the Ministry of Defence is influenced by the fact that funding for operations does not come from its allocated defence budget but is new money from the Treasury. However, it is all public money and it should all be subject to the usual process of parliamentary authorisation.

Our report deals briefly with the costs of operations in the Balkans. We recommend that, in future, provision for such operations should be set out in the Ministry's main estimates rather than transferred in from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office at the spring supplementary estimates.

Our report also touches on the future costs of the deployment to Afghanistan. It is not enough for Ministers to tell us that the cost of the deployment will be around £1 billion over five years and we will press the Ministry of Defence for more information on costs in our inquiry into the Afghanistan deployment.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I note that my right hon. Friend's excellent report calls for more information. A request was made by his predecessor in the spring supplementary estimate in 2005 for more information on the figures that had been provided, yet that information is not available. Why does my right hon. Friend think that his own request will be more successful?

Mr. Arbuthnot: Because we have a listening Minister and a listening Government. I am sure that, this time around, the Minister will listen in a way that perhaps did not happen last time around. The value of this debate, and my hon. Friend's timely intervention, is that it will ensure that that happens.

Finally, our report outlines the reductions in the overall size of the armed forces, set out in the votes A for the financial year 2006–07, which the House will be asked to approve after this debate. They reflect the significant draw-down in the size of the armed forces, particularly the Royal Air Force, in line with the Government's future capabilities decisions. We do not propose that the House should refuse to approve the votes A, though we do have concerns about the overstretch of elements of the armed forces and are looking closely at that.

I am sure that the Minister will respond to our recommendations in a positive spirit. I have no doubt that his commitment to democratic accountability is second to none and I hope that he will support our aim of encouraging greater transparency in the way in which his Department operates. We look forward to receiving in due course the Ministry of Defence's considered response to our report. The Defence Committee will look at the main estimates closely when they are presented to the House and we will bring any concerns to the attention of the House. I hope that the Minister will not again take parliamentary approval of the estimates for granted.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): I commend the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) and his Committee on their important report. The sums of money in question are certainly large, although that is unsurprising in view of the scale of the operations involved, and of the recent commitments to increase them. I note with regret that some of the points that the Committee has raised were also raised a year ago, but have not elicited a response from the Government. It does not make sense for all this to be approved retrospectively. Of course, it is impossible for the Ministry of Defence to know at the outset of the year exactly what the costs of its activities are going to be over the year, but Parliament should surely be given more information than it has been given in the past.

From time to time, we are inevitably asked what our involvement in Afghanistan and, in particular, in Iraq has cost us in total. The Government have published the figures for expenditure on operations and on capital equipment in each of the past three financial years, and will no doubt do so for the current year. However, a press release from the MOD's Defence Analytical Services Agency last September made the important point that the costs of peacekeeping in Iraq are just that, and that anyone trying to keep an account of the total expenditure must realise that combat operations have not been included in the figures that have been quoted. Will the Minister therefore confirm whether the published figures include combat costs? He has said in a previous parliamentary answer that it is not possible to identify separately the cost of combat operations. He has also made the point that those costs span two financial years, as the combat activities began in March 2003. Are the Government really telling us that they are unable to make an assessment, or even an estimate, of combat activity costs?

A needs assessment was carried out in October 2003 by the World Bank, in which it considered the tasks that lay ahead for the allies. By that stage, the armed combat phase had ended, and it was looking forward to the costs of reconstruction. The figures being produced, it noted, worked on the following assessment at the outset:

"a main underlying assumption was that there would be a stable security environment that would allow international and local staff and consultants to move freely around rural and urban areas" to carry out their work. Given that that is no longer the case, it is understandable that the cost of all that work has gone up and up. Has there been any assessment of the impact of that on the running costs, and on the various other organisations involved?

The Government have pledged a total of £544 million for the reconstruction work in Iraq. A lot of that money went through the international reconstruction fund facility for Iraq. In total, the World Bank estimated that $55 billion would be required. Of the $21 billion that America was going to pay, however, only $2 billion has been disbursed. I would be intrigued to know what the comparable state of play is with British finance. Three years on, with only two thirds of the American funds and just one sixth of non-American funds pledged having been disbursed, can the Minister tell us exactly how much UK money has been allocated? The latest report of the US Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction said that the UK had pledged £250 million, and yet our Government tell us that the figure is £540 million. What proportion of the UK funds pledged have been spent so far?

With specific reference to Afghanistan, the Select Committee report asks for a breakdown of costs by financial year, and for more explanation of the £1 billion estimated cost over the five years 2005–06 to 2009–10. The Ministry has told us that it cannot go into that sort of detail. There was a report in The Sunday Times yesterday, however, about what purported to be a leaked Ministry of Defence document, saying:

"The objectives of the British mission to Afghanistan could take as long as 20 years to achieve, according to a confidential Ministry of Defence briefing".

That is no particular surprise, because the history of engagement by foreign troops in Afghanistan has never been happy, and no one should underestimate the task of the international forces now there. If the Ministry's own officials really think that fulfilling the objectives of the mission could, in principle, take as long as 20 years, what on earth do they think that it will cost? How can they state with such precision that it will cost £1 billion? From where exactly have the Government got the figures on which to base their request for that £1 billion?

Has sufficient money been allocated? The Select Committee Chairman said that if anything, the Committee was concerned not about the figures being surprisingly high but, in relation to some aspects, whether they were high enough. I wonder whether asking British and international troops to undertake some of the work envisaged has necessarily been assessed as the most cost-effective method. Has sufficient money been allocated in direct aid to the provinces in Afghanistan for training and capacity building for the Afghan national army and police?

The UK is the lead nation on counter-narcotics, but how much are the Government spending on that in Afghanistan? I am not referring to the consultancy and security teams: how much help have the Afghan Government received? What measurable targets have the Government for improving and enhancing Afghan military capability?

The Minister said in a written answer that the number of Taliban in southern Afghanistan could amount to over 1,000, but what is his assessment of their military capability? He also said that there were a range of illegally armed groups in the south, which must be the case, but that the number of people involved could not be determined. Has the Ministry really no estimate of the size and strength of those groups? Given that the British forces are expected to have a role in their disarmament and demobilisation, surely there must be some assessment of what those forces are up against.

Does the increase in the role that we will play in Afghanistan, in conjunction with ongoing work in Iraq, mean that United Kingdom forces will continue to work beyond the planned level in the defence planning assumptions? If that is to continue throughout the three years for which the Government expect the operation to last, there must be considerable concern about the effects on retention and recruitment. Is there any new evidence on the numbers resigning? What about the effects on the reserves, who have been over-tasked, and on the availability of specialists such as medical staff? There are also questions to be asked about a shortage of airlift, both fixed-wing and helicopters. A distinction should be drawn between helicopters that can lift troops in safety, and combat or reconnaissance helicopters that do not carry troops.

When the allied rapid recruitment force is due for relief next year, will the UK be stuck with the task of running the headquarters, or is there any realistic prospect that anyone else can take it over?

As we know, and have seen on our television screens, the Secretary of State has spent the last few days in Iraq visiting the troops there. Although he has said that there is not, as yet, a state of civil war—an assessment with which we would agree—he has nevertheless acknowledged that the situation is very serious, and that there is a danger of its tipping into civil war at very short notice. While many believe that the presence of Brit[illegible] and American forces in Iraq is in a sense part of the problem, any suggestion of their rapid removal would only run the risk of tipping what is already a pretty desperate situation into precisely the civil war of which the Minister has warned.

The scale of the commitments in Afghanistan and Iraq is immense, and the challenges faced by the British forces in both countries are extremely worrying and difficult to quantify. No one would expect the Government to be able to say precisely what the cost will be, but serious tasks are being undertaken, and there is a risk of serious casualties. I think that what Parliament and the British public want is a sense that there really is a Government strategy. It is clear that the intervention in Iraq has caused many difficulties, but obviously we must deal with the world as it is now.

Afghanistan has to be helped. That will cost more in cash and in casualties than it might have if the initial effort had been sustained throughout the period for which we have been there, but we cannot ignore what remains a twofold threat from drugs and terrorism. It is also true that Iraq and Iran cannot be compartmentalised or viewed entirely separately, given their geography and their history. Isolating Iran and a long-term occupation in Iraq can only deepen the problems. Difficult as it is, finding a way of re-engaging with Iran is absolutely necessary.

I hope that we can learn from the experiences of the past five years. Clearly, we cannot pull out of Iraq in a hurry; our work there is important—and perilous. As we take on a considerable new responsibility in Afghanistan, it will be Parliament's role to keep a very close eye on the situation. I welcome the Select Committee's report and the questions that it asks about finance. Parliament will be failing in its duty if we do not continue to hold the Ministry of Defence to account for the important work that it is undertaking.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I am grateful to the Defence Committee for producing the report before us, and I am also grateful for the opportunity to speak in today's debate. As the Chairman of the Committee, the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot), pointed out, the report refers to the public being kept in the dark about how the money has been spent on Iraq—on which I want to concentrate today—and on Afghanistan. That is a very good point, and deserves an answer from the Minister and the Government. How do we know that we are getting value for money for what we have spent? As I say that I am chuckling ironically, because frankly, given the situation in Iraq, we are getting no value for money. One could argue that money is being spent on servicing the troops, and perhaps on reconstruction aid—but how do we know? How, moreover, do we know that we are getting good value for it?

That is a very serious point, given the spectacular corruption cases that we are starting to see in the United States. Custer Battles ripped off tens of millions of pounds-worth of the Iraqi people's money by supplying the Iraqi forces with broken-down trucks, and Robert Stein has received a prison sentence for rip-offs amounting to millions of pounds. I am pretty sure that the money spent by the Ministry of Defence does not involve such spectacular rip-offs, but how do we know? It is important that such issues be out in the public domain.

The Government maintain that we spent £3.1 billion on Iraq to March last year and in excess of £1 billion since then, so such spending totals well over £4 billion. But as the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) said, that does not include combat costs—the initial costs of the war—which, presumably, are heavy, or other Departments' costs. Where are they listed? As the Select Committee said, we do not have clear-cut accounting. That money is our taxpayers' money, but what about the great deal of Iraqi money that has been squandered? Some £23 billion-worth of their money, which was held by the United Nations and handed over to the allied forces, has gone without any result. According to an article in The Independent last November, the Iraqi people could lose £200 billion-worth of oil resources under agreements that the allies are forcing through. Lots of money and resources are going down a bottomless drain; some of those are ours, but most belong to the Iraqi people.

Despite all that spending, the Iraqi people are actually worse off. An article by Professor Glen Rangwala, whom I have quoted in the House before, and who helped to expose the dodgy dossier, stated:

"The most thorough survey yet conducted on Iraqi life since the invasion arrived soon after the election. The United Nations Development Programme found that the average income in Iraq dropped by 44 per cent. in the year after the invasion—from £137 per person under the last year of economic sanctions, to £77 under occupation. The percentage of mothers who die in childbirth is now over four times greater in oil-rich Iraq than over the border in resource-free Jordan. Some 63 per cent. of Iraqis live in homes unconnected to a sewage system, resulting in a series of chronic diseases afflicting the population, in comparison to only 25 per cent. in a similar situation before US-instigated sanctions were imposed in 1990. The survey estimated that 223,000 Iraqis had chronic illnesses caused by the war. The number of women of working age who are in employment, a key indicator of female empowerment, is just 13 per cent."

I saw an article recently that showed that according to official figures, unemployment in Iraq is more than 60 per cent. I recall raising that matter soon after the occupation and saying that the situation needed to be dealt with if trouble was to be avoided. Instead, a rip-off was going on at a pace. All the contractors from outside—Halliburton and its cronies—took the jobs instead of the Iraqi people. As I said, recent figures show again that unemployment among Iraqis is well over 60 per cent. There has been no change. As we heard, only 13 per cent. of women are in employment in Iraq. That remains an appalling scandal. Iraqis are no better off.

Just this week there were some good articles in the New Statesman. Zaki Chehab's article begins:

"Kidnappings, power cuts, sectarian hatred, medical shortages, petrol queues, intimidation of women and a mass exodus of talent: all part of life in the new Iraq."

He writes:

"There is a scarcity of basic equipment that most hospitals store in ample quantities as a matter of course . . . The situation today, the professionals insist, is even worse than in the last years of the old regime, when essential materials were in short supply because of UN economic sanctions . . . The optimism has vanished, and reconstruction has proved to be an illusion.

There has been no visible improvement to any of the services that are basic to civil society: drinking water, electricity supply, functioning sewage systems, schools and hospitals. Drinking water used to be available from household taps, but that is no longer safe to drink. Potholes in the roads, which were a common cause of complaint in Saddam's time, not only still exist but are even bigger. There were occasional power cuts in the old days but generally the citizens of Baghdad enjoyed a regular supply. Now they are reduced to electricity for just one hour in every six each day."

Iraqis are worse off. I put that to the Minister, because after the occupation it was made clear by the then Secretary of State for International Development, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), that where there are difficulties, it is for the armed forces to make the situation safe and then carry out the reconstruction work. That is the Minister's responsibility, but the figures show that he has not succeeded. The reconstruction has been an abject failure.

We do not know where most of the cost has gone. The Government have talked about training the Iraqi police and the Iraqi armed forces. What about that cost? Is that something extra to be added to the costs that we have?

[Harry Cohen]

Presumably we are not talking about the armed forces just doing their everyday job and the cost being included in that figure. If it is so important that we train the Iraqi police and armed forces, why have we not seen the figures for that? Actually, it is a pretty incredible thing to be doing, because they have cut off co-operation with us at the moment. In reality, we cannot be doing that—so where has the money allocated for that particular job gone?

Let me quote from one last article from this week's excellent edition of the New Statesman. John Simpson writes:

"there is still no government in place, 90 days after the latest election. Where is the army"— that is what the Iraqis are saying. The article continues:

"Where are the Americans? But the Americans know their presence at the site of an attack often makes things worse, and they are less in evidence now than they used to be. So why are they in Iraq at all, people ask."

That is a good question in such circumstances. Why are they in Iraq at all, and why are we in Iraq at all? There has been £4 billion—if that is the official figure—of wasted money. Not a penny of it should have been spent, and I do not think that we should spend a penny more. We should get out of Iraq.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): I never thought that I would follow the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) and have to confess to agreeing with a great deal of what he said. I begin by quite properly declaring an interest in a public company that does business in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

I welcome the debate not only for the reasons that my right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) mentioned, but because, in an extraordinary way, this is the first opportunity since the general election that hon. Members have had to debate Iraq and Afghanistan on the Floor of the House. The conflict has been the single greatest political disaster that the United Kingdom has faced since Suez—indeed, it is far worse than Suez because that was over in a few weeks with relatively few casualties—and here we are, three years into it. It is right that we address not only the financial costs, but the implications for British soldiers. I hope that there will be more opportunities for such debates.

There is an important question whether the House should give its approval before this country goes to war. It is equally important that once a war has happened and there are ongoing consequences, the House should have the right to scrutinise properly the way in which the policy evolves, but that has not happened until now.

The background to the presence of British troops in Iraq is that the war was pre-emptive. The situation was unusual and we went into the war in unlikely circumstances. I do not automatically exclude the right to have a pre-emptive war. Of course, if one knows one is going to be attacked, one does not necessarily wait until that happens before taking action to stop it.

If there is to be a right of pre-emption that leads to British troops going to a country such as Iraq, with massive costs and casualties, we should bear in mind two fundamental considerations for both this country and the United States. First, if the United States and Britain have the right to take pre-emptive action, so, too, does every other country in the world. Any country throughout the globe that thinks itself threatened can, according to Washington and the present British Government, initiate a war simply in order to prevent one. Secondly, if pre-emptive wars are contemplated, one needs at the very least not just theories, ideas and suspicions, but solid evidence that can be shared with the public—preferably before the war, but at the very least after it—for why the action is appropriate. Those criteria have not been justified. One recalls Bismarck's remark in similar circumstances when he referred to the pre-emptive approach as being rather like committing suicide because of the fear of death. There are very serious consequences when starting a war in such circumstances, but they do not seem to have been taken into account.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I appreciate that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not a Member at the time, but will he confirm that the official view of the Conservative party was to support the Iraq war?

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is correct. Although that is not my view, it was the official view. However, even my right hon. and hon. Friends had reason to assume that the Prime Minister knew what he was talking about when he said that there was conclusive evidence of weapons of mass destruction and other threats, but that has been seen to be completely bogus.

One should go to war only in one of three circumstances: because one has been attacked, as we were in the Falklands; because one has a treaty obligation to another country, as was the case in 1939 when Poland was invaded; or in very rare circumstances when there is great international consensus, preferably, although not exclusively, expressed through the United Nations Security Council. Such circumstances arose at the time of the first Gulf war when we were able to put together a massive coalition.

I do not say that the United Nations must automatically give its approval. Nye Bevan, of all people, once said:

"If there is one thing worse than my country right or wrong it is the United Nations right or wrong".

Of course, the United Nations is a fallible institution that is dependent on the will of its individual member states. However, we have gone to war at enormous cost to the Exchequer and more than 30,000 people have died, but we were not attacked, we were under no treaty obligation and there was not the proper degree of international legitimacy.

Now where do we go from here? I am conscious of the fact that we must look to the future if we are to reduce the huge burden, in terms of both manpower and cost. I do not argue that we should pull out right away because I was against the war. Indeed, in some respects, the opposite applies and I think that, having created this mess, we have a moral obligation to do our best to sort it out. But I have to say that the criterion that has to be applied is whether the continuing presence of British and US troops is making a useful and viable contribution, not only to today and tomorrow but to the eventual stability of that unhappy country.

There is a fundamental flaw in one aspect of the approach by the British and US Governments. The Secretary of State for Defence confirmed recently that the approach was gradually to hand over to the Iraqi national forces, the police and the army, and then withdraw our troops. In that way, it is hoped, everything will be for the best in the best of all possible worlds. In a normal situation in which one is assisting a Government who are fighting an insurgency, that would be a logical approach. The more the national Government increase their authority and the more they train their own army and police, the more they can be expected to deal with the insurgency themselves. But in the case of Iraq at this moment, that argument misses a fundamental consideration. This is not just an insurgency: it is an increasingly sectarian battle. There are three communities—Sunni, Shi'a and Kurd—all of whom have different interests and none of whom is committed to the concept of a single Iraq. The army and the police force in Iraq are also overwhelmingly Shi'a and Kurd. Therefore, the more powerful the police and the army become in Iraq, the less they are seen as safeguards by the Sunni minority and the more they are seen as an increasing threat to their interests. That is the fundamental inconsistency and why people are increasingly saying that there is no military solution to the problem. The solution, if there is one, has to be found in political terms, not in military terms.

I said that the situation in Iraq was the worst disaster for Britain since Suez, but it is the worst geopolitical problem for the US since Vietnam—indeed, including Vietnam, which already had an insurgency. Vietnam was already involved in a civil war before the Americans ever arrived. The Americans were trying to stop that civil war in the interests of the then Government in Saigon. The current crisis is entirely of our own making, and so far we have had five horsemen of the apocalypse. First, more than 35,000 people—Iraqis, Americans, British and others—have died. According to Mr. Allawi, some 50 or 60 more are killed every day. Secondly, we have in Baghdad, the most pro-Iranian Government that Iraq has had for 70 years, which was not one of the prime objectives of US foreign policy. Thirdly, the situation in Iraq is deeply Islamist rather than secularist. Saddam Hussein was a ghastly, vicious tyrant, but he was a secular tyrant. The current situation was no part of the American strategic objective. Fourthly, on terrorism, we have within Iraq—be it for al-Qaeda or other organisations—the greatest recruiting territory for terrorism since the Soviets invaded Afghanistan. Finally, we have the drift into civil war.

I noticed that the Secretary of State for Defence said last week that civil war was not inevitable or imminent—an important choice of words. He did not say that it was unlikely. He said that it was not happening today, and it was not certain that it would happen tomorrow. But he knows as well as I do that the facts increasingly suggest otherwise. Indeed, the former Iraqi Prime Minister has said that the situation has already reached the point of civil war, and it is difficult to disprove that argument.

So where do we go from here? I have said that it looks increasingly as if there is no military solution. British troops are doing a fabulous job, but they will not sort out the insurgency in the foreseeable future, and we all know that. The problem is that our Prime Minister and the President of the United States are in denial. It is almost impossible to imagine a combination of circumstances that would now persuade either to acknowledge that it was all a terrible mistake. Whatever happens, they say that it is all part of the great plan, that everything is getting better and that we should just trust them. But the world does not trust them and nor should it.

A political solution is required with, first, a more convincing form of power-sharing in Iraq, recognising that Sunni fears and concerns cannot be met simply by a 20 per cent. formulaic share in the structure of government. We went through that process in Northern Ireland, where eventually, after many painful years, we realised that power-sharing had to mean precisely that in a substantive sense, if it was gradually to resolve the kind of problems that we all want to address. Power-sharing has to have substance, not form.

Secondly, the United States and the United Kingdom have to appreciate gradually that, although their withdrawal from Iraq will cause serious problems for the Iraqi Government, it will also remove one of the recruiting agents for those who are creating the insurgency. Arab Governments in the region must do far more than they have done until now to be part of the process of rebuilding Iraq and assisting the work of the democratic Iraqi Government.

Finally, although we all want a democratic Iraq, that will work only if a President Putin-type figure is in charge of Iraq. I am no fan of Vladimir Putin; some of the things that he has done in Russia have been very bad, but he took over at a period of great instability and fragmentation in Russia, and one of the reasons why he has become so popular with the Russian people—even if not with the rest of us—is that he created a sense of stability and authority. If Iraq could identify an individual who could be given that sort of presidential power, he would not be a dictator in the Saddam sense, although he might be more authoritarian than we or the United States would like.

That kind of political approach is the last chance for preventing the disintegration of Iraq. Without it, British troops will either be sucked in for an increasingly desperate period or they, and we, will have to conclude that it is approaching the hour when they will have to be brought home.

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): First, I want to talk about the reasons for the debate. As a member of the Defence Committee, I think that Parliament needs to be involved in such processes. Doubtless, the Minister will find some of our proceedings uncomfortable and may tell me in the Tea Room that we have given a platform for tenuous and sometimes gratuitous general comments about Iraq and Afghanistan, rather than the main issue. But my answer to that is that Parliament needs to be involved, so that it can ventilate the issues.

Although I share much of the assessment made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) of how wrongly things have been done in Iraq, they are not being done wrongly by the British. I am not in control of that Iraqi money. I cannot spend it; other people are doing that. My hon. Friend raised interesting questions, but we are talking about the money that we spend and give. That is under our control, which is why we need to discuss it. We might consider how others could do things better, but we also need to be clear about our own position. That is what we should debate—not how other people spend their money. It is tempting to give a spanking to the argument about elected dictatorships, but I shall not go into that.

The money that is being spent is supporting our troops—people who are trying to do a job. I have heard no one say that they do not want to spend that money. There may be arguments on the margins that the amount should be a little more, but the Defence Committee says that we need to support our people in their job. The money is being spent, and there are important arguments about how it is spent and about accountability, but we must be clear about the fact that we are supporting people on the ground.

I have visited Iraq and Afghanistan, sometimes in uniform—with the armed forces parliamentary scheme, so the House need not panic—and sometimes not. Talking to people on the street—if we can actually get on to the street—or talking to a couple of young men on the back of a donkey cart, we hear a different story. Of course, there is ambivalence about our being in Iraq, what we are doing and so on, but when we witness the day-to-day relationship of our forces with people in both Iraq and Afghanistan, it is not as it is often described.

Our forces want support at their elbow to do their job properly. Their motivation is clear. They are frustrated about obvious things such as being able to phone home, boots and all the usual stuff, but what they really want are the tools to do the job. Part of their frustration is about being able to engage in the civil-military interface, to provide appropriate support for civilians and the proper agencies of an emerging Government and other agencies. The people I spoke to have their own concerns, which include airlift capacity, armoured vehicles and their own protection and equipment, and they are right to raise those matters. They want a manoeuvre capability: they want to be able to get to where they need to go quickly, to be able to do the job, to be protected and to protect others, and to get away, and they need the equipment to do that.

I shall concentrate my comments on how we spend our money. A lot of concern has, rightly, been expressed about equipment. The report's comments on accelerated capital investment and spending are interesting, because that relates to the capacity to repair, supply, provide, maintain and deliver the equipment that people require to do the job. I am worried that, although we have known for some time that there are problems in some of those areas and although we have continuing conflicts in two places, we have not been able to predict requirements. The Minister has had the opportunity to do this, so he knows that ordinary people doing the job on the ground will say that that is the problem: they need more certainty and better planning. The fact that there are not enough Warrior armoured vehicles—that is what is claimed—and that there are problems maintaining and supplying them should now be able to be predicted because the problems were identified some time ago.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is making a powerful argument that what matters is not how much money is spent, but when it is spent. Page 7 of the Defence Committee report explains away the large capital investment for urgent operational requirements by referring to the purchase of, for example, force protection equipment. Given that the technology used in improvised explosive devices—shaped charges—has been around since the second world war and was used in Bosnia and Kosovo, why was the money to protect against that threat not spent at the start, when probably half the amount that is having to be spent now would have been required?

Mr. Havard: As I am not responsible for that matter, I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's question, but I know that he has an interest in Kinetic activities of various sorts. He is right to identify the problem. Work is going on. I am saying merely that, although the right thing is being done, because of the way it is presented to us, it appears to be a bit rushed and being done a little too late. I do not think that that is true in some respects, but that is how it appears to us because of the way in which the finances are presented to us. I want to be confident that that is not happening; that is part of the reason why the Committee has asked for a more regular mechanism whereby what is actually being done is made visible.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend, like me, believe that the MOD sends a blank cheque to the Treasury and asks for it to be signed, or does he believe that there is a list of operational requirements with moneys attached? Does he agree that it would be to the benefit of accountability if the Committee received that list after it was approved by the Treasury, so that we could then scrutinise it?

Mr. Havard: Yes, there are mechanical processes that we could put in place that would facilitate better understanding, not only on the part of the Committee, but on the part of everyone who signs up to the estimates—the whole House on behalf of the whole population. That suggestion might be worth considering but no doubt there are others. I am not a management accountant or a policy wonk—I do not understand how some of those processes work and, to be frank, I do not want to, but I am sure that the pointy heads in the Treasury could come up with processes that would do that for us. The political aspect is what is important—if we have visibility and transparency, we might get better-quality decision making because we have a better understanding of the issues. To be frank, some people do not understand the issues of timely supply and what is actually happening as clearly as they should.

Let me return to my arguments about capital and, more importantly, repair and provision of equipment. I was pleased by last Thursday's decision about the Army Base Repair Organisation, although there has been an understanding about that for some time. However, I want to see figures on spending on urgent requirements and on capital depreciation of assets. I want to be confident about how existing assets will be maintained and their life perhaps extended. I want those things to be made clear. It is clear from that decision that we know that we need more armoured vehicles and that we need a better supply. The methods that are currently used are not wrong, but different methods are available. There is a relationship between all those things, and the Select Committee is working on a report on defence industrial strategy. We have a clear defence industrial policy, including a force generation process that assesses the number of people required against a set of defence assumptions. Perhaps we should have better individual debates about each of those matters but, more importantly, they relate to the industrial strategy for delivery which, in turn, is related to the way in which the money flows.

Those interrelationships are not clearly understood or debated properly in the House, so it is important to ventilate them. Partnering arrangements under a defence industrial strategy are probably a good idea for some things, but not for others. There are certain things that one needs to supply at certain times and that, frankly, one does not wish to subject to competition. ABRO has the capability to maintain armoured vehicles—whether that will be true for the new fleet is a different matter. Some estimates and decisions about when money can be spent and acquired are related to those decisions.

On the surface, I am asking a simple question about the regular supply of information but, in fact, the Committee and I are asking a very difficult question. Realistically, the answer is to provide a more joined-up process, because planning assumptions and so on depend on how the money is spent. It is not easy for the Ministry of Defence to do so, but it is vital to make those processes visible so that we achieve a better quality of understanding and, consequently, a better quality of debate. Doubtless, my right hon. Friend the Minister will be upset with me, and will have a bit of a row with me later but, although it may not feel like it, I am ally of his in this debate. At the end of the day, it is important that we show and demonstrate our own democracy at work. It is all very well for me to go on to the streets in Afghanistan and talk to ordinary Afghans about building capacity to provide a democratic process, but we must demonstrate such things in our own democratic process. In Iraq and Afghanistan, people said to me, "You come from the mother of Parliaments, so you know it all. Just tell us what to do." I said, "If I did know it all, I would be a dangerous man, and if I tried to tell you I would be even more dangerous. You have to develop it for yourself." One of the best ways in which we can help them to do so is to demonstrate that our processes are open and are seen to be open.

The debate is not just for our benefit. We need to send a message of support to our people in each theatre, whether they belong to the military, other Government Departments, the police service or other bodies that are helping to develop capacity. Money has, in fact, been provided. Our discussion is about the methodology that we should use to hold that debate properly and give those people confidence that we will maintain that funding for them. We should give similar confidence to the people of both those countries whom we claim that we are trying to help. That should be our motivation. I am not interested in what is said about the whys and wherefores of entering one conflict or another, or whether Mr. Bremer should have worn boots with his suit. We should make certain that we send the right message. May I tell my right hon. Friend that, although it may not feel like it, I am on his side?

5.8 pm

Mr. Adam Holloway (Gravesham) (Con): The report by the Select Committee on Defence states:

> "Telling Parliament that the costs of the deployment to Afghanistan is 'around a billion' is just not good enough. This is a very large amount of . . . money, and the public deserve better information on how it is going to be spent."

Costs are imprecise, because we do not know precisely what they will be. We are told that the aims are, first, to deal with instability, to extend the writ of the Afghan Government, not to allow Afghanistan to fail, to support the Afghan national army and police and to gain the good will of the Afghan people. Those are great aims, given the consequences of actions in Afghanistan that led to the events of September 2001. Secondly, as part of that we are there to assist the Afghan authorities in reducing the supply of drugs. About 90 per cent. of the heroin on the streets of my constituency—Gravesham—comes from Afghanistan and about a quarter of those drugs come from Helmand province, where our troops will be deployed.

To my mind, however, those twin aims—stabilisation and the reduction in the supply of the opium poppy—are in conflict with each other. How do we gain the good will of people in Helmand province when a very large number of them are dependent on growing poppies, not as a great money-making adventure, but as a substance crop that they grow to feed their families? I have spoken to Afghan farmers who say that if we seek to interfere with their livelihoods and do not provide sufficient alternative means of income, they will take up arms against us.

We are told that military operations will be against the greedy, not the needy, and that the involvement of the British military will be confined to > "cordons, airlift of Afghan National Army and Police units, and help with planning".

To my mind, the consequences will generate anything but the good will of the local people. Last week, at a meeting at Permanent Joint Headquarters in Northwood, jokes were being made about whether, as a consequence of that conflict in aims, British troops would become the duty targets.

I and every person who is associated with planning for the deployment to whom I have spoken at the MOD and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office believe that the reason why the estimates of cost are so vague is precisely that we have no clear idea of the consequences of what we are proposing to do.

5.11 pm

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I am grateful to the House for allowing me to participate in this important debate. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) has said, this is one of our first opportunities to assess some of the spending commitments that have taken place not only this year, but in the past few years. I take issue with some of the concerns that have been raised by Government Members that, somehow, we are involved in a process of simply ticking off the accounts. We must go further than simply looking at the financial aspects—the numbers—to the decisions that lie behind them. Were those decisions correct? Could the objectives have been achieved quicker or cheaper if other decisions had been made instead?

Today, as I am sure all hon. Members are aware, is the third anniversary of the invasion of Iraq. This is an appropriate time to take stock of what has happened in that country—a moment to consider what has been achieved or not achieved—and to measure the social and political progress that has been made. There are more than 200 UK dead. More than 2,300 American soldiers have been killed. More than 4,000 British soldiers have been injured.

We now know that there were no weapons of mass destruction, no missiles with 45-minute readiness and certainly no links between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda. In my view, it was a mistake to ignore the calls for a broader coalition to deal with Saddam Hussein. It was a mistake to disband the Iraqi military. Certainly, it was a mistake to try to link 9/11 with what was going on in Iraq. In my view, the invasion of Iraq, with the objective of helping to defeat terrorism, has only encouraged more terrorism and made the world a more unsafe place. Today's debate is about the sums involved, but those poor decisions have driven up the cost of our operations.

I do not argue about whether Saddam Hussein had to be dealt with, but as someone who has spent many years in the military—serving not only in Kuwait, but in Bosnia and other places—I have questions about the manner in which we went about getting rid of him. The inadequate assessment of the initial threat, the poor justification for an attack and the appalling management of peacekeeping have all led to the rising costs that we are debating today.

We heard only last week that 800 troops will be removed from the British forces in Iraq. The suggestion is that we are doing well and achieving our objective, but Iraq is in a very poor condition. Three months after the elections, there is still no proper Government. On average, electricity is available in Baghdad for only four hours every day, and there is no adequate water supply or sewage system—after the Americans have spent about $20 billion on the infrastructure.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I know that the hon. Gentleman was not in the House when the decision was taken to invade Iraq, but as someone who has been to Iraq four times, including a week ago, may I ask him not to take as gospel everything that he reads in the newspapers? Clearly, the situation in the south and the north is very different from that in and around Baghdad. I do not recognise his description as applying to southern Iraq. In the south, effective regional and local government have been working for two or three years.

Mr. Ellwood: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point, but Basra is working in isolation from Baghdad. There is no link or co-ordination with national Government. I shall suggest a possible solution, if the hon. Gentleman will bear with me.

Harry Cohen: Is it not also the case that the democratically elected authorities are working in isolation from the British forces?

Mr. Ellwood: The hon. Gentleman contradicts the point made by his hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones).

The term "civil war" is being mentioned more and more. We have been encouraged by Ministers not to talk about it, yet that is what we are heading towards. We should debate it in the House. What would be the financial consequences for our involvement in Iraq? The elections there were a positive step forward, but they galvanised the parties and the electorate along religious lines and into their ethnic groups. Consequently, the new National Assembly is unable to agree on a Prime Minister and fill the political vacuum. Granted, in certain areas, initiatives have been taken, but in Basra and other places political power rests not just with the local councils, but with the militias. They have taken advantage of the political vacuum. People seek refuge with the militias in Basra and in many major towns because they are scared and do not feel they are being looked after by the official authorities. The British Government say there is no civil war, yet 1,300 civilians were killed last month alone. There are 60 attacks a day, on average, and about 30 bodies are found on the streets every day in Baghdad. How high must the daily death toll rise before the Minister acknowledges that Iraq is in a state of civil war?

The Minister spoke about contingency planning. I should like to know what will happen if the current plan is not adhered to. A comparison can be made with Bosnia and what happened in that country—three distinct ethnic groups, opinions and differences suppressed by a dictator whose authority was strengthened by outside threats, and when the dictator was removed, the lid came off, opinions could be expressed and the result was civil war.

I have said previously in the Chamber that there is another possible solution to the situation in Iraq that we have not considered or put to the people of Iraq—that is, the managed partition of Iraq. It already exists. The hon. Member for North Durham says he has visited Iraq. If he has visited the Kurds in the north, he will know that they have their own Prime Minister. They even have their own airline. They are entirely segregated from the rest of Iraq and they have no intention of developing any stronger ties. They are quite happy to run their own affairs.

The Yugoslav model that we are trying to promote should be abandoned in favour of the Czechoslovakian model. Some form of velvet revolution should be promoted to allow segregation and the development of regional areas, including Basra.

Mr. Havard: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument and I do not doubt that his motives are good, but do not the things that he proposes—a velvet revolution and managed partition—pre-suppose a level of control and security that do not exist? How can those be brought about without first providing a secure environment in which such a political debate can properly take place?

Mr. Ellwood: It is not for me to decide anything. That is for the Iraqi people to decide. When I put the argument to the Minister before, he found it amusing and suggested that I was some kind of imperialist who wanted to go in and sort out Iraq's problems. He might remember the debate, and he knew perfectly well that that is not what I was pushing for. It is something that the Iraqis need to decide, but the option that I have mentioned has not been debated to the full. If we speak to the Kurds, Shi'ites and Sunnis, we find that it is an option that has not been pursued. It provides the blueprint for another solution, other than the civil war towards which we are now heading.

Mr. Havard rose—

Mr. Ellwood: If the hon. Gentleman will make it brief, I shall be happy to give way.

Mr. Havard: The Iraqi people voted to maintain their country within its current borders. They did not vote in the last election for the partition that the hon. Gentleman describes.

Mr. Ellwood: First, the Kurds were never asked. If we look at the constitution, we see that the regions are given an awful lot of autonomy. I am suggesting that that needs to be developed even further and that, where there is no segregation, exactly what happened in Bosnia will occur. If we remove the troops or money that are going into Bosnia, I am sorry to say that the area would be likely to return to civil war. I believe that to stick blindly to the initial plans created many years ago, having learned what we now know and when they are obviously failing, is to risk the efforts and, indeed, the funding that we have put in, as other countries have done, including Iraq.

I should like to finish on Afghanistan, which I had the opportunity to visit a couple of months back, and refer to the report of my right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) and the Select Committee on Defence. Page 11, paragraph 18 states:

"MoD has stated that the estimated cost of the UK's deployments to Afghanistan will be £1 billion" over the next five years. It goes on to state:

"We asked for a breakdown of this cost by financial year and by purpose."

I think that the response was wanting. I put it to the Minister that this House deserves more detail than simply saying, "We would like a cheque for £1 billion over the next five years." Where will the money go, how will it be spent, where will it be invested and how will it help Afghanistan?

There has been a US-led counter-insurgency operation on the one hand and NATO operations on the other. The two are not working together. There are completely different lines of responsibility. Now that we have moved into south-west Afghanistan, we have already seen evidence of mission creep. We are in the Helmand area, but no sooner did the Norwegians in the north get themselves into a spot of trouble than the British, who are supposed to be based in the south-west, were airlifted north to bail them out of trouble. There is nothing wrong with that—it is exactly how things should work—but straight away, we are seen as a rapid reaction force for the whole of Afghanistan. If that is the case, fine, but it should be stipulated and made clear. Those involved should not say that we are in charge of one region and then provide extra tasks.

Are there enough troops in Afghanistan to do the job? We all want to support our troops, but we have sent 5,000 into southern Afghanistan to patrol and look after an area twice the size of Wales and somehow deal with the narcotics production and terrorism that are taking place there. That is wholly inadequate for what we are trying to achieve, and it is another example of how mission creep will play into the situation.

My time is running out and I appreciate that others want to speak. There are an awful lot of answers here, however, and I encourage the MOD, Ministers and so on to reconsider what our true objective is in Iraq and to clarify what we are doing in Afghanistan, for the benefit not only of those of us here who are dealing with the finances, but of the troops on the ground.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I congratulate the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) on an excellent speech in which he encapsulated the past, present and possible future. It is a pity that he was not in the House when the Iraq debate was going on, because he might have influenced some Opposition Members.

May I ask the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen), in maintaining his consistency in criticising his Government's adventure in Iraq, nevertheless to pay tribute to the British troops, who are doing a fantastic job? If he could offer just one or two sentences in praise of our troops, he would go some way towards those who may think that he is being critical of them.

Harry Cohen: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to do just that: when I was a member of the Defence Committee, I spent a lot of time praising British troops. When British troops are given a rotten job, the failure is not theirs but that of President Bush and others.

Bob Russell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for clarifying his position so eloquently. I congratulate the Chairman of the Defence Committee, which will take away from today's debate one or two points that I shall come to shortly, on his presentation.

I represent the garrison town of Colchester with great pride and affection, and 2 Para is in Iraq, while 3 Para will shortly go to Afghanistan. When 2 Para returns from Iraq, the 2nd Battalion the Royal Anglian Regiment, which is the regional regiment for our part of the country, will go out there, so I have more than a passing interest in what happens to British troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. Just a week or so ago, I had the privilege of travelling with the Committee considering the Armed Forces Bill to Iraq. The Minister knows this, but I am proud to say that the morale of soldiers, sailors and Air Force personnel is great. I have pride and affection for those young men and women—the number of young ladies is increasing—and for the officers.

Sadly, the Committee arrived in Iraq soon after two members of 2 Para lost their lives. I pay tribute to them and to last night's BBC "Panorama" programme, which provided a balanced account of what British troops are doing in Iraq: helping to bring that country up to the democratic standards and civilisation that this Government feel should be provided there. I say that as somebody who voted against the war, because we are not here tonight to discuss why we are there: we are there, and it is our duty to remain there and try to help the Iraqi people.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I acknowledge the points that the hon. Gentleman is making, but does he accept that many families of soldiers who have tragically been killed in Iraq and others in the services community have serious doubts about the strategy and take part in anti-war meetings because they think that British troops should be withdrawn?

Bob Russell: I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's point, but, as I said, we have a duty and responsibility to remain for as long as the Iraqi Government wish us to remain. People who join Her Majesty's armed forces do so in the knowledge that they could be deployed to parts of the world to which they may not want to go, but that is a reality of life. The "Panorama" programme was poignant, because within an hour of an officer being interviewed, that officer and a young private, who also appeared in camera, were tragically killed. The BBC's presentation vividly brought home what is going on.

Others have discussed the broader picture, but I shall concentrate on some relatively minor matters that are nevertheless important in the totality of events. I hope that the Defence Committee will consider the Army Base Repair Organisation. In the space of three months, the Ministry of Defence has gone from proposing large-scale cuts in ABRO to last week's welcome announcement that the job losses will be fewer than originally proposed. My concern is that some MOD boffins concluded three or four months ago that ABRO should be reduced in size, but on reflection concluded that that was not such a bright idea. It may well be that some of the work that ABRO does could be privatised and put out to privatised contractors, but that would take away the dedication, consistency and continuity of a skilled work force who live and breathe the Army just as much as anybody in uniform. I sincerely hope that the MOD will think again, even on the job losses that it is still going ahead with, and I hope that the Defence Committee will consider the whole scenario.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): It is worth while the hon. Gentleman reflecting on the fact that 5 per cent. of what ABRO does is already obtained from the commercial sector. We are trying to grow that and to give ABRO's work force, wherever they are located, the best possible opportunity in terms of that future. We are some years away from doing what he suggests.

Bob Russell: I thank the Minister for that. Nevertheless, last time I went to the ABRO workshops in Colchester, I saw vehicles having desert camouflage applied, which is not usual for the Colchester garrison area. I assume that there must be a link there.

I should like the Defence Committee to look back at the closure of the clothing and textile research laboratory in Colchester, which will undergo its final death throes in Oxfordshire next week. The world's leading research establishment is being destroyed. I mention that because, when I visited Iraq, personnel raised with me two issues that are small in the grand scale of things but important for the day-to-day well-being of our troops: first, the fatigues with which they are issued are not necessarily the best for a desert climate; secondly, the mattresses with which they were issued have plastic covers. I am not an expert, but I know that, in a hot climate, plastic covers on mattresses are not the best option. Moreover, I have slept in youth hostels and scout huts that are better than some of the accommodation that our young men and women are expected to occupy. These are not temporary camps but have been there for three years.

Mr. Kevan Jones: On the rubber mattresses that the hon. Gentleman mentions, does he accept that the commanding officer knew nothing about that and put it right as soon as it was raised by members of the Committee?

Bob Russell: That proves the power of an all-party delegation to get things sorted just like that.

Something must be done about the transportation of our young men and women back to the UK from Iraq. I cannot speak about Afghanistan because I have not been there, although I hope that the invitation is in the post. A memory that will always stay with me from when we boarded the plane is the sea of faces with people all wearing battle fatigues and looking forward to their return to the UK for one week, two weeks or whatever it was. This was on a chartered holiday flight. That might be all right for a two-hour flight from Gatwick down to Tenerife, but cramming that number of our young men and women into a plane where legroom is at a premium for an eight-hour flight is not the right way to treat them.

Mr. Jones: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it was made worse for the poor individual who had to sit next to him all the way back from Qatar?

Bob Russell: I do not recognise that insult. I am trying to make a serious point. I ask the MOD to consider whether the air transport that it is supplying is appropriate for that number of people over that distance and time.

The entire Committee was immensely proud of our troops. The reason for our presence in Iraq is an issue for another day, but what we saw was impressive and I hope that all hon. Members, irrespective of their views on the Iraq war, will join me in thanking all those young men and women for the marvellous job that they are doing.

5.34 pm

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell). He says that the reason for our presence in Iraq is an issue for another day. That did not stop him making an ill-starred intervention on my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind), who was against the war.

I support the brief but authoritative speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Holloway) on Afghanistan. I shall revert to that in the latter part of my contribution.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) said that linking 9/11 and operations in Iraq was a mistake. It was not a mistake but a deceit, and that is part of the problem. The leaders of the United States and the United Kingdom, who took us into the conflict, perpetrated several other deceits, but that first deceit, most of all, has caused the enormous problems for the liberal west in the whole region.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea made an important and properly learned contribution on Iraq. He reminded me of the view that I took in 2004 when I served on the Select Committee on Defence. On my visit to Iraq, I learned that British and American forces were, even then, as much part of the problem as the solution. If that was the case then, how much more is it the case now, two years on? Our challenge is reconciling an exit from Iraq and trying to sustain the stability of the Iraqi Government, their democratic institutions and the institutions that we are putting in place, with the Iraqi people's perception of us as the occupying powers.

I am not yet satisfied that the penny has dropped with United States forces, or that the rather alarming account of former SAS Trooper Griffin in The Sunday Telegraph last weekend does not continue to represent the mode of operations by United States forces in Iraq. Operating as an occupying force, as though killing Iraqis in Iraq was defending the front line of the United States, sadly appeared to be the rule, not the exception. Former SAS Trooper Griffin's view was that officers who took a different line on their relationship with the Iraqi population were the exception, although there were honourable exceptions.

That account of British forces on joint operations should give us all significant pause for thought. I look forward to the Minister's comments about whether the style of American operations has started to change, giving the Iraqi people the chance of perceiving Americans differently when they leave.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I have had previous discussions with the hon. Gentleman about his views on Iraq. Had he not already written an article for a national newspaper outlining all that he has said in the debate before he set foot in Iraq in 2004? Is not it true that his comments are not based on what he has seen on the ground but his prejudices, which existed before he went? The newspaper article appeared on the Wednesday that we were in Iraq.

Mr. Blunt: The hon. Gentleman is correct about the timing and I am happy to say that what I saw on the ground confirmed my previous assessment. An isolated visit to British troops in heavily restricted conditions in Basra should not take one's eyes off the wider strategic position of taking in all the information from the whole country of Iraq. He saw what I saw on that visit, as we travelled round Basra in the back of armoured vehicles. That was when the situation in Basra was relatively benign, before the threat of improvised explosive devices had become as bad as it is today. I suggest that my article might bear his re-examination.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that the removal by the United States of people, particularly from Afghanistan, to Guantanamo Bay and their treatment there are major causes of unrest throughout the region, especially in Iraq and Afghanistan? Does he agree that the only way forward is the immediate closure of Guantanamo Bay and the immediate acceptance of the role of the International Criminal Court and of international law in general, of which the United States seems to be completely ignorant?

Mr. Blunt rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) will obviously answer that intervention in his own way, but I do not think that we should widen the debate too much.

Mr. Blunt: I am grateful for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The answer to the hon. Gentleman is that I agree with him. There are many major causes of anger against American and British interests, and, sadly, Guantanamo Bay is only one of them. It is just one cause of our problems.

Mr. Ellwood: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Blunt: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I would like to finish my remarks, but if I have time to spare, I will of course give way to him.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham dealt with Afghanistan briefly but with considerable authority. The fact that he has received accounts that people at Permanent Joint Headquarters are now referring to the British forces going to Afghanistan as the "duty targets" gives some indication of the depth of concern and perhaps cynicism about the likely success of that operation.

The estimates that we are considering today are extremely vague, as the Defence Committee pointed out. They refer to £1 billion here or there over three years, for example. The money is vague because the role and the mission are alarmingly vague. There is broad consensus that we are not sending enough troops to deliver the mission that they have been invited to undertake, but the force is also too large to extract easily. My worry is that, as the Americans downscale their operations in Afghanistan, the United Kingdom could be left holding the Afghan baby. The history of Afghanistan for foreign forces is an extremely unhappy one. The Afghan population will not easily be able to differentiate between the British—with our long history of association with Afghanistan, the rules of engagement that apply to our forces and the restraints that we place on them—and the Russians, the Americans and perhaps the British of the 19th century. We will all be lumped together in the same category by the Afghan people.

[Mr. Blunt]

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil (Mr. Havard) spoke of the importance to the soldiers on the ground of civil-military relations, but chose not to dilate on the state of civil-military relations likely to be faced by our troops during their operations in Afghanistan. Our forces are being invited to destroy the method by which most Afghan people earn their money. That method is, admittedly, unacceptable to us, given the huge danger to our constituents and our country, as well as to the whole of Europe, represented by the heroin emanating from Afghanistan. However, if we destroy the Afghan people's main income earner, they are unlikely to be too pleased with our presence, and we shall not easily be able to establish good civil-military relations there. I am worried that our troops will quickly end up behind armour, having to defend themselves from attacks not only from those who are already hostile to us, but from those whom we are about to make hostile. In that sense, we will never be able to achieve during forthcoming operations in Afghanistan, on any basis, the civil-military relations about which the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil was talking.

Mr. Havard: Actually, I am the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney. The hon. Gentleman had better not forget Rhymney, or the people there will be over the hill with blue faces and pointed sticks. Tribalism is something that I know about.

I was not dodging the issue and would be only too happy to debate it with the hon. Gentleman. He is right that it is the key to the whole exercise and I hope that the interdepartmental drug unit and the joined-up approach between various Departments will address some of that. The task is not solely military—in that sense, he is correct—and those relationships are one of the issues that the Defence Committee is considering. He will understand and, I hope, agree that the Afghan people wish to see such relationships, as all the polling suggests.

Mr. Blunt: The hon. Member for Rhymney as well as Merthyr Tydfil has taken a quarter of the time remaining for my speech. I am not the only one concerned about the change in nature of the Afghan people's view of foreign forces. In May 2005, following reports of abuse of Afghan detainees by American forces, the President of Afghanistan said that he feared that popular resentment was building against the international military presence and the Americans in particular. It will be difficult for the Afghan people to differentiate the Americans and us. I saw that the British general in Iraq who was interviewed on "Panorama" the other day was wearing American stars on his uniform. In one sense, I have always been a supporter of inter-operability and operating together, but if our soldiers are putting that on their uniforms so that the Americans know that we are on their side, ordinary Afghan people might be forgiven a greater degree of confusion.

I commend to the House the brief and authoritative speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham, who has considerable knowledge and expertise in this area. I look forward to the report of the Defence Committee on the deployment to Afghanistan. It is extremely important that Members who have knowledge of the scale of the task for the soldiers whom we are sending to Afghanistan warn the House and, through the House, the country at large, of the difficulties that they will face. The House can then come to proper conclusions about the resources that they will require to carry out the role that we have invited them to perform, or whether they should carry out that role at all.

5.47 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): When I first entered the House in 1997, it was not long before the bright, shiny new Labour Government came out with a bright, shiny new Labour foreign policy. That foreign policy was to be an ethical foreign policy. We do not hear too much about that these days, not because we think that our foreign policy is not ethical, but because the experience of office has shown the Government that foreign policy and, by association, defence policy, is often not a matter of positive ethics but of deciding which is the lesser of two evils.

That has been illustrated by a number of speeches today, not least that of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), comparing the differing objectives between wishing to clean up the trade in opium from Afghanistan, and not wishing to forge an alliance between the local farmers who depend on growing opium and the Taliban and other extremists and insurgents who were not normally in any form of prior alliance, but who could be forced into an alliance if we are heavy-handed about achieving the anti-drugs objective. In other words, one must sometimes choose the least worse policy.

That was also implicit in the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) when he said that it looked as if Iraq were ending up with a Government far more pro-Iranian, in terms of the alliance of the two adjacent countries' Governments, than one would ever have wanted. He did not say this explicitly, but I detect an underlying belief that the policy that was followed for years, and subsequently denounced on so many occasions—the policy of supporting Saddam Hussein—was completely unethical, which it probably was. It is likely, however, that when discussions were held in the Foreign Office in his day, the argument would have been, "Yes, but what is the alternative—some sort of axis, nexus or alliance between extremist fundamentalist Governments in adjacent countries?" It is not easy to choose between those two evils.

The point is that a choice between evils must often be made. There is no morally free "get out of jail" clause that can be invoked by those burdened with the responsibility of deciding on a foreign policy or a defence policy in the modern world, which is peopled—as no doubt were the mediaeval and ancient worlds—by some very nasty regimes.

Harry Cohen: I am aware that the Conservatives, with some honourable exceptions, voted for the war in Iraq. Does the hon. Gentleman not agree, however, that that was a war of choice? It was very different from the wars that we had fought previously, especially those that preceded the second world war. At the time of those wars we had a defence policy that was a policy of defence: war was a last resort. Is the hon. Gentleman now declaring himself to be in favour of wars of choice? Does that mean that if—God forbid—the Conservatives ever won an election and the hon. Gentleman arrived on the Government Front Bench, we would be entering into wars of choice throughout the globe?

Dr. Lewis: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not seem to have understood my point, which was that the choices we make often have deleterious consequences, whichever horn of the dilemma we choose. We have to choose the least worse alternative. In the case of Iraq, I believe that the person who chose the war was the person who, having previously mounted an unprovoked and bloody invasion of another UN member country, proceeded to ignore injunctions from the international community—and that was Saddam Hussein.

Saddam Hussein seems to have behaved in a very strange way. If he knew that he did not have weapons of mass destruction, he was certainly sending very unusual and unwise signals to the world. In obstructing the investigations for so long, he was doing all he could to suggest that he had something to hide. I am not at all ashamed of having made the decision that I made to support the war, given the knowledge that we had then. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman—who of course did not support the war—does our forces any favours by expecting those of us who did support it to say, "We're terribly sorry, we were wrong." Decisions can be made only on the basis of the evidence available at the time, and everything about the way in which Saddam's regime was conducting itself indicated that there was something to hide—something that we could not take the chance of letting him have.

I am glad to say that I have, in a way, received an answer to a question asked of me by one of my hon. Friends a few minutes before the debate began. The question was this: given that we would be debating a report on the estimates, to what extent would we be allowed to wander into substantive issues of foreign and defence policy? I am glad that successive occupants of the Chair have allowed that to happen.

The Government's presentation of a skeletal outline amounts to an opportunity lost. The message conveyed by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) and his Select Committee is that there is no earthly reason why the Government, and the Ministry of Defence in particular, should not be a great deal more forthcoming. It has been suggested that one reason for the sketchiness of the information in the estimates is that the Government's vagueness about what policy they will adopt prevents them from being more precise in accounting for the large sums whose expenditure they expect us to approve. As the Committee has pointed out, however, that is given the lie somewhat by repeated indications in correspondence from the Ministry of Defence that in its dealings with the Treasury, the MOD adopts a system very different from that which it adopts in its dealings with the House of Commons.

If it is possible for the MOD to ensure that the Treasury is updated so regularly as the time when the expenditures take place unravels, why is it not possible for it to ensure that the House of Commons is similarly updated? Is it because of security considerations? I think that my right hon. Friend and his Committee have proved themselves time and again to be capable of being taken into the loop when any confidential material needs to be divulged. It is not necessary to argue that the House of Commons as a whole cannot be trusted with the fine detail; in the Select Committee system we have an apparatus that assuredly can.

According to the report, the way in which the MOD has been satisfying the Treasury's requirements suggests that it regards Parliament, by contrast, as something of a rubber stamp. The Committee demanded that the MOD recognise that the agreement of the Treasury is not a substitute for parliamentary approval, and that giving the Treasury information is not enough. This is not just a question of the quantity or detail of the information; it is also a question of the format. I was relieved to read on page 11 of the report, in paragraph 19, the sentence:

"The Supplementary Estimates are very hard to understand by any but the most expert reader."

Amen to that. There was very little in the documents, even after the MOD had had three goes at addressing the problem.

The Government have not been slow in producing many bulky reports during the years in which I have been in the House—enough to depopulate more than one rainforest. Why, when it is a question of spending £1 billion at a time, or more, in adjusting the estimates, are we left with documents as small and scrappy as those appended to the report? Page Ev 7 of the report deals with the MOD's second memorandum. Under the heading "Capital DEL"—departmental expenditure limits—we read:

"The Department's estimate for Capital Expenditure in Request for Resources 2 relates principally to equipment purchased as Urgent Operational Requirements... and accelerated capital repair costs on equipment in operational use."

All that happened was that one line in the original report was "broken down" into two lines in the second report. The Minister nods. I can only assume that if my right hon. Friend and his Committee had persisted day in day out, and week in week out, in trying to elicit more information, they might have been given a substantive account of what the MOD money would be spent on—more or less in time for the estimates after next.

More needs to be done, and one wonders why the MOD is not doing it. The suspicion has to be that a civil service "Secret Squirrel society" mentality leads the Ministry to say, "We mustn't tell these MPs too much about how we're spending the money, because if we give them anything to get their teeth into, those teeth may bite." I am sorry to say to the Minister—a likeable chap whom I greatly admire—that it is the job of MPs to get their teeth into such issues, and sometimes those teeth will indeed bite. Indeed, they occasionally do so on behalf of the common cause that we like to think we make when important defence issues are at stake.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hampshire set the admirable precedent of speaking for only 10 minutes, which is one reason why I am encouraged to be slightly more discursive than I otherwise would have been. Apart from anything else, that showed that he expected all Members present to have read his report, in which everything is set out with great clarity.

[Dr. Lewis]

This is my first opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) on his new post, and I am genuine in doing so. It is a great privilege to be a defence spokesman for one's party, and I am sure that he will perform that role with great awareness of the responsibilities that it entails. He raised pertinent questions about the long-term financial implications of extended counter-insurgency operations. I was particularly pleased to hear him say robustly that we cannot pull out of these commitments in a hurry, because we do not always hear that in this House. We often hear those who do not like the war, and who wish that we had never gone into these countries, describe the way forward as precipitate withdrawal. But whatever one thinks about the circumstances that led to our entering them, precipitate withdrawal would be a disaster for their peoples.

The hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) has shown admirable consistency on this issue before, during and after the war, and in the light of his contribution, we can be sure that anything corrupt ever done by anybody in the United States of America will not escape his attention. However, I was pleased to note that he was, as usual, honest enough to admit that those involved in the examples of corruption and exploitation that he described ended up in jail.

It is a pity that those who are killing and maiming innocent Iraqis—they claim to be their representatives, but in fact they support the murderous regime that was there before—are not in jail, or criticised in the manner that our western Governments who are trying to establish a free and democratic system for Iraq are criticised. It is one thing rightly to point out how many people have been killed in Iraq, but it is a sad omission not to point out that many of them are killed in bomb explosions for which the people who claim to be fighting for Iraqi freedom are responsible—and that the latter could not care less who the victims are, so long as they create mayhem and frustrate attempts to reconstruct Iraq.

Harry Cohen: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is being much too pious. Through one of its biggest operations in Iraq, the United States is now doing a mass slaughter job. He has also forgotten about other US attacks, such as that on Falluja. I condemn atrocities and killing on all sides; I wish that he would do the same.

Dr. Lewis: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I have barely begun to be pious; I have a lot more piety left in me. In referring to Falluja, he has reminded me of the report that says that after the attack on Falluja, al-Zarqawi was in the hands of American forces but unfortunately was not recognised and was allowed to go free. I am happy to acknowledge that that was a failure—but had he been recognised and not been allowed to go free, that operation would have been justified by his capture alone.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea spoke with massive authority, and although I do not agree with him on this occasion, it is always an intellectual treat and an object lesson to hear him present his case. I was slightly surprised at the rather strict criteria that he applied to the basis for military interventions. He said that they should happen only when a country is attacked, or where a treaty with another country triggers us to go to war. I was surprised that he did not also mention the newer criterion of humanitarian intervention, although I would not argue that it was cited in the case of Afghanistan or Iraq.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind: I did in fact mention a third consideration that might justify war: when there is a sufficient degree of international support, through the United Nations Security Council or even some other method, to give legitimacy to action that would otherwise not be defensible.

Dr. Lewis: That is exactly what my right hon. and learned Friend said, but he did not say that when the country in question is not being attacked or about to be attacked—be it one's own country or a country for which one has responsibility—there is a newer, more debateable criterion: that a humanitarian disaster is unfolding in that country. I am sure that he had that in mind in outlining his third criterion, but he did not mention it. I make that point because it illustrates that international law is not set in stone; it evolves as time goes on.

We have to recognise that the threat currently faced by western countries is so irregular and so unmindful of existing laws and conventions—indeed, those responsible for that threat deliberately set out to flout them—and so new, involving as it does the existence not only of weapons of mass destruction but of groups who, if they got their hands on those weapons, would unhesitatingly use them, that international law may need reviewing. Those who do not recognise that point presumably argue that in no circumstances should we intervene—not even if the country in question makes the most reckless and bellicose pronouncements, and not even if there is high-grade intelligence suggesting that its Government are about to acquire weapons that could well be passed to groups that would unhesitatingly use them.

That was the basis on which the Prime Minister convinced the House of Commons that we needed to act, and at that time Ministers had good reason to believe that that was the true situation. I only regret that certain notorious spin doctors were allowed to over-egg the pudding. The lesson of history is that if we are honest with the British people about the limitations and content of our knowledge they will trust us, and that we betray that trust at our peril.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I am listening to the hon. Gentleman very closely. He made the case for a pre-emptive strike where there is an imminent threat, but he seemed then to wander away from that, almost implying that a case exists for pre-emptive strikes in general. Does he think that such a case could be made in respect of Iran?

Dr. Lewis: What I am saying is that there are conceivable circumstances in which military action might be necessary even if a threat was not imminent, if a country that was not bound by the normal conventions, understandings and value systems of the international community were about to acquire mass destruction weapons. I do not think that, under the existing narrow interpretation of international law, such a situation would count as an imminent threat. I say quite clearly that I believe that there are some circumstances in which some regimes should be prevented from acquiring weapons of mass destruction. I make no apology for saying that—and particularly not to the hon. Gentleman, who came late to the debate, although I was delighted to take his intervention.

I will conclude my remarks by making a couple of brief references to the other contributors. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard) made a strong defence of Parliament having its say, even when it can be embarrassing to one's own side. My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Holloway) made a strong point about the apparently conflicting motives of our strategy in Afghanistan, but I have referred to that already. In support of what he said, I draw the House's attention to an article in today's Financial Times, "Afghan officials face public fury as farm aid fails to materialise". It refers to one of the more northerly provinces and quotes the district governor in that impoverished area as saying:

"It would have been far better if we had promised nothing and simply told villagers that growing opium is against the law".

The disappointment that has arisen in that part of Afghanistan at the failure of compensation for not growing opium to arrive is clearly proving a source of grave irritation, friction and potential danger for our forces.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) took the radical view that a process of managed partition—what he called a velvet revolution—might be the answer to the situation in Iraq. I commend him for persevering with a view that at present may seem unorthodox. The strange thing is that solutions that start out by seeming unorthodox sometimes end up being adopted and vindicated in the future.

The hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell), as always, spoke up for the Army units based in his constituency. Again, he took the very robust view that we should stay as long as the Iraqi Government want us to. I have already referred in suitably complimentary terms to the excellent contribution by my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate.

In conclusion, the Committee has done a great service to the House of Commons, both by putting the Ministry of Defence on the spot about the inadequacy of the detail with which the estimates have been put forward and also, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea pointed out, by giving us an opportunity to debate some of the substantive issues that the Government have not been in a hurry to bring to the Floor of the House, at least since the general election. The Government should have the courage of their convictions. There is nothing to be afraid of in airing these matters in the House of Commons. Various Labour Members have debated them time and again when the opportunity has arisen. We debate these matters without rancour. We do not always come to an agreement, but at least we agree that the opportunity for a debate provides the best possible way of allowing an intelligent electorate to make up their minds.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Any debate that has the word "defence" in it usually ends up being wide ranging and the situation is no different today. We have covered quite a gamut of subjects, but there has been a core to the debate. I will do my best to reply to all the points that have been raised. It is always useful in a winding-up speech to be able to say, "If time permits," but I am conscious of the fact that there is quite a lot of time available, which will mean that I may have to expand on some answers because I do not have answers to other points.

Let me just make this point in passing to the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot), who opened the debate. It was not long ago that he was a Minister. I suppose that if he had laid down new reporting procedures for the Department when he was there, this debate would be taking place in a different context. Only he can say why he did not think it necessary at the time to push for that. However, the Committee has raised issues that have provoked debate on matters of interest, which I will seek to address—perhaps not wholly satisfactorily today, but I will indicate the way forward on that. I also thank him for the considered way in which he opened the debate. He could have taken longer, as it turned out, and helped me by leaving a shorter time for my winding-up speech. His favourable comments on the role of the Defence Procurement Agency—there is also the Defence Logistics Organisation, which he did not mention—in the processing of urgent operational requirements were well made. Those organisations work extremely hard. The issue is not just about those who are seeking to purchase; as he knows only too well, it is also about those who are seeking to deliver. Sometimes the industry is in-house, sometimes it is external, but it really delivers for us in these times of urgent need. I will deal with the key elements of the report.

I want to deal with two major contributions, although I will try to deal with all the contributions. I welcome the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) to his new role. This is a more substantial debate than he experienced in his early introduction to that role. He should keep a close eye on the Order Paper because he is likely to be busy in the period ahead and he may reflect on why he took on such a task. I do not underestimate the massive learning curve experienced by all of us who become engaged in defence, but if that means that there is an opportunity to score political points off him, I will. I was not clear whether he supports the expenditure that we are now committing to the conflict in Iraq.

Nick Harvey indicated assent.

Mr. Ingram: That is very helpful. At least we have the support of the hon. Gentleman's party for what we seek to do at present.

The hon. Gentleman raised questions about reconstruction costs in Iraq and expenditure intentions for Afghanistan in matters relating to counter-narcotics. Some of that does not sit within the estimates, as I am sure that he will appreciate. I will deal with that in a moment. He mentioned the allied rapid recruitment force. Just for the record, it is the Allied Rapid Reaction Corps—that is the first lesson on defence. We all get our words mixed up sometimes, but it is important to get that corrected.

Reconstruction in Iraq is continuing. It is not an easy territory or environment to achieve that in, because of the level of threat and the malign efforts of those who are trying to destroy not just what the coalition are seeking to do for the Iraqi people, but what the Iraqi people are trying to do for themselves. There is regular sabotage of both power lines and pipelines. A lot of effort is put in to deal with that. Hopefully, more progress will be made in the period ahead.

There is a growing economy. It is not, in one sense, an economy in free fall. There are indications of growth in the economy, but it should be much more rapid given the oil wealth. Insurgents and those who are trying to destroy what we seek to do attack power lines because that stops the oil industry's capacity to produce. They attack the oil industry itself for the same reason. There are measurable improvements in water and sanitation systems and schools and hospitals have been constructed. So, there are ways in which we can measure progress.

Harry Cohen: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: No, I am going to deal with this point first. I will come to what my hon. Friend said and perhaps he can intervene then.

The Government have pledged a total of £544 million for reconstruction during 2003 to 2006. More than £460 million has been disbursed to date. That is a considerable effort. In a sense, I do not take the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) that a lot of that money may be misappropriated or deliberately taken away by those intent on malfeasance. There might be examples of that happening, but it is not a feature of our accounting practices and the way in which we try to deliver.

When my hon. Friend raises a question about such activity, he is casting an aspersion not on military people, but, in the main, on civilian people who face daily risks when trying to deliver the reconstruction effort in troubled parts of Iraq. Putting all that in context is worth while. The hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) asked my hon. Friend whether he ever made favourable comments about our armed forces. I heard my hon. Friend's response, but hope that he also realises that many brave civilians are making an amazing effort to deliver such reconstruction.

Harry Cohen: I am astonished by the Minister's last comment. He is saying that because people are taking risks as civilian contractors, it is all right for them to do a bit a malfeasance. I do not think that it is, so he should reflect on his comments.

The Minister makes a point about reconstruction. Let me remind him of the point in the New Statesman about hospital supplies that I cited in my speech. Iraqis do not need to be involved in the production of medical equipment and basic supplies for hospitals. We could have just shipped them in, flight after flight, on our Hercules airplanes. We could have sent mass supplies to equip the hospitals properly. Why have we not done so?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman's intervention must be brief.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend of course completely misconstrued what I was saying. I was not in any way justifying any wrongdoing on the part of people who have their hands on public money in Iraq or anywhere else. I was saying that a balance must be struck when analysing the situation. My hon. Friend made severe criticisms without putting balance to them, so I was merely putting forward such balance. I noted that he still did not congratulate those civilians on all that they are doing to help to reconstruct Iraq.

Let me return to the points made by the hon. Member for North Devon. There are infrastructure projects worth £30 million in south-east Iraq. There are power infrastructure projects worth £40 million and there is £6.5 million for employment generation. There is £20.5 million for strengthening the operating capacity of the four southern governorates and to encourage private sector growth. Considerable progress is thus being made. However, those significant contributions are part of the contributions made by other Government Departments.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the capability of the Taliban and the way in which we measure that in Afghanistan. I said when I gave evidence to the Defence Committee that that capacity is difficult to measure because whoever is paying some of those who are likely to mount attacks on any given day determines the uniform that they will put on and the cause for which they will fight. We are trying to get the best intelligence that we can. Our assessment of the situation is that illegally-armed groups are limited. We do not believe that they pose a strategic threat, although we are not saying that what we are doing in Afghanistan is without risk.

The fact that the insurgency tactics have changed suggests that the groups are failing to make headway. However, of course, we cannot be complacent. We must take the view that the tempo of attacks might go down, stay the same, or go up, which is why such a powerful and potent international force is going into Helmand. We treat threats seriously and take every step to ensure that British forces deployed in Afghanistan are well prepared. Intelligence on what is happening on the ground is critical to that, so we put a lot of effort into it.

On counter-narcotics, we intend to spend more than £270 million in the financial years 2005–06, 2006–07 and 2007–08 in support of what we call the Afghan strategy. That includes £130 million of Department for International Development assistance that is aimed at creating alternative livelihoods. Between £20 million and £30 million will be going to specific projects in Helmand. We have a significant programme of work to address alternative livelihoods, and although others will also put in resources, only time will tell whether that is sufficient.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead asked whether we were getting good value for our money in Iraq. He should ask the Kurds and Shi'as who were systematically crushed and brutalised by Saddam Hussein and his barbaric regime. Is it worth it to remove tyranny? I think that it is. Is it worth it to give freedom to oppressed people? I think so. There is no question in my mind about what we are doing in Iraq. I think that the continuing price that is being paid for stabilising and bringing freedom to Iraq is worth it, but clearly my hon. Friend has a different view. The way in which he deals with that is a matter for him. I shall address other hon. Members' contributions later, but I wanted to talk about those made by the hon. Member for North Devon and my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead first.

The debate takes place against the background of the continuing activity of our armed forces in both Iraq and Afghanistan. I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the courage, commitment and professionalism of our armed forces serving in Iraq and Afghanistan in what are often difficult and dangerous circumstances—I know that the whole House will agree. However, as this is an estimates day, I had better make some progress by saying something about finance. The Ministry of Defence is seeking £2 billion in additional resources in the spring supplementary estimate. Just under £1.4 billion of that is for conflict prevention work, including almost £1.1 billion for Iraq and £220 million for Afghanistan.

Let me turn to the Defence Committee's report because it forms the basis of the debate and major contributions have been made on it. The report made nine conclusions and recommendations, and I would like to deal with each of them in turn. The Committee questioned the level of contingency built into the estimates in relation to conflict prevention. The contingency is there for a very good reason: prudence. Paragraph 8 of the Committee's report recognises that it is necessary to be prudent when dealing with contingency. My Department has to forecast the costs of a rapidly changing operational situation, so the inclusion of a contingency is wholly justified. To put the contingency in context, since last November, business cases totalling well over £100 million have been approved under urgent operational requirement procedures for a range of equipment that is required for both Iraq and Afghanistan, although not all that money will be spent in this year. I know that the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire will understand that although a business case might be made and one might want to proceed, things do not necessarily happen in the financial year that has been suggested. That can lead to spill-over, so a contingency is important.

Mr. Arbuthnot: It was not the inclusion of a contingency that caused us concern, but the inclusion of a contingency without full supporting detail.

Mr. Ingram: I have explained some of the rationale behind that. The report recognises that some things might not be played out publicly because of such good reasons as operational considerations. It is not wise to state everything that we are doing to improve our equipment and capability in response to a specific threat. The scale of the £146 million contingency has been referred to, and I have already given an indication about the £100 million aspect of the budget. It would be difficult to give full granularity because although one can put forward a contingency, what is wanted might not materialise. Of course, if the money is not spent, the financial resource is not delivered. Over time, as specific urgent operational requirements have arisen, we have, when there has been no operational sensitivity, indicated what the requirements involve.

Recommendation 2 claims that the MOD did not take the previous Defence Committee recommendations seriously: I do not accept that. We have produced significantly more information this year than in any previous year in the estimates memorandum. The new information includes the inclusion of tables of figures that break down the detail of each request for resource; detail of transfers to and from other Departments; a detailed breakdown of provisions and, importantly, a published audit trail of changes since the main estimates. There is much more explanation and clarity than in previous years, but we have to seek to go further still and we will reflect on the points that have been made in the report.

We are planning to provide more detailed information on the cost of operations in our annual report and accounts, which is the appropriate place to do so. That information will be comparable to the level of detail we have recently provided to the Committee, and I hope that that finds favour with the House.

The fourth conclusion and recommendation made by the Committee was that agreement of the Treasury is not a substitute for parliamentary approval. I could not agree more and I am sure that the Treasury would also agree. But we would hardly seek Parliament's approval to spend money without having closely consulted the Treasury in advance. I have been closely involved in such matters for several years, with the MOD and a previous Department and I know that the Treasury has a very important role to play in the tight scrutiny of departmental requests.

The reality is that we have to convince the Treasury before embarking on any significant course of action. That is part of the discipline within government. We have to justify our accounting processes, and ensure that they are sound. They must form part of the Government's mission and we must ensure that we have sufficient resources to achieve that mission. The process of consultation with the Treasury is a very important element of the work of all Departments. Indeed, I do not think that the Committee is arguing against such scrutiny by the Treasury. We have provided more information to Parliament this year than we have done before, and where we can, we will seek to improve further.

The Committee recommends that our practice of waiting for the spring supplementary estimates to request funds for commenced operations should cease and recommends that they are requested in the main estimates. It has been the practice that that request has been made in the supplementary estimates. That has been the traditional approach because costs are difficult to forecast in fast moving operational circumstances. My Department works hard to ensure that the figures presented to Parliament are reliable, and supplementary estimates are the first occasion on which we can reach a reasonably firm conclusion. However, we will look closely at the Committee's recommendation in consultation with the Treasury.

On recommendation 6, the Government have never routinely published operations expenditure data in-year, as the Committee requests. We provide an estimate based on the forecast of the cost of operations in the supplementary estimates. At the end of each year, the actual expenditure is audited by the National Audit Office, and then published in the annual report and accounts. As I have already said, we will be publishing more detail in this year's accounts. We are trying to obtain the best information and ensure its substance so that we can be properly judged, instead of providing the working figures for the MOD and the Treasury.

[Mr. Ingram]

Recommendation 7 relates to the provision for operations in the Balkans in the main estimates. That is £64 million for the current financial year. Provision for operations in the Balkans comes from what is known as the global conflict prevention pool. Pool funding ensures that no single Department becomes liable for those costs. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has always been the lead Department for administering the funds, and requests funding in its estimates on behalf of all the pool members. We make a contribution to the discussion on the collective amount that should be sought. We will consult the other Departments involved on the impact that making the recommended change would have on the long-established collective conflict prevention management arrangements, but I believe that the system we have works well. I am prepared to consider the point, but the current arrangements are clear. If we could do it another way, and the other Departments agree, we will come back to that issue.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: Well, I wish to make some progress now. I may get the chance later to allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene.

Let me turn to the costs of Afghanistan and recommendation 8. On 26 January, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced that some £1 billion would be spent on Afghanistan, which includes the £220 million being requested in this estimate. A breakdown of that was provided to the Committee at its request, the major elements of which are £121 million on infrastructure, stock equipment and the support items needed by our troops to carry out their daily duties, and £53 million on capital equipment relating to force protection. Those are the headline items, but the list also includes £150 million for resource expenditure and £70 million for capital expenditure. Resource costs include manpower-related costs of £8 million pounds, infrastructure costs of £26 million, equipment support of £15 million, stock consumption of £34 million, general costs—including food, fuel and movement costs—of £46 million and a contingency of £14 million to cover uncertainties over the planned expansion programme.

The major elements of capital costs are the urgent operational requirement and equipment support costs of £53 million and a contingency of £17 million. Costs for future years are more difficult to forecast and the Department works hard to ensure that the figures presented to Parliament are reliable. It must be our main purpose to provide reliable data—not working figures—so that we can be held to account effectively. Supplementary estimates are the first occasion on which the Department can reach a reasonably firm conclusion. I spent 10 years in opposition—

Dr. Julian Lewis: Tough!

Mr. Ingram: Well, the hon. Gentleman had better get used to tough times. I would have thought that the Committee and Parliament would have preferred hard figures rather than notional ones, on which to base their assessments.

My final point on the Committee's report is that the MOD has this year followed the scrutiny unit's guidance in producing the estimates memorandums. They were approved by Ministers and the accounting officer before being passed to the Committee. I understand that the document was not signed off, but that does not mean that it was not properly authorised. Paragraph 19 of the report makes a number of assertions that I believe are not based on fact. The Department's estimates memorandums included details on the summary of changes since the previous estimate, the most significant changes, a detailed explanation of the changes, the net additional cash required and the provisions and contingent liabilities.

On the point about end-of-year flexibility made in recommendation 9, my Department drew down end-of-year flexibility of £71.7 million in resource departmental expenditure limits—DEL—and £28.3 million in capital DEL in the winter supplementary estimates, and those figures have not changed. I have gone through some of the detailed changes and I will consider the recommendations to see whether we can proceed in other ways. Probably only two or three people who have participated in the debate have read the report through, although others will claim that that is not the case, and I have tried to answer the detailed points made.

I come now to some of the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard). He was clear in his support for our people in Iraq and Afghanistan. He raised several equipment-related issues and the threat posed to our personnel as a consequence. The balance of risk is always factored in, in terms of force lay down. I appreciate that my hon. Friend has occasionally worn uniform when taking part in the armed forces parliamentary scheme, but on this occasion I shall stick with the advice given to me and the Secretary of State by our senior military planners and the Chiefs of Staff. However, I thank my hon. Friend for his support.

I made notes while the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind) was speaking, but his hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) quietly laid to rest some of the basis on which the right hon. and learned Gentleman advanced his cause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that there was no international legitimacy for going to war in Iraq, but he ignores the 17 resolutions that sought to bring Saddam Hussein to book. I think that he ignores the fact that every major country was of the view that Saddam Hussein had the capacity and the intention to develop weapons of mass destruction; not one country, or their intelligence services, took a different view.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman also ignores United Nations Security Council resolution 1441, which was unanimously adopted and clearly indicated that there would be consequences for non-compliance. I think he was arguing that members of the UN should have a veto on the course of action that we and other countries should take, but that is a dangerous approach, which would mean that we were constrained by the geo-political interests of our allies—those interests, rather than those we consider important, would be uppermost.

I could not work out the logic of the position taken by the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Holloway). Was he saying that we should not encourage or help the Government of Afghanistan in their aim of reducing poppy cultivation? Clearly, we should do so, but the hon. Gentleman offered no solution to the problem. I have set out the amount we are spending on alternative livelihoods and we know that the Afghans are putting in significant effort. There are risks but we have to continue. The hon. Gentleman offered no alternative approach.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) said that it was a mistake to ignore calls for a broader coalition to deal with Saddam Hussein. However, the coalition of the willing was 32 countries-strong at the outset and increased shortly thereafter. There was a broad coalition for taking on Saddam Hussein; not every nation allied itself to it, but there was a significant combination of countries. The hon. Gentleman said that it was right to deal with Saddam Hussein, so in that case what more could have been done than our Prime Minister did? He made extreme efforts to try to ensure that there was unanimous support in the Security Council, but it was not forthcoming. As I pointed out to the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea, there were 17 UN Security Council resolutions over 12 years, and UNSCR 1441 was specific in its analysis of the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's regime.

The hon. Gentleman called for the managed partition of Iraq, which is territory we have covered before. He alluded to a previous debate in which a similar solution had been proposed for Afghanistan. He recovered himself a bit by saying that it was for the people in those countries to come to that conclusion, but he seemed to be indicating that, in the case of Iraq, we should encourage them to do so. I do not believe that it would be beneficial to fragment Iraq at this juncture, although at some point in the future it may be. As I commented recently when giving evidence to the Select Committee, we are still a United Kingdom, but the people of the country's constituent parts can determine their future—whether in Northern Ireland, Wales or Scotland. It is a matter for the people to decide.

Mr. Ellwood: I pose again the question that I put in the debate. At present, between 60 and 70 people are being killed every day and Iraq is heading towards civil war. How many more people need to die every day before the Minister wakes up and agrees that the country is heading towards civil war?

Mr. Ingram: There has been much analysis of that point and although I recognise the hon. Gentleman's military background and experience, his view is not the received wisdom and considered opinion of senior military personnel on the ground. I am not saying that there are not serious issues of sectarian violence and divisions in Iraq, but as my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones)—who is no longer in the Chamber—commented, what we read in the press is not typical of the whole of Iraq. There are serious hot spots and some big issues to address, but they are not typical of the whole country. The more those situations are talked up, the more we feed the insurgency. I do not believe that the descriptions are valid, but the more we use such language, the more the insurgents will believe that they are winning. They will escalate their efforts because they think that our will is broken. Such talk is dangerous, although people should express their views if they honestly believe them, but they should be balanced against other advice and opinions. If the situation descends to civil war, we shall have to deal with it accordingly, but we are not in that position yet and every effort will be made, with the will of the Iraqi people, to avoid it.

The hon. Member for Colchester noted, rightly, that on his recent visit morale was high. To read some newspapers, it would seem that our British Army is a broken force and that our forces are not interested and are leaving in droves. That is simply not the case. As I have said before, at the Dispatch Box and elsewhere, I am privileged because, due to the nature of my job, I probably meet more members of Her Majesty's armed forces than any other Member. Indeed, I probably meet more of our armed forces than some senior officers, given their roles. The morale of our forces is consistently high; they are extremely committed. Yes, they complain about some aspects of their kit, but that is not a fundamental issue. Any member of Her Majesty's armed forces will say that the current operational welfare package is considerably better than its predecessor. We learned lessons. We knew that we had to adapt and we are committing considerable resources to that element.

The hon. Gentleman made a point about air transportation. As he is aware, the fleet employed for that purpose is ageing. We are trying to ensure that alternative aircraft are available, because it is wrong that forces being recovered from theatre for rest and recreation are unduly delayed—they should not be delayed at all. The point is well taken in the Army and in the RAF, which supplies the logistics. Much effort is being put in.

The hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) is no longer in the Chamber, but he advised me earlier that he had another commitment. He raised many concerns about the style of US operations. However, the US has taken the full brunt of the insurgency and the foreign elements in Iraq, although that is not to say that we have not tackled major issues head-on. We have and, sadly, we have lost a significant number of people in such actions. I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that it is accepted that the immediate post-conflict and reconstruction process has not been well handled. Lessons have been learned, although we cannot recover what should have been done in the past. We can only learn the lessons and ensure that we make considerable progress from now on. That is why I gave details about the amounts that we were spending on the reconstruction and renewal of Iraq. The US is also spending considerable sums.

We should pay tribute to the US for all that it does to help to bring freedom, stability and democracy to so many parts of our troubled world. We should not forget the role of the Americans in the Balkans and Kosovo—and in Afghanistan, where they are determined to rip out the vestiges of al-Qaeda. If the Americans were not doing that, who would? Who would take on global terrorism if not the US, with us giving significant support? If that was not done, we can be sure of one thing—global terrorist groupings would grow and threaten our very way of life. They will not go away; it is not domestic terrorism, but a global terrorist threat that has to be tackled at the point of threat. We cannot wait for the next attack before winning public opinion to our side, although that is required. We have to make sure that we are tackling the threat with vigour.

I think that the hon. Member for Reigate was too quick to condemn the US and I ask him to reflect on his position. He said that the Afghan mission was vague, but the mission of UK forces in Afghanistan is clear: to support the Government of Afghanistan in extending its authority across the country. We are part of an unprecedented international intervention, UN mandated and NATO led, working alongside Canada, the Netherlands, the United States, Denmark, Romania, Australia and Estonia in the south, and many other nations elsewhere in Afghanistan including France, Germany, Italy, Spain and the Nordic countries. We should also bear in mind the growing capability of the Afghan national army. NATO has a detailed operational plan, which sets out precisely what NATO forces need to achieve in Afghanistan. All of that takes place in the context of the much wider international effort building on the success of the Bonn process and marked out comprehensively in the Afghanistan compact agreed at the London conference in January this year.

The mission in Afghanistan is demanding a lot of us, but I repeat the question that I asked a few moments ago. Some argue that we should not do it, or that we do not have sufficient resources for the task—I do not agree; it is part of a wider international effort in support of the Afghan national army—but what would it mean if we were not there? What would that mean for this country? I think that it would be extremely serious if Afghanistan descended back into an ungoverned state.

I found myself agreeing with much of what the hon. Member for New Forest, East said, although I will not tell him which parts of his speech I agreed with and which I did not. As ever, he made a thoughtful contribution. I share his view that it is Parliament's role to hold the Government to account. We have had a brief but wide-ranging debate, and I have tried to deal with the key issues on which the debate is based. I hope that the House will agree that I have responded in a reasonable, helpful and constructive way. Only time will tell.

Question deferred, pursuant to Standing Order No. 54(4) and (5) (Consideration of estimates &c.) and Order [9 March].

Department of Health

[Relevant documents: Oral and written evidence taken by the Health Committee on 1st and 6th December 2005, HC 736-i, -ii, and iii, on Public Expenditure on Health and Personal Social Services 2005; and The Department of Health Departmental Report 2005, Cm 6524.]

This Estimate is to be considered in so far as it relates to NHS financial deficits (Resolution of 16th March).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the year ending with 31st March 2006, for expenditure by the Department of Health—

(1) further resources, not exceeding £1,785,769,000, be authorised for use as set out in HC 827,

(2) a further sum, not exceeding £2,364,998,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to meet the costs as so set out, and

(3) limits as so set out be set on appropriations in aid.—[Jane Kennedy.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I advise all right hon. and hon. Members that after the first speech, there will be a 10-minute limit on all Back-Bench speeches.

6.52 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): First, I congratulate the Committee Office scrutiny unit on its good work on advising Members.

Today's is a timely debate, given that a number of trusts face severe financial deficits. The Department of Health spring supplementary estimate includes large sums—more than £500 million of public dividend capital, including more than £195 million year end flexibility—to increase the loan capital to national health service trusts and primary care trusts. Those sums are in addition to the £200 million requested in the winter supplementary estimate for 2005–06. We are therefore discussing a considerable amount of money in addition to the substantial increase in health care expenditure in this country that has been going on for four or five years under the Labour Government.

The expected NHS deficits are attracting a great deal of press comment. People coming from another planet would wonder how some of the trusts have incurred such massive overspends given that there have been large increases in health budgets for many years now. In the Opposition day debate last November, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said:

"the reason why there are deficits in a minority of trusts is that, in some cases, there has been overspending, sometimes for several years, or poor financial management, or poor organisation of clinical services."

She continued:

"We are taking the steps needed to reduce the overall deficit this year and to ensure that, at the end of the next financial year, the NHS will again be in balance."—[Official Report, 15 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 850.]

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): I agree with the right hon. Gentleman on that point, but is he aware that 87 per cent. of the increase this year has been spent on meeting increased cost pressures? If costs in the NHS continue to increase at their present rate, the deficit by 2010 will exceed £7 billion. How does he envisage the Government tackling that problem?

Mr. Barron: I have several questions on NHS costs to put to the Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy). Some hon. Members may have read my recent comments in the press on the fact that we know what the NHS spends, but not what it costs. I think that, after 58 years, we ought to know exactly what it costs. I shall go into detail on that issue later.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): May I challenge the figure given by the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames)? I agree that the sum is substantial, but that figure cannot be correct. At least 20 per cent. of the increased spending on the NHS is going on new staff and staff in new posts, which is delivering a wider range of services. It cannot possibly be the case that 87 per cent. of the increase is somehow being spent on inflation.

Mr. Barron: My hon. Friend is probably right. I have never looked at costs in detail, but we know that NHS inflation is higher than ordinary inflation in our economy. Perhaps the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex will speak during the debate and tell us how he arrived at that figure.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman share my concern that strategic health authorities and PCTs trying to remove the deficits will seek soft targets for cuts and that that will put even more pressure on hospice budgets? The average children's hospice gets only 5 per cent. of the funding it needs from those sources, and Little Havens in my constituency gets only 1.8 per cent. Will he do all he can through his Committee to bring pressure to bear on the Government to tackle the hospice funding formula?

Mr. Barron: I heard the hon. Gentleman's question during Prime Minister's Question Time last week and I am with him on that issue. The Bluebell Wood children's hospice is being built in my constituency, so I shall have an even greater constituency interest in years to come. However, I would be misleading the House if I were to say that my Committee is likely to look into children's hospice funding in the next few months.

It is striking that there was no warning of the deficits. Last year, on a budget of £67 billion, there was a deficit of just £250 million. When they gave evidence to the Health Committee on 1 December last year, the former permanent secretary at the Department and the then NHS chief executive, Sir Nigel Crisp, told us:

"The actual overall deficit in gross terms, in proportion terms, is pretty small".

Perhaps so, but the House will have seen that when he left his post earlier this month, he was quoted in the press as saying:

"The deficits are clearly going to be too big, and I'm sorry we are going through a bad patch."

I think that most of us who know Sir Nigel will congratulate him on his retirement and hope that it is a long and happy one. I do not know whether he will make it into the other place, but during the few short months that he and I were involved on the Health Committee, I regarded him as a good professional. I wish him well in whatever he does in the future.

In 2004–05, the NHS overspent by just £250 million—the first time that it had overspent since 1999–2000. That was reported by the NHS director of finance in his January 2006 report to the Secretary of State for Health. The director of finance emphasised that the overspend was small in relation to the overall sum managed, but said that it was still a cause for concern. He highlighted three reasons for that concern. First,

"there was a significant deterioration between financial forecasts and" financial outturn. Secondly,

"in some of the organisations with the largest deficits recovery plans were not delivering".

Thirdly, the overspend

"was arising at a time of . . . sustained growth in resources".

In some ways, everyone was surprised by such a large increase in deficits. The financial director also reported that

"despite the action taken, we were still seeing no improvement in the financial position"

"deficits for 2005–06 of £623 million net and £948 million gross."

Those comments were made in the "Financial Turnaround in the NHS" report published in January. That represents an overall increase in the deficit of 150 per cent. on the £250 million deficit reported in 2004–05. That increased deficit threatens to destabilise the NHS, so we must control it. I am a great believer in the national health service—I always have been, and I always will be—but we will lose out if we do not gain control and find out what it costs to provide services for our constituents. The only way to do that is to ensure that bottom-line balances at the end of each year for all NHS trusts give a true and accurate picture of the level of activity and are not fictitious figures. Sadly, on occasion, people who have overspent have wanted to hide that fact by submitting fictitious figures.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): In his deliberations in Committee, has the right hon. Gentleman encountered a reluctance by the Government to engage with the Audit Commission, which wishes to establish exactly what the costs and out-turn are? Does he surmise that that reluctance is because the Government do not want to expose the fact that the directives, edicts and targets that they have issued have created problems for Chase Farm hospital in my constituency, for example, which has been pressurised to dismantle its accident and emergency facilities?

Mr. Barron: The Government cannot avoid the Audit Commission, which has a statutory role. I shall deal briefly with the work of the Audit Commission in the past few months, but I advise the hon. Gentleman not to turn around and say that he knows the reasons for the overspend. Most people do not know the reasons—I shall deal with that later—and the situation is not as simple as he suggests.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman said that we should not seek to disguise or obscure the nature of the deficits, and I entirely agree. Does he therefore agree that it is important to focus on gross deficits? It is not good enough simply to talk about net deficits. Last year, as he said, there were gross deficits of £623 million. This year, as of month 6, they were nearly £1 billion. It will not do for Ministers to tell the House, as they have in the past, that the net deficits will be the same as they were the previous year when, only three weeks later, they admit that the gross deficits cited in our debate in mid-November of nearly £1 billion were accurate.

Mr. Barron: I agree that we need an open and honest debate. The greatest problem for the NHS, certainly since I have been a Member of Parliament, is the fact that it is treated as a political football. It appears in everyone's manifesto, and it is kicked around almost every day in the House. I am not suggesting that Ministers in the present Government have done this, but Conservative Ministers did not want to advertise certain issues, as they knew that they would be magnified and turned over by the press. As a result, we do not have sensible debates on health care, but it is about time that we did.

The report that I cited earlier says that 28 PCTs with a combined turnover of £5.6 billion were forecasting a deficit of £264 million, or just 4 per cent. Thirty-four NHS trusts with a combined turnover of £6.5 billion were forecasting a deficit of £467 million, or 7 per cent. That excludes foundation trust hospitals. Analysis by accountants KPMG showed that 18 organisations required urgent intervention and that 23 needed additional expertise and/or resources. It is not clear from the report whether such interventions and additional resources are helping to turn around trusts' finances.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): Is not one thing that the report highlights the effect of change, which can create huge cost differences? Frimley Park hospital, a foundation hospital that serves my constituency of North-East Hampshire, has hugely increased the costs that it charges to my primary care trust. As a result, the hospital will end up with a £17 million surplus, whereas my primary care trust has a huge deficit. Is it not that change that we need to address in our debate?

Mr. Barron: Yes, but I do not think that it is a structural issue. The cost charged to the PCT may not be the cost of the activity itself. That is a crucial issue for the NHS.

Monitor—the independent regulator of NHS foundation trusts—identified the fact that NHS foundation trusts incurred an aggregate deficit of £36.9 million in 2004–05, which represented 0.9 per cent. of their income. This year, one in every 32 trusts is forecast to incur a substantial deficit for the first six months of 2005–06, although in aggregate trusts forecast a surplus for 2005–06. However, that forecast carried heavy caveats in Monitor's report, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. No doubt hon. Members will wish to look at it, as it deals with the issues raised by the right hon. Gentleman. We need to know how foundation trusts with a large increase in income have achieved that balance.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): On PCTs and foundation trusts, is there any variation in the position of PCTs depending on whether they predominantly serve foundation trusts?

Mr. Barron: That has not been brought to my notice, but I hope that it will not be long before the House has a chance to debate the causes of the deficits.

Another serious concern is the number of reports in the public interest issued by the Audit Commission to acute trusts, strategic health authorities and PCTs following significant financial problems. The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) raised that earlier, but has now left the Chamber, presumably to issue a press release. Under section 8 of the Audit Commission Act 1998, the external auditor must consider whether it is in the public interest to produce a report on any significant matters that come to his attention. If it is, they are set out in a public interest report. Twenty-seven public interest reports have been issued for SHAs, PCTs and NHS trusts since March last year, which reflects the number of NHS bodies with significant and potentially destabilising financial problems. No matter what people say, the Government cannot avoid the Audit Commission which, like some parliamentary Committees, exists to look at public expenditure. I am sure that it will do the competent and professional job that it has done in the past.

A number of reasons have been given for the continuing financial deficits. A review by KPMG in December 2005 concluded that management capability was inadequate to deal with the financial position of trusts, that the quality of information was impeding recovery and that, in some cases, SHAs had permitted unproductive behaviour to damage the relationship between PCTs and hospital trusts. The Audit Commission's managing director of health said that the number of such problems may lead to organisations having to merge to remain viable and he has asked for clarification of matters such as the way in which charges are made for elective and emergency care.

Mergers are under way, so a debate on the issue is for another day, but in the next few days and months, we should look at the wider issues that have been highlighted and the questions that have been asked to try to find out exactly what the NHS costs. I gave an interview to a national newspaper earlier this month in which I said very much what the Secretary of State had said: we must make sure that we discover the cause of the overspends so that, hopefully, they will not happen again.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford) (Lab): May I remind my right hon. Friend that last year was the first full year of the new GP contract and the new consultant contract, both of which were long overdue and have made significant differences in patient care and outcomes? We talk about large overspends, but it is also fair to say that they have often been put to very good use and that to keep within 1 per cent. of the overall NHS budget is not a bad result if looked at in that way.

Mr. Barron: I cannot agree with my hon. Friend about that. I will not say that he has a vested interest, although he has on some days of the week. All trusts pay exactly the same increases for the health professionals that he mentions, so why do some trusts work to budget when others overspend massively? That overspending is not right. It is not fair on those that keep to budget and try to do the best that they can within certain limits—although the limits have increased, year on year, for the past four years.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): I have here a report, dated 2004, in which the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy says that, if national tariffs are imposed, as has been the case for £8 billion-worth of expenditure, about

"160 NHS trusts and PCTs would suffer deficits of more than 9 per cent.—with almost 70 facing deficits greater than 25 per cent."

Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the imposition of national tariffs is relevant?

Mr. Barron: I am about to move on to that issue. I gave an interview to a national newspaper, and I got a letter the following day from someone—I will not name him—who works with an SHA department that is considering the costs of the NHS. I have copy of the letter in front of me. He said:

"As you will be aware, it is a statutory requirement for all hospitals within the NHS to provide cost data—'reference costs'—to the Department of Health. These data are then used to formulate the national Payment by Results tariffs. The philosophy behind this is sound and used elsewhere."

He cites Australia, where he has worked. He has worked in a few health services around the world. He continued:

"The immutable truth of this system, however, is that your funding policy is only as good as your cost data. If your cost data lack integrity and the methodology for costing contains flaws, then it follows that the funding policy is also going to lack integrity and be flawed. After four months here, I have to say that I, and my colleagues working on this project, have been shocked at the level of cost data produced in the reference costing process. I could only describe it as the lowest common denominator of costing I have seen in a health environment. I think it goes some way (obviously not all) to explaining the financial problems of hospitals here.

There are a few reasons why the state of costing is so poor here in the NHS. The main problem is that reference costing in the NHS is an extremely 'top-down' averaging process."

He then gives an example, which I hope my right hon. Friend the Minister will consider. I will ask the person who wrote the letter whether she can have a copy. I could not contact him at work today. I have got his phone number, but he was not at his desk when I tried to contact him. He then continued:

"More often than not, no adjustment is made for differences in patient acuity during this cost allocation process. This method of cost allocation makes the assumption that on an obstetrics ward (for example), a woman recovering from a caesarean in one bed is accruing the same nursing, medical drugs, medical supplies and other resources as the woman in the next bed, recovering from the normal uncomplicated delivery of her second child. As a clinician yourself"—

I am not one—

"would you believe that data?"

He then says that, while we have that system in the NHS, the most sceptical people will be those who work in it, and he makes a very good point. I would not dispute what he says about what we are doing at the moment, and if it is true, it will have that impact.

My constituency is covered by the Rotherham PCT, which, in an e-mail to me a few weeks ago, said:

"The national tariff price is higher than our local price so we are now paying more for the same level of work."

That is grossly unfair in the circumstances, so we should charge the actual cost of the health service. I am not too sure whether we will do so if we are basing payment by results on reference costs. That might be a good start, but it will certainly not be an end in finding out exactly what the different activities in the NHS cost.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Has the right hon. Gentleman, who is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Health, considered applying the same principle to PCTs more widely, not just to the cost of individual procedures, instead of perhaps finding reasons that are associated with poor management, which is the direction in which he appears to be steering? I think that that is the theme that he is developing. His assumption presupposes that funding is provided evenly across all trusts and meets need. Does he accept that there may be circumstances where acute deficits are occurring because the funding formula does not properly reflect need?

Mr. Barron: Yes, I agree entirely. A lot of NHS budgets are still historically based. I have looked at the issue over the years that I have been a Member. We still do not have budgets that reflect the activity needed to look after patients in different areas, and we never will if we do not know the costs of the NHS. There are some big issues.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a problem with payment by results? In north Staffordshire, we have a hospital on two different sites. Given the formula by which the hospital is paid by the PCT for the different procedures that are carried out, and if there is such an imbalance on top of all the other social inequalities, it stands to reason that we are heading for a deficit. Indeed, we have just reached that situation: we are looking at about 1,000 job losses.

Mr. Barron: Such job losses make it a difficult time for the NHS. The other Rotherham Members and I have been lobbied about that. The front page of the local weekly paper says that student nurses who are on secondment doing their practical work in Rotherham general hospital have been told that there are not necessarily jobs for them in the local foundation trust. The trust has had to take some tough decisions to avoid going into deficit this year. It has asked people to work differently and has left vacancies unfilled.

Last week, I received a letter from the chief executive of the Rotherham NHS foundation trusts who said:

"To achieve the efficiencies necessary whilst maintaining existing levels of patient service we need to restructure".

The letter gives a very honest answer about those student nurses, saying:

"the Trust cannot guarantee a job on completion of training to any student it takes on placement, but we do make students aware of vacancies for which they are eligible to apply."

I entirely agree with the chief executive. We must decide what the NHS is for: is it there to treat patients who are in need of it or as some sort of social employment that will employ people come what may? In those circumstances, like the rest of the public sector that has had to take such decisions occasionally, it is wholly right that my local NHS trust should not guarantee people jobs, as much as that is not liked by people. Its primary aim is to look after the patients who go to that hospital now and in the years to come. I hope that those students nurses will get work, but there should be no guarantee that that will come before the interests of looking after patients.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman believe his colleagues are waking up to the calamity that is financial management of the NHS? Does he agree that it is not education that will bring about the removal of the Prime Minister from office, but the realisation that thousands of jobs in the NHS will go—we have seen only the tip of the iceberg—because nothing has been thought through by the Government, be it in relation to IT, payment by results, the tariff or GP and consultant contracts?

Mr. Barron: It is not a calamity at all. The only pressure on my annual home budget is that 0.7 per cent. is on the edge. We do not know whether it will be available for the rest of the year. That is not a calamity. It is just as well that we are going through the process of finding out what the NHS costs while we have a Government who have put so much extra money into the national health service. I have sat on the Opposition Benches when Governments have made real cuts in health expenditure and in other parts of the public sector, too.

When we get through the process, as we inevitably will, we must make sure that we know what the NHS costs. In future, annual budgets for hospitals and other parts of the health service must be based on their costs, not on what they would spend if they were given the money. That is crucial to the debate.

David Taylor: My right hon. Friend asked, perhaps rhetorically, what the NHS costs. The answer is about £200 million a day. Over the three hours of this debate, that works out to about £25 million. That is a vastly increased sum, compared with the tattered baton that was passed to us on 1 May 1997. Certainly, financial management needs to be improved. Does he agree that some parts of the NHS are under-managed, contrary to the stereotype often portrayed by the Opposition of an NHS groaning under bureaucracy? Some parts need better management, especially by accountants, and I declare an interest.

Mr. Barron: I can neither agree nor disagree. My hon. Friend is probably right. The NHS is not over-managed. That has been a political football across the Chamber for all the years that I have been in the House—managers in the NHS, not people on the front line. The Health Committee announced a few weeks ago that we would look into health care staffing. We will look at management, as opposed to clinical and other related grades in the NHS.

I want to deal with two further points: how the Government are responding to the situation and what they are asking the NHS to do. It may not be difficult for people to come to terms with the actions that the Government are taking in the short term. My primary care trust is in south Yorkshire. I understand that in next year's budget the Yorkshire strategic health authorities have been asked to place 2.5 per cent. of their overall budget in reserve because of the need to balance the books nationally in light of the current overspend. That means that my PCT will not get £7.5 million of its growth money. There is still a lot more growth money going in, but it is still a difficult decision for the PCT to accept. There was a board meeting this afternoon at which it was accepted.

The rest of south Yorkshire will also have to put 2.5 per cent. of the budget in reserve, because four of the PCTs in south Yorkshire have overspent—the exact figure is not known. Together with other south Yorkshire Members, I had a meeting last week with the SHA, which thought initially that there would be a £20 million overspend in those four PCTs. That figure is more likely to be between £14 million and £16 million. Everything has been honest and open. We are not hiding anything. Does my PCT like the idea of £7.5 million of its growth money coming out of next year's budget? Absolutely not. Nor do I, or anybody who works in local health care.

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend work out why, if £7.5 million is overspent, there is a requirement that some trusts should offer up 2 per cent. over a number of years and some even more?

Mr. Barron: As I understand it, the calculation is made on an SHA basis. To achieve national balancing, a sum equivalent to the overspend is being held in reserve. The amount will differ in different regions. In south Yorkshire we are told it will be 2.5 per cent. I hope it is no more. When one looks at the communities for which our PCT provides services, and the high levels of health inequality, £7.5 million is no mean sum.

Given that the sum going into reserve equates to this year's overspend, even though we do not know what the overspend is and probably will not know until the middle or end of next month, is the same thing likely to happen again in 2006–07? Everyone talks about the fact that PCTs—and presumably hospital trusts—that have run up large overspends, perhaps over years or perhaps over the past 12 months, will not be able to pay off their overspends over the next 12 months. Even if they incur no more extra spending in the next financial year, we will be debating estimates this time next year and observing that, although the overspend is down, it has not gone away. What worries me, and probably worries my primary care trust, is that, if the same situation occurs next year, it will not be a case of keeping money in reserve to balance the books. It will bite into the growth money that has been so vital to turning health care around in my area.

Mr. Lansley: In the context of the point made by the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster), the right hon. Gentleman may wish to know that Surrey and Sussex SHA has called for a 3 per cent. top-slicing on its PCT allocations. John Bacon, the transitional lead for London, is taking 3 per cent top-slicing. Thames Valley SHA is taking 2.5 per cent. Why are they doing it? Because they anticipate deficits in their SHAs of more than 1 per cent. this year and probably the same next year. They are proposing, in effect, to renationalise all the growth money in those SHAs in order to start baling out deficits across the system.

Mr. Barron: I do not know exactly what is happening down here, but taking £7.5 million off Rotherham and putting it in reserve—I ought to add that the PCT has been told that it will get the money back at some stage—has not taken away all the growth money. Far from it. My right hon. Friend the Minister knows, and it is probably the same for her constituents, that we are still below the national target for PCT expenditure. We still have room for growth and we will get additional money because we are below the national PCT level.

I discussed with Ministers what the turnaround teams are doing in the PCTs that have problems of overspend. I am led to believe, and my right hon. Friend may want to correct me, that they are not just looking at the current overspend and what to do about it—we are all interested in that—but at how it came about. How did some trusts overspend as much as £10 million, £20 million or £30 million, whereas other trusts close by are nowhere near those levels? That will be crucial for learning the lesson from the present problem.

The Health Committee will want to study the evidence presented by the turnaround teams to find out what happened. We may want to instigate a debate at some stage about why the problems arose in different ways in different parts of the country, and to find out how we can avoid a situation in which some primary care trusts—it may be a minority—will go through some difficult times in the next few months and years. I am just pleased that we have a Government who have taken on their responsibility and funded expanding health care as they have, so that these difficult problems are not as difficult as they could be.

7.30 pm

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I apologise for the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) is not present. He would like to be here, but he is elsewhere working tirelessly for the public good on parliamentary business.

As I am new to the health portfolio, I am sure that hon. Members will excuse or perhaps even welcome the relative brevity of my contribution. I could be tempted into launching a Castro-like tirade in which, having acknowledged the additional funds that the Government have put in, I damn them for disproportionate increases in administration, public relations and publicity, failure to recognise the impact of wage settlements, gold-plating the European Union working time directive, vexing hospitals with politically driven targets, and generally fomenting a culture of change and instability that makes Mao Tse Tung's permanent revolution seem a little tentative. However, that would only provoke Labour Back Benchers to point to the largesse of the Chancellor, falls in the waiting lists and the fact that the net deficit is only about 1 per cent. Instead, let us cut to the quick and have the sensible debate that the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) requires us, and prompted us, to have.

The basic problem with the NHS is how to run a non-profit-making, demand-led service and stick to expenditure limits. That is analogous to the problems that councils will be familiar with when dealing with social services departments—they always overrun, and it is very difficult to manage a demand-led service effectively.

The Government's first idea was to set targets, but reaching targets requires adequate resources. When resources are not adequate, targets are often achieved by adopting perverse methods, or displacing equally worthwhile goals. The second Government idea, which was embodied in the Healthcare Commission, is the perfectly legitimate idea of pursuing a strategy of assessing clinical outputs in relation to resource allocation. By itself that is not a bad idea, but the key question is how it is pursued. Global figures on the whole NHS are no good. They are relatively uninformative; they tell us something and they are very useful in Prime Minister's questions and so on, but they do not provide a fine-grained picture. Even at strategic health authority and regional level, they are relatively unilluminating, as there will be a lot of funds sloshing around between one cost centre and another.

The Government appear to have pursued a policy that concentrates on individual cost centres: primary care trusts, hospitals and so on. In some senses this is a new departure, and they have done it in a way that has revealed substantial and worrying variations, and considerable deficits. The moot question for all of us is whether the issue is new and recently discovered, or whether it has previously existed in one form or another, perhaps disguised in the past by sloppy accountancy or the ability to move finance from year to year. It has certainly been disguised by extensive use of brokerage, whereby the SHA would find money for those in deficit and bail them out at the end of the year, and sometimes by plain misdescription of activity, whereby a shortage of secondary care might be dealt with by using some money allocated to primary care, which is then called secondary care.

Mr. Graham Stuart: I know that the hon. Gentleman is new to his post, but may I ask whether he is aware of the work carried out by Professor Sheena Asthana and Dr. Alex Gibson at the University of Plymouth, which has uncovered systematic underfunding in rural and relatively affluent areas, which is where the deficits are predominantly occurring? The Government's effort to blame managers is wrong. There is in fact a systemic underfunding of certain areas by the Government.

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Gentleman takes the words out of my mouth, because the crude Government hypothesis that the problem is due to a failure of management is significantly wide of the mark. If that were the case, resignations would have to follow and heads roll, and the public would have been substantially let down. In North Staffordshire we have seen the whole trust staff resign, more or less, but we have not seen such acknowledgement anywhere else. By and large, people who fail in managing trusts seem to be recycled elsewhere in other parts of the health service, where they are often equally well paid.

Michael Jabez Foster: The hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that a 6 per cent. minimum was somehow underfunding. How would he compare that with 3 per cent. or less, as it was under a previous Administration?

Dr. Pugh: To be honest, I have not mentioned underfunding at any stage. I have not accused the Government of underfunding the NHS; that is not the problem. [Interruption.] Whatever the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) has said, he has said. I will stick with what I wish to say.

[Dr. Pugh]

It seems to me that the deficits can reflect a range of factors. They can certainly reflect a lack of previous transparency. We must all acknowledge that. Some trusts have also been slow to adjust to the fact that there is a new ball game, with new rules. Things have happened, brokerage has been abolished and there has been a switch to resource-based accounting and so on. Furthermore, the system lacks transparency at present. The world is not as it seems, and the debts of some trusts are currently disguised by brokerage simply because the SHA accepts that some trusts have a Baldrick-like cunning plan to get out of their current situation. It is an odd fact that in certain areas where there are foundation trusts, it is the PCTs that seem substantially to carry the deficit.

There is a lack of financial predictability across the piece. There is no three-year plan, as there was for local government. There is top-slicing, as various hon. Members have mentioned. Even now, the tariff for payment by results is not finalised. There is also a constant stream of initiatives. The initiative to move heart and asthma care is good in many respects, but it will have a substantial impact on acute trusts' prospects and budgets.

There are also some bizarre rules, such as the requirement that certain amounts of work be allocated to the private sector, even where that is not financially advisable. There is a failure to recognise the true cost of new build and private finance initiative in the capital factor. There is a double whammy whereby once a trust runs up a deficit in one year, it starts with a lower budget the following year. That must be the most insane way of dealing with debt since the debtors prison was abolished. In some cases, a deficit will not be due to anything other than poor configuration, but it can also be due to additional costs that are imposed by the correct configuration, but are simply not recognised.

What all those issues require is something I think most hon. Members would consent to—a responsible causal analysis. What we have had in part is a knee-jerk blame reaction, whereby the problem is said to be poor management. It is arguable whether we can leave that causal analysis entirely to the consultants and turnaround teams. It is such people who have argued others into PFIs in the first place, and who churn around the same data as are already available. I am certainly not impressed by what turnaround teams have done in my neck of the woods, where they have, by and large, looked at the figures that the hospital already has and told it what it already knew.

There is clearly a difference between a deficit that is accompanied by high output and more and better services—what might be called a virtuous deficit, as more work is being done—and a deficit with no additional level of service, which is clearly unacceptable. The reality is, however, that in order to reduce the deficits, very few alternatives are open to people. One can reduce activity, lose staff or increase efficiency; one of those three things must be done. The requirement that each cost centre should work within its own budget embodies a relatively crude principle of rationing. That is bearable only if we know what entitlements individuals and communities have under existing provision. At the end of the day, our entitlements determine our choices.

My great fear is that the drive for financial balance across all cost centres will ride roughshod over patient entitlements and lead to damaging reconfigurations, longer patient journeys, trusts crippled by historic debts and a whole lot of political trouble for the Labour party. A better approach, which we should favour and which is true to the NHS ethos, is not necessarily to begin with the question of how we can get existing cost centres into balance so that they can trade solvently with each other, which seems to be the question preoccupying the health service at the moment. Given the money available, we should be asking what citizens are entitled to and how we can best deliver it. We should start with the people, and local people at that, rather than with institutions. We do not have a false choice between an NHS that satisfies the auditors and an NHS that satisfies the citizen—but in the real world it does not follow that the former guarantees the latter. I urge the Secretary of State to proceed with caution, to avoid simple solutions and to recognise that even with reform, one must learn how to reform.

I shall close by quoting the King's Fund, which has made a pertinent, relevant and on-the-ball comment:

"The increased level of deficits forecast for NHS organisations this year . . . is worrying—but not surprising. It is essential that the Government does not respond in an ad hoc way but instead introduces a system of support to enable NHS Trusts to respond to emerging financial problems flexibly."

The key word is "flexibly".

Several Hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind all hon. Members that the 10-minute limit on speeches by Back Benchers now applies.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands) (Lab): In the past week, north Staffordshire communities have been left reeling by the extent of the proposed redundancies at the University Hospital of North Staffordshire Trust, which is one of 18 NHS trusts currently receiving extra support from the turnaround team to help recover its financial balance. In order to bridge the £30 million gap between income and expenditure and start to repay some of the debt, the trust plans to save around £43 million over the next two years. That is a tough task, but the new interim chief executive Anthony Sumara is probably the person to do it.

About 70 per cent. of the trust's annual expenditure goes on pay, so it is clear that jobs must go, but the prospect of 1,000 jobs going has sent shock waves throughout north Staffordshire. Anyone with extensive experience of the hospital in the past couple of years—sadly, I have had that experience—knows that it was badly managed.

Mr. Graham Stuart: indicated dissent.

Charlotte Atkins: The hon. Gentleman may laugh, but if he had spent as much time in the hospital as I have,

he would know that that was the case. The management task was not helped by dilapidated buildings on two very separate sites, but there is no excuse for weak management that has left patients waiting weeks for tests, with appointments cancelled and delayed.

Mr. Stuart: I made a noise when the hon. Lady blamed NHS managers, because that is all we hear from Ministers. The problem is systemic, and Ministers—not chief executives or civil servants—must take responsibility for the state of the NHS. The hon. Lady's constituents and others will see thousands of jobs go, and they will not think it acceptable to blame the situation on poor management when those managers are appointed through the centralised system set up by this Government.

Charlotte Atkins: I totally disagree with the hon. Gentleman, given my personal experience. While the failed previous chief executive has escaped to a plumb nursing job in the Department of Health, is it right that patients and staff should suffer cuts as a result of poor past management? Valuable and committed staff are being sacrificed to recoup the losses generated by past poor management.

There is scope for greater efficiency. For instance, a hip replacement normally means a five-day hospital stay, and if in North Staffordshire that involves an 11-day stay, it does not take rocket science to recognise that the hospital is bound to make a loss. Unless such stays are reduced to the average for other trusts, the hospital is bound to get itself into difficulties. Improvements can and will be made by examining the use of theatres and out-patient services, rationalising the split site arrangements, using new technologies and reviewing back-office functions, but the impression remains that existing staff are paying the price for management failures that were not of their making.

I have received numerous letters—similar letters have appeared in the press, too—praising the friendliness and professionalism, and the caring and hard-working nature, of the staff, and I want them to be looked after. There is a plan to employ many of the people who currently occupy the 1,000 jobs in the community that are due to go, because the trend is towards community care rather than basing care on an acute hospital. I want to see a package on the scale of the Rover package to help those staff either retrain or enter other jobs in the health service. The community in north Staffordshire is very deprived, and we cannot sustain 1,000 job losses without extra help.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): Will the hon. Lady remind the House who approves the appointment of managers in NHS trusts and PCTs?

Charlotte Atkins: I do not want to talk about the past chief executive, but I believe that he was appointed by the hospital board against the advice of the strategic health authority.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): Like north Staffordshire, Gloucestershire is reeling from the revealed scale of the cuts—in our case, funding cuts of £20 million for the foundation trust and saving plans across the three PCTs of £30 million. Will the hon. Lady accept that at least part of the cause of the abruptness and scale of the cuts, which have left both our counties reeling, is the fact that they have occurred shortly before the start of the coming financial year? The funding formulae and mechanisms imposed by the Department of Health must therefore be largely to blame.

Charlotte Atkins: Those are short-term issues. I appreciate that the slide cannot continue in acute hospitals and PCTs, and a line must be drawn to deal with those deficits, which should be dealt with in a relatively short period—obviously, on occasions, with transitional help.

The big issue in north Staffordshire is the rebirth of the University Hospital of North Staffordshire—the fit for the future project. The project faces some paring down, which is in keeping with the move towards community health resources rather than relying on the acute trust. It is nevertheless vital that the project goes ahead, to reduce the glaring health inequalities in north Staffordshire and help to regenerate the local economy. Despite the hospital deficit, that project must go ahead, because any uncertainty will create real problems.

It is important that the Department should consider transitional funding, if it is necessary to get the hospital off the ground. The locality needs a new hospital, because we have possibly the most dilapidated hospital buildings anywhere in the country, so replacing them is a priority. The lack of investment in hospitals in the past is demonstrated by the fact that we are stuck with such appalling buildings, which should be replaced quickly. I want the hospital to work much more closely with PCTs, the ambulance trust and community staff.

The Secretary of State has pointed out that deficits generally occur in wealthier areas, which are frequently bailed out by more deprived areas. That is not the case in north Staffordshire, which has significant deficits, which must be sorted out, not only in the hospital but in the PCTs. I welcome the greater transparency that is now involved. In the past, Staffordshire has frequently bailed out Shropshire. It has all been done very much under wraps. The loan has of course eventually been repaid, although no interest has been paid. Now it is clear that my own Staffordshire Moorlands primary care trust will be borrowing money, but will be paying interest that the lender will receive. What is happening is clear for all to see.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): My constituents in Shropshire would be aghast by the hon. Lady's last comment that Staffordshire has bailed out Shropshire. It is some sort of a bail-out when the Shropshire health economy is facing a £38 million deficit, meaning cuts to local hospital services.

Charlotte Atkins: I am talking about the past few years, when Staffordshire frequently bailed out Shropshire. Perhaps that was before the hon. Gentleman's time.

Paying off the deficit is going to be very tough for Staffordshire Moorlands PCT. It will not just mean stripping out inefficiencies; there are bound to be service cuts. However, I have great faith in my PCT's leadership, who will ensure that they work closely with the community to ensure that the cuts that they have to introduce will have the least possible impact on patients.

[Charlotte Atkins]

I very much support the Secretary of State's statement about reducing unplanned emergency admissions and saving the NHS money. My PCT has embraced that enthusiastically—for instance, through the anti-falls programme, but particularly by using community matrons to intervene in the community to pre-empt unplanned emergency admissions. The PCT has saved about £0.5 million by such investment in community provision. However, the avoidance of emergency admissions now attracts half the funding that it did previously, so from a financial point of view there is less incentive to invest in community provision and it is less cost-effective to do so. That will hardly encourage best practice, as the Secretary of State wants to do, and it will undermine future investment made by my PCT in preventive measures such as the anti-falls programme and the employment of health visitors and suchlike.

Similarly, we have an ambulance service in Staffordshire which, through its superior training of paramedics and community first responders, prevents huge numbers of admissions to hospital by treating people at home. That is better for the patient and saves millions of pounds for the NHS, and it does not crowd out elective surgery at the hospital. Yet that ambulance service is threatened with merger, involving a dilution of staff skills and a reduction in their service standards. If we are serious about increasing and improving out-of-hospital care, we have to reward PCTs and ambulance trusts that are excelling in those fields. We should not merge them with other organisations that do not share their focus and delivery.

I hope that when we come to the end of the public consultation on Wednesday 22 March, the strategic health authority and the Secretary of State will listen to the overwhelming response of people in north Staffordshire who say that they want to create a local north Staffordshire PCT and do not want a gigantic Staffordshire-wide trust. They also want an independent ambulance service working within the west midlands that would act as an exemplar to other ambulance services and help to create far better ambulance services country-wide.

Anne Milton (Guildford) (Con): I should mention that I have an interest in that my husband is a doctor who is employed by a primary care trust.

I want to talk about two things: first, the budget deficit in my PCT, Guildford and Waverley; and secondly, the implications of the deficit. All too often in this place, we end up talking about money and services and slightly lose sight of the people who ultimately suffer as a result. I agree with the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) that the NHS has become a political football. Indeed, that is what took me out of it, having worked for 25 years as a nurse, in the hope that I might change something for all its staff.

One of the most striking things that has ever been said to me was during a conversation that I had with a doctor who worked in NHS management when I was making a speech about the NHS. He got very angry with me and said, "You know, Anne, you've got this all wrong. My job isn't about making people better—it's about balancing the books." It is very sad that doctors now feel that that is their aim. Last year, Guildford and Waverley primary care trust in my constituency launched a document called, "Modernising your local healthcare". It is no surprise to me that local people are cynical about that and say, "Modernising local health care, probably not; balancing the books, probably yes." They feel that it is all about chucking in a bit of modernising of local health care to make everything feel better.

Guildford and Waverley PCT is facing a budget deficit of £16.3 million. I do not doubt that its desire is to modernise health care and to improve health services for local people, but its aim is to cut its costs and to balance its books. In fact, it now has an imperative to balance its books because we are living in a very competitive climate. In Surrey, five PCTs are to be reconfigured down to one PCT. Many people are competing for many fewer jobs. There have been articles in the press and the health service journals about that. Senior managers in PCTs that are to be reconfigured tend to get the chief executive job at whatever level—strategic health authority or PCT—if they balance the books. Everybody who works in the health service, particularly in PCTs, understands that. In fairness, one cannot blame the staff for looking at it in that way. They have mortgages and bills to pay and families to look after. It is worth considering whether it is really a good thing for the Government to be reconfiguring PCTs given that that will result in an incredible loss of focus for the staff involved.

In December 2005, the British Medical Association said in one of its briefing papers that serious questions have to be asked about where increased NHS resources are going, and that it is not a good idea to make kneejerk decisions about the reduction or closure of services in response to short-term funding problems. The Secretary of State recently said:

> "Some primary care trusts are planning to close local cottage hospitals . . . But community facilities that are needed for the long term must not be lost in response to short-term budgetary pressures."

Mr. Graham Stuart: Is my hon. Friend aware that supporters of community hospitals increasingly see that statement as a sick joke?

Anne Milton: I agree with my hon. Friend. Many people view it as not only a sick joke but a desperate situation for many community hospitals throughout the country. The Secretary of State continued:

> "So we will expect primary care trusts to reconsider such proposals against the principles of the White Paper."—[Official Report, 30 January 2006; Vol. 442, c. 24.]

That has yet to happen and I understand that some community hospitals have already shut because the first aim of the primary care trust is to balance the books.

In Guildford and Waverley, several community hospitals are at risk, including Cranleigh Village hospital in my constituency. That hospital is held in much affection. The staff often live locally and it has been effective because, as many hon. Members know, people do much better and their health outcomes are better if they are looked after close to where they live, in the community, so that their local friends and relatives can visit them. Cranleigh Village hospital is so loved that a hospital trust was set up some years ago to raise money to build a new hospital. A substantial sum of money has been raised, a local benefactor has donated land and detailed planning permission has been granted. The project will go ahead, but only if community beds are provided on site. That is a condition of donating the land.

The innovative and groundbreaking project will be put at risk should community beds in the hospital at Cranleigh close. One sometimes wonders whether we still have a national health service. I urge hon. Members to consider how often Ministers, including the Secretary of State, refer to "the health service", not "the national health service". The beds in Cranleigh are being kept open only by voluntary donations. The community in my constituency remains sceptical about the Government's motives when such projects are put at risk and community beds close. Many hon. Members have alluded to the complex reasons for deficits. The right hon. Member for Rother Valley spoke about inherited budget deficits, which is a problem in my constituency.

We also have an older population and the demands and needs for health care are high. I, like many of my constituents, find it difficult when PCT board papers include statements such as, "We need to manage demand" or, "We need to undertake less activity." Surely that means that people are getting less of the health care that they need. There are some serious problems with the funding formula in the south-east, as was mentioned earlier.

We must take a much longer-term view because it is estimated that, in 2020, half the adult population in the south-east will be over 50.

Adam Afriyie: I recently chaired a health-care question time for the Windsor, Ascot and Maidenhead area. It was striking that the NHS trust and PCT are finding it hard to deliver services or plan ahead because the Government have failed to set the tariffs or the settlement for this year. Does my hon. Friend share my concern that, without secure future finance, it is hard for any hospital or trust to provide a decent service to patients?

Anne Milton: My hon. Friend is right. It is hard to plan, and that leaves staff in an insecure position and many patients, especially the elderly, feeling vulnerable.

Front-line staff are experiencing incredible job insecurity and loss of morale. If one does one's best to deliver health care yet all one hears is budget cuts and posts being frozen, it is difficult to carry on and do the job. Many front-line staff are not only doing their job but covering for the posts that have been frozen in their trust. They also read stories in the newspapers that the trusts for which they work—in the community or the acute sector—are not paying, for example, the bread bills because the financial position is so serious.

I should like to say a little about those who have to carry the can for the cuts. For many people, being looked after at home is good not only for them but for their families. However, trusts that cut services or try to balance their books simply by shoving the burden on to local social services and patients' families do nobody any good. That aspect of the debate is not being properly aired. If people are looked after in their homes because community beds are closing or the trusts cannot keep people in hospital, somebody—often families or social services—will have to bear the burden. We have heard nothing this evening about the problems that social services already experience through their financial constraints.

I urge the Minister to listen carefully and not spend her summing up talking about what the Government have invested in the health service. It is about not only what you put in but what comes out. I still do not understand what is happening to all the money because, in Guildford and Waverley, nothing is coming out at the other end.

8.6 pm

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): I believe that it is a good idea to balance the books. We should compare the massive record investment since 1997 with the real-term cuts—

Mr. Graham Stuart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Michael Jabez Foster: No, because the real-term cuts during the Tory years are a fact, certainly in our area. The debate takes place in that context.

The Labour Government have targeted the areas of greatest need, such as mine in Hastings and Rye. Year after year, we have received increases in funding, which has meant a sea change in the area that I represent.

Martin Horwood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Michael Jabez Foster: I am sorry, but I shall get through my speech quickly because many hon. Members want to speak.

I was especially excited when, six weeks ago, I received a letter from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to say that, in recognition of the continued challenges in Hastings, which is the 34th poorest town in Britain, there would be a boost to funding. I shall briefly quote from the letter, which stated:

"Today I am publishing a new White Paper that explains how we will tackle health inequalities to give all communities equal access to care.

The first step is fairer funding. All PCTs are getting more money, with the biggest increases for those areas most in need. Your PCT, as one of the thirty most under-doctored PCTs, will by 2007/08 receive average funding of £1,552 . . . compared to the national average of £1,388."

I believed that that was brilliant news. It represented almost a trebling of resources in cash terms since 1997. Unfortunately, I must tell my right hon. Friend the Minister that the euphoria was short lived. Last week, instructions arrived from the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority to require the Hastings PCT to hand back the £500,000 that it had underspent this year. It was expected to return 3 per cent. of its planned budget for next year and 3 per cent. for the subsequent year. I do not understand those figures, given that the country overall has a funding deficit of 1 per cent. I stress that it still means an increase for the Hastings and

Rother PCTs of approximately 2 per cent. or 3 per cent. in real terms, which is much more than was historically the case, but it is, none the less, a disappointment.

I want to support the Government in their effort to rein back those health trusts that are overspending. The media often suggest that that involves cuts, but they are not cuts. It is nonsense to say that the significant extra funding that all health trusts have received is a cut. Nor am I suggesting that ever-increasing demand and new procedures and developments will ever result in a surplus of cash in the health service. They will not, and those needs will always be there.

In Hastings and Rye, we have a very good, competent primary care trust. The House will be interested to know that that PCT and the Bexhill and Rother PCT have already pooled their senior management resources and costs. Marie Casey, the chair of the Hastings PCT, and John Barnes, who chairs the Bexhill and Rother PCT, have placed their confidence in an excellent management team that is led by Toni Wilkinson, the chief executive, to manage within the increased budgets provided. Those PCTs have done what they were asked to do. Indeed, the Hastings PCT will finish the year with about a £500,000 underspend.

It so happens that the East Sussex Hospitals NHS Trust, our main hospitals provider, has found the going tough and has significantly overspent. However, the PCT has not bailed it out. Instead, it has insisted on stringent financial management at the hospital. The hospital trust was £5 million overspent at the beginning of this financial year and heading for a £16 million overspend. So it took on Kim Hodgson as its new chief executive. She has applied the pain—even though she is a nurse—and it is now likely that the hospital will finish the year in no worse a position than it was in at the beginning, and that by the end of the calendar year it will be in balance. This shows what can be done without a bail-out from the PCT.

My PCTs have important plans for delivering the Government's agenda for locality health centres. They are working to provide three new centres in the area, and they have relied on the money that they were promised to make that possible. It will not be possible if they do not have the money that they have been promised. What we are seeing in those PCTs and in that hospital trust is gold-standard management. They acknowledge and accept the Government's belief that if fair funding is provided, as it has been, it is their duty and responsibility to manage. That is why I am so angry about what the strategic health authority is now seeking to do.

The SHA is saying that, as the Government require it to balance its books, it wants the money back from the PCTs that have underspent this year. It also wants the PCTs to accept a massive 3 per cent. reduction in their planned spending for next year and the year after. That would mean putting all their plans on hold. I regard such management on the part of the SHA as deplorable. How can it behave in a manner that is so contrary to the intentions set out in the letter from the Secretary of State that I have just mentioned? How can it take money from the successful to give to the hopeless?

The Under-Secretary of State, Lord Warner, wrote a letter to me that I received on 6 March. He mentioned overspending, and said:

"The reconfiguration should not be used locally to move resources from high performing areas to underperforming areas. Local managers should be ensuring that the quality of financial management in all organisations is raised to the level of the best."

I could not agree more with what Ministers have said on this matter. They were absolutely right, and they should insist on their wishes being carried out now. The SHA is proposing to reward the bad and punish the good, but that is precisely the opposite of what Ministers were saying. If trusts believe that they can be bailed out, what message does that send to others? I know what message has been sent to my local PCT, and I certainly know what some of the GPs are saying. They are saying, "Why bother?" What is the point of enduring the pain if they are to be punished in this way?

In Hastings, we have always had the problem of being a poor area in a rich region. I understand that that does create a problem, but that problem needs to be addressed by targeting the resources even more. It is also a reason why we can ill afford to lose our local PCT, because that kind of spreading of resources would occur as a consequence.

I shall conclude by referring to the prodigal son. For anyone who has not heard the story, it was about a guy who went away and was profligate. He came back and, it is said, all was forgiven. Well, not quite. The real story of the prodigal son is that he went away, he came back, and he was indeed forgiven. But he never got his cash twice. He had spent his money and that was the end of it. He was looked after and cared for, but he never got his helping of cash twice over. I want to suggest to the Minister that that is the message here. These trusts have had their money, and they have spent it. It is important that they should not gain any benefit from overspending. That sends out the wrong message, and it is unfair to those who work hard and comply with the Government's entreaties.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): We have heard an interesting series of contributions today, including that of the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster), who seemed to give two speeches. One resembled a job application; the second was closer to reality. The question underlying his speech was, why did the SHA decide to top-slice by 3 per cent. his excellent local health care trust, thus calling a halt to any hope of the growth and improvement for his constituents for which he obviously devoutly wishes? The answer is that that order came from the Secretary of State; it was not dreamt up by the SHA. If Ministers have not told Back Benchers that truth, perhaps they ought to.

The hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) is unfortunately no longer in her place. She made what is probably the most extraordinary speech I have heard in the Chamber. She appeared to be supporting the actions of her local health service that will lead to 1,000 job cuts. I realise the seriousness of my saying that, which is why I am extremely glad to have the support of other hon. Members. I would hesitate to say such a thing otherwise.

It is astonishing for her to be in that position. She asked for a Rover-style bail-out. I think that the penny is finally beginning to drop, even among Labour Members, that despite the huge spending by the Government, there is a need for Rover-style bail-outs in parts of the NHS.

On NHS deficits, Ministers have moved from denial to outright panic. The truth is that the NHS budget increased by 40 per cent. between 1999 and 2004. It will have tripled in cash terms, but by 2007–08 the budget will have increased in real terms by 75 per cent. There is increasing bewilderment not only in the House, but across the country about where the money has gone. The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) asked where it had gone, as does everyone else. In 2004, it was leaked—admittedly—from the Prime Minister's strategy unit that there had been a reduction in NHS productivity of up to 20 per cent. by 2004, despite Government spending. So Labour Members might sing the praises of the vast sums that have been spent on health care, but the truth is that productivity has fallen. It was surging in the early 1990s.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stuart: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, who I hope will address this point. Labour Members suggested that there were real-terms cuts in health budgets under the Conservatives. That is completely untrue. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will answer the key question of whether, according to the standard measurement of productivity in the NHS, productivity has been falling under this Government. Would not that explain the waste of all this money?

Hugh Bayley: Would the hon. Gentleman care to share with the House his party's plans for increasing productivity in the national health service?

Mr. Stuart: I would be delighted to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) repeatedly explains to Ministers—sometimes he even does it slowly—that the problem is one of centralised control, involving target setting. A further problem is the fact that 70 per cent. of the costs in local health economies are used to pay salaries and wages—

Hugh Bayley rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) is answering the question that the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) has just asked. It might be a good idea if the hon. Member for City of York waited until he has completed his answer.

Mr. Stuart: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Who controls those salary and wage levels? Who renegotiated the GP contract? Who was it who, brilliantly, agreed to pay more for less work? Who reorganised the out-of-hours service, so that the service is now denuded across the country? Who renegotiated the consultants' contract? It was this Government. It was Ministers. It is about time that Labour Members realised that Ministers are responsible in this House and this country for the running of our health system.

Hugh Bayley rose—

Mr. Lansley rose—

Mr. Stuart: I will not give way to the hon. Member for City of York now, but I will give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Lansley: I hesitate to stop my hon. Friend when he is in fine flow, but he might like to know, as might Labour Members, that between 1990–91 and 1997–98, hospital activity increased by 31 per cent. In the seven years after 1997–98, it increased by 19 per cent. If productivity had increased in the years since 1997, there would have been 1.4 million more operations in the national health service last year. [Interruption.]

Mr. Stuart: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend. In answer to the question from Labour Members, that is devastating. Apart from giggling and making snide remarks, I ask them to reflect on what has come from this Government's unprecedented spending. During the years when the Conservatives were in power, there were real, above-inflation increases in health spending every year and improvements in productivity. If the health service had continued to improve as it did under the Conservatives, waiting lists would have been removed altogether in this country. [Laughter.] Labour Members might want to laugh and cackle like hyenas, but their Government's target-driven, centrally controlled NHS is heading for absolute crisis and catastrophe. We have only seen the beginning of the job cuts and political unrest that will be unleashed by this Government's failure in health care.

If we examine the issue of productivity a little more, we see that this Government inherited the strongest economy in Europe when they came to power. It was Derek Scott, Tony Blair's former economic adviser, who said—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must refer to the Prime Minister in the normal way.

Mr. Stuart: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Derek Scott, who was the Prime Minister's former adviser, said;

"Gordon has frittered away the best inheritance left to any Chancellor in living memory."

In 1997, with the strongest economy in Europe, there was an unprecedented opportunity to transform health care in this country. Let us face it—the money has gone in. Spending has increased and, perhaps, as some have argued, it took a Labour Government to do that. It is even more true, however, that it will take a Conservative Government to bring back value for money for patients; to put health care, not cost savings, at the top of the priority list; and to ensure that we return to having care close to home, which no longer appears in White Papers.

In 2000, under the NHS plan, those of us involved in fighting for community hospitals were told, "You're saved. It's okay." What has happened? More than 1,500 beds have closed in community hospitals in this country. We then had the astonishingly named document, "Keeping the NHS Local". When I first came across it, I found it fascinating. I wondered whether it was a sideline, but I discovered that it was the Government's primary policy paper on health, against which everything should be measured. Members can imagine my shock when, new to this House, I found that my local services were being cut. They can imagine how that was compounded, although I was initially joyous, when the White Paper came out. A new Secretary of State was saying that no community services or facilities must close because of short-term budgetary pressures. She said at the Dispatch Box, where the Minister is currently smiling and laughing, that that should not happen. Across the country, it is happening.

Between 1999 and 2003, spending increased by almost 30 per cent. The number of hospital treatments—Labour Members are quick to intervene but, strangely, they are not doing so now—went up by just 5 per cent. Ministers of this Government are grinning at that failure. Productivity has fallen and, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire has said, the impact has fallen on the most vulnerable and ill in our society.

Recently, there was the case of Mena Rising, who was terminally ill in Westbury hospital. Despite the White Paper, the local primary care trust decided that that hospital must close. At five days' notice, because it had budgets to balance—let us remember the words of the health White Paper, which, as I said earlier, people now see as a sick joke—all the patients were moved. A check was done on Mena Rising, however, to see whether her GP was wrong to say that, as she was terminally ill, she should not be moved. They could not overcome that assessment, so she was allowed to remain alone in that hospital. All the other patients were moved on a Sunday and she died on the following Thursday.

That is the reality of new Labour's NHS. The failure to deliver value for money is a result of the failure of the Labour party to take as much care over spending as it does over the accompanying soundbites. This Government need to stop blaming managers for systemic failures that derive directly from their policy. They need to face up to the fact that never in the history of British government has so much been wasted by so few.

8.26 pm

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford) (Lab): It gives me great pleasure to follow that tour de force.

As probably the only practising doctor left in the Chamber, it gives me great pleasure to take part in this debate and to introduce some reality into what is a serious debate. No one is trying to downplay or belittle the overspends, which are causing significant pain in a number of constituencies throughout the country. It is important, however, to put that in context. We need to consider the enormous improvements in the health service over the past few years, which no one has yet mentioned.

It is convenient for the Conservatives to say that money is going in and not much is coming out. As a practising GP, let me tell the House that if I see a patient with suspected cancer now, I can guarantee that that patient will be seen by a cancer specialist within two weeks of my making the decision that there might be a serious problem. If it turns out that the person does not have cancer, so much the better. Nevertheless, the waiting time, anxiety and stress for that patient and their family has been reduced. The two-week waiting time has transformed that experience.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Stoate: I cannot give way, as there is very little time.

I can now say to a person who needs a new hip, "You will have that new hip within six months." It used to be one, two or three years. People were forced into the private sector. They did not want to go to the private sector, but they had no choice because little else was available unless they had private health insurance. That has been a fantastic achievement.

The new GP contract, which has had its first full year in operation, has transformed the management of chronic diseases in this country. It has transformed care for diabetes, heart disease, strokes and transient ischaemic episodes, and soon, in the next round of GP contract changes in April, chronic kidney disease. That is transforming patients' lives. It does not necessarily appear in the statistics or on the front page of the Daily Mail, but it is transforming people's lives in a way that was never possible before.

We talk of massive, catastrophic overspends. If the figures are correct and we turn out to have spent about 0.8 per cent. too much on the NHS, we should put that into context. It means that the average person on an average wage has ended the year with a deficit of £200. I do not believe that the average person on an average wage would feel that it was a catastrophe, a meltdown or a disaster to end the financial year with a loan of £200. It is the equivalent of my telling someone, "Go out and buy yourself something for £10" and their coming back and saying "It cost me £10.08". That is hardly a catastrophe, a meltdown or a disaster.

The Government have invested record amounts and are achieving record results as a consequence. I can now say to a patient in my consulting room, "I think that you should see a consultant." We can decide together which hospital would serve the patient best and I can book the appointment on my computer while the patient is still sitting in my consulting room. I can say, "There is your appointment to see a named consultant in a hospital of your choice on that particular day." The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) laughs, but I wonder whether that was possible under the last Government.

Mr. Lansley rose—

Dr. Stoate: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman. I should like to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Lansley: I laughed because, according to the Government's own figures, in January only 13,000 direct bookings were made through choose-and-book. According to the commitment that they made, everyone would be able to book an appointment directly through choose-and-book by the end of December 2005. It just is not happening.

Dr. Stoate: I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is happening. It is certainly happening in my constituency, in my practice and in my primary care trust area. Of course there are teething problems; of course it is taking longer than we thought it would take; of course there are massive difficulties with an IT system that is as enormous as the new NHS IT programme. I am not saying that the arrangements are perfect. I am not saying that the NHS has achieved nirvana, because clearly it has not. Nevertheless, it has travelled a long way.

That is not to say that there are no issues of concern. There certainly are such issues, and I should like to raise a couple. My local hospital, which is involved in the private finance initiative, has a turnover of about £100 million, with a PFI access charge of about £18.9 million this year. Yes, it is in financial difficulties. I met the chief executive last week to discuss how that would be managed, and heard about his robust programme to keep the deficit at least to a reasonable level. It is not a crisis, but it is a matter of concern, and of course it matters to patients.

The hospital is having to scale down some of the elective operations scheduled for this side of the end of the financial year, because in 10 months it has engaged in the amount of activity that would normally have filled 12 months. The results have been excellent, with improved efficiency and productivity, but of course budgets are stretched towards the end of the financial year, and some operations will need to be postponed until April. That is worrying for patients, but I have been assured that they will still be treated within the six-month time scale set by the Department. That is much better than anything that happened in earlier times.

I believe that there are things that we can do to improve NHS efficiency and reduce some of the worrying overspends. I should like acute trusts and primary care trusts to work far more closely together, with regular updates and meetings to plan expenditure and activity, so that we do not see, year after year, February deficits and end-of-financial-year meltdowns and disasters that are avoidable and foreseeable, and should be a thing of the past. If the PCTs and acute trusts sat down together to plan expenditure over the year, many of those difficulties could be removed.

There is also a need for acute trusts to work together. All too often, an acute trust that finds itself in difficulty will ignore what other trusts are doing down the road and will duplicate services, trying to increase income by concentrating on what they see as their strengths, regardless of what else is happening in the local health economy. That is inefficient, and I believe that it destabilises some areas.

I feel that payment by results encourages hospitals to generate as much business as they can in order to stay healthy. It has encouraged some hospitals to adopt the approach that the more patients they admit, the more money they can earn. That distorts local priorities. An analysis of the impact of the system, which was introduced in 2004, found that it had led to an increase in the number of short-stay admissions to foundation hospitals—as opposed to non-foundation hospitals, which were still operating under the old block contract payment system. Between April and September 2004, the number of short-term admissions rose by an average of 24 per cent. in the 10 foundation trusts, and by only 17 per cent. in similar non-foundation trusts. Research by the Audit Commission found that overall hospital activity in foundation trusts had increased by 1 per cent., and that the number of short-stay admissions had risen by 7 per cent. Some of those hospitals are driving up activity in a way that does not necessarily reflect local health need, and could destabilise and undermine PCTs' efforts to keep their budgets under control.

The accident and emergency waiting target may also cause problems. Because some hospitals have found it impossible, or very difficult, to discharge patients within four hours, there is an increasing tendency to admit patients. Not only does that avoid the four-hour target, it increases hospitals' income significantly. There is a driver in the system which, in some hospitals, has caused inefficiency to push up the costs to the local health economy. There is also a tendency for some hospital trusts to exaggerate the complexity of patients' illnesses, which again pushes up the tariff for the care that those patients receive.

Those are not acute structural problems, but they should cause concern. I should like Ministers—especially when they engage in discussions with trusts and others—to think about how the distortions can be levelled out. Many of the overspends are not all that enormous, but they can build up over a period, and such levels of inefficiency in the system can cause unnecessary destabilisation.

There are also far too many follow-up out-patient appointments; indeed, my research shows that some two thirds of all NHS out-patient appointments are follow-up appointments. I do not know what research has been done on how unnecessary they are, but my understanding and belief is that many could easily be carried out by the GP or practice nurse, and some of them are probably not even necessary. They give rise to significant cost pressures in an acute hospital setting, where many patients simply do not need to be and, frankly, do not want to be. Many would probably be happier at their GP's surgery, and if the GP feels that the problem is beyond his or her capability a referral back to the hospital would be a much more efficient use of facilities and finance.

I shall not dwell on these issues, as other Members wish to speak in this important debate. This is not a crisis, a meltdown or a catastrophe, but it is worrying that the health service should end up with yearly deficits, despite the record amounts of money going in. It is very important for Members to reflect on the significant improvements in patient care. Patient satisfaction is rising and all GPs now have to conduct yearly independent patient satisfaction surveys in order to show the PCT that they are doing a good job. The vast majority are indeed doing a good job, and through the new pharmacy contract pharmacists are making significant improvements. Moreover, nurse practitioners and specialist nurses are making incredible improvements in health service care.

Our patients have never had such a good health service. The Government are rightly praised for the huge efforts that they have made and the sums that they have invested in the NHS. Instead of soundbites and shouting, we should have a responsible debate that reflects the fact that a great deal of work has been done, but that does not mean that there are no concerns or issues that need to be dealt with. I shall be interested to hear the rest of this debate.

8.36 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): As you and the House know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have no party political axe to grind; my aim tonight is simply to get at the truth. It is entirely natural that the Government should minimise the scale of the deficits, saying that only a quarter of trusts are in deficit and that the projected £800 million deficit is only 1 per cent. of the total budget, but I am not at all sure that that is the true figure.

This year—2005–06—trusts have been allowed to use brokerage, short-term loans and cost improvement programmes and, at the half-yearly point, the projected deficit was £620 million. At that time, one trust in my locality admitted to a deficit of £3.8 millior; it now has to save £20 million to get into balance. Another trust admitted to a £10 million deficit; it now has to save £36 million to get into balance. The hon. Member for Guildford (Anne Milton) said that her trust has to save £16 million, yet according to its six-monthly forecast it was going to be in balance. If those examples mirror the picture across the country, the gross deficit is far greater than the £800 million that is being admitted to. We should also consider reports of the scale of redundancies in trusts such as Cornwall and North Staffordshire. Technically, the Queen Elizabeth hospital, Woolwich, is insolvent. Many Members have mentioned top-slicing at 2 to 3 per cent., but if that is to be the right answer, the figure would have to be even higher.

What has happened to the extra money that has been invested, rightly, in the health service? The figures given to the Health Committee by the think-tank Reform were passed to the Department of Health and have not been queried. Some £3.7 billion of the extra £6.6 billion has gone automatically on cost increases. That leaves £2.9 billion, which has been spent on meeting underestimates of the cost of the new contracts, of the cost of recommendations by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, and of the cost of private finance initiatives and pensions. That leaves very little to pay for employing the extra consultants and nurses being trained, or to meet the 18-week target.

If we could get at the truth of the real scale of the deficits, the Government would have to agree to give more time to achieve balance. It is ridiculous to try to achieve balance in precisely 12 months. The Royal College of Nursing, in a letter that I suspect that it sent to many hon. Members, stated:

> "All Trusts should have the option to defer deficits for an agreed period of one to three years as agreed with the health economy where achieving in year balance will restrict choice and adversely impact service provision."

Apart from the delay, what should we do? It is obvious what we should do. First, we need to examine the equality of funding. Some hon. Members have already mentioned work that suggests that funding is not equitable. We do not just condemn management; we examine the quality of management and see where it is good and where it is not. We ask the Department of Health not to make any more mistakes. It was admitted in a letter dated, I think, 22 February, that the Department had got the national tariff wrong. How can one calculate how to spend one's money if the tariff is wrong? We should allow time for payment by results to happen and for practice-based commissioning. We should put an embargo on further use of private independent sector treatment centres until we really know—when they have been evaluated—if they are value for money.

We should put a temporary halt on PFIs. Some 60 trusts have PFIs tying up about 11 per cent. of their income. That is the first call on the income. We have had 28 reorganisations since 1982. As I keep telling the House, for goodness' sake, do not have any more reorganisations for the moment. The Government must avoid knee-jerk reactions. Top-slicing the primary care trusts is not right and neither is shifting the cost of long-term care. As for the suggestion that asthma and heart disease can be treated more in the community, doctors do not send patients to hospital for fun and patients do not go for fun. Virtually every case of asthma or heart disease that can be treated in the community is being treated in the community. When the people concerned go to hospital, they do so because they need a consultant opinion, consultant investigations, consultant treatment or intensive nursing care. I cannot imagine where the suggestion has come from. What medical advice did the Secretary of State take on that? Did she ask the royal colleges, the chief nursing officer or the chief medical officer? That sort of plan is a knee-jerk reaction.

There is a lot that can be done. I held an Adjournment debate just last week on the logical reconfiguration of acute hospitals, because there is scope for that. I want to make it absolutely clear that I am not talking about community hospitals, which are a cost-effective way of saving acute hospitals work, but there are logical reconfigurations of acute hospitals. Let us take the example of Hartlepool, Stockton and Middlesbrough, which are within 8 miles of each other in an equilateral triangle. One cannot keep three all-singing, all-dancing hospitals with everything there, but services can be shared.

There should be a logical review of the work force, with joined-up thinking. We should not train 30,000 extra consultants unless we can employ them and at the moment, we certainly cannot. The move to care in the community might mean that we do not need them all. Perhaps the most important thing is to have an open debate on health care rationing and on what people would be prepared to pay and what sort of NHS charges are realistic. Not very long ago, BMA News carried out a survey of its readers and 96 per cent. of doctors who responded said that health care rationing was one of the most important things that should be discussed.

I wonder why Ministers are so scared of rationing. Concluding an article with the headline, "Why rationing looms for the NHS", the health correspondent of The Independent said that rationing

> "is a word, and a prospect, that health ministers dread."

If one has a child who is afraid of the dark, one takes them up the darkened stairs and shows them that there is nothing to fear. The Government have to be treated like that. They have to be shown that the fear of health care rationing is completely irrational and that people would welcome such rationing. We must consider it because demand will simply outstrip the money available due to increased longevity and more possibilities for treatment.

We should allow beleaguered trusts a little more time while debate continues on all these measures, which would be possible to implement. In my heart of hearts, I would like to abolish the market and go back to what I believe were the halcyon years of the NHS in the 1970s and 1980s. Sadly, that is not possible, but the market is not working at the moment. We must find out whether, with sensible changes, we can make it work.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): In a debate that concentrates on estimates and figures, it is inevitable that there is an emphasis on difficult funding areas. However, when we rightly examine such areas, it is important that we do not lose sight of the bigger picture: far from being in crisis, for the fifth year running, our health service is treating more people, reducing waiting lists and improving patient care. Funding has increased from £34 billion in 1997 and it is projected that it will be £92 billion in 2007–08. Yes, there are problems, but when a £70 billion budget—the current budget—is delivered by 600 separate units, the chances of keeping each unit in financial equilibrium are slim. We must also consider the situation in the context of dramatic changes to the way in which we deliver health care and the implementation of new contracts. Such difficult and perhaps destabilising issues have caused problems, but we have an NHS funding deficit that is a tiny proportion of the whole budget and considerably less than that in 1997, when there was a much smaller NHS budget.

The hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) threw out statistics on productivity that were laced with individual anecdotes. I, too, would like to compare what the NHS is like for people in my area with how it was a few years ago. My GP surgery, which is just down the road from me, has almost doubled in size. There has been a huge increase in the provision of GPs and support staff, and throughput. The surgery now has a training centre.

I look at the two acute hospitals in my area. Russells Hall in Dudley has almost doubled in size and Sandwell hospital has a new accident and emergency department. I had personal experience of the A and E department at Russells Hall last week, when I suffered the occupational hazard of all politicians. When inserting a leaflet through a door, I was met by a quiet, yet vicious dog that not only refused to enjoy the wisdom of my leaflet, but proceeded to try to chew off the ends of my fingers. I was in and out of the accident and emergency unit at my local hospital in just over an hour. When I compare the waiting times that I experienced a few years back—

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bailey: I will not give way, because I am short of time and other hon. Members wish to speak.

We have seen a huge improvement, but I wish to take up a couple of issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) mentioned deficits and the way in which some hospitals were managed. My local PCT has a small deficit and it puts it down almost entirely to the increase in accident and emergency admissions in hospitals, especially a huge increase in short-stay admissions as a result. I cannot believe that so many more people are having accidents or other emergencies that require short-stay admissions. There must be a problem with the management of the health care caseload in the area, which must be examined to ensure that funding meets provision more accurately than it does at present.

I reinforce the comments made by others about top-slicing. My own local area has a history of underfunding and health problems. On all the indices, such as cancer rates, coronary heart disease, infant mortality and life expectancy, my area performs poorly, which is why it is one of the so-called spearhead PCTs. We were enthusiastic about the extra funding from the Government to address those problems, but the SHA's top-slicing arrangements mean that all the benefits that could have accrued from that extra money might be lost. I ask the Minister to ensure that the process that will be used to bring overspending trusts back into line does not penalise those PCTs in the most deprived areas. Otherwise, the whole thrust of Government policy will be blunted.

There are problems, but they have been created in the context of an expanding health service, which is driven by people's higher aspirations. We need to deal with the problems, but we should not lose sight of the fundamental truth that the NHS is not in crisis. It is delivering a much better service for many more people than it has done historically.

8.52 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I was very interested in the various points made by the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), and I know that, as the Chairman of the Health Committee, he will ensure that it scrutinises carefully how the NHS is managed and the money is spent.

Although the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) says that he is non-party political, I agreed with every word of his speech on this occasion. The NHS faces one of its biggest overspends since 1948. Many trusts and PCTs are now faced with stark options—to meet the Government's targets and create large deficits or adopt cost cutting and contractions to come in on budget.

I am fortunate enough to represent a constituency with a PCT that has managed to break even every year since its inception, and a hospital trust that has been able to carry forward large surpluses in the present financial year. However, I appreciate that I am in a minority of Members in that respect, and I have listened carefully to what others have said about local deficits. I feel for them, and their attempts to address the issue.

The NHS has to live within its means and the long-term solutions are, as always, to maximise productivity and ensure that extra spending brings worthwhile returns. However, it is not just for NHS managers to address those issues. As several of my hon. Friends have already said, the Government have a responsibility to ensure that their target-setting agenda does not force health organisations into debt, and that bureaucratic changes, such as the transition to payment by results, do not increase the financial uncertainties faced by many trusts and authorities.

Why is the national health service in financial difficulty? There are various reasons, and I do not for one moment blame the Government for all of them. The Government have done good things, but I challenge them on others—for instance, the difficulties due to the extra costs of increasing staff, the tough targets, the culture of transparency, hospital rebuilding programmes and payment by results.

I am sure that the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), who will respond to the debate, is enjoying every minute of it so I do not ask her to respond now to the matter that I am about to raise, but perhaps she could write to me. In 2004, Southend Hospital NHS Trust applied for foundation trust status on the basis that it would be able to remain part of the NHS, working under NHS traditions, providing treatment free at the point of delivery, and would also be able to involve more local people, hospital staff and volunteers in service delivery, but with greater freedom in the funding of health care. However, the application was turned down and, as the trust reported on 27 February, Southend hospital's hope of being licensed as an NHS foundation trust on 1 April 2006 received yet another disappointing setback.

Like five other hospital trusts that were set to gain approval from the regulatory body, Monitor, Southend was told that there were a number of "underlying errors" in the new payment by results tariff issued by the Department of Health. That really depressed the staff. The chief executive of Southend hospital, David Brackenbury, described the unwelcome news as > "frustrating for everyone who has been involved in the extensive preparations necessary to become established as an NHS Foundation Trust ... Furthermore, this delay in receiving the tariff will cause us considerable problems in setting our budgets".

I could say much more, but I am sure that the Minister has got the message, and I would be grateful if she would write to me.

Why do some hospitals manage to come in on budget while others fall into serious debt? Some hospitals and PCTs are managed better than others—I will not say much better. However, some suffer from much larger systemic problems, such as being in an area with a large number of hospitals, resulting in too many bureaucrats and too much administration and duplication of diagnostic facilities.

Southend does not suffer those systemic difficulties, as it is a small unitary authority that collaborates well with other PCTs in Essex. I am delighted to tell the Minister that for the third year running, Southend Hospital NHS Trust has achieved the top, three-star, status—a significant achievement. Furthermore, it succeeded in meeting both its financial and waiting time targets, so the Minister will understand my point about the disappointment caused by the statement about the hospital's foundation trust application. The hospital's achievements are solely down to the hard-working staff, who have risen to the extra challenges presented by the Government's target-setting agenda, while managing to balance the books.

As several Members have said, changing the structure of PCTs has caused some disquiet; it has certainly done so in Essex. Is the reorganisation of PCTs about cost saving or improved service delivery? The Government have identified efficiency savings of 15 per cent. Had cost savings not formed part of the criteria, organisations could have had considerable flexibility to tailor reconfigurations closely to local need. Linking the reforms to cost savings at a time when many PCTs are already managing deficits means that many SHAs will have no option but to reduce the number of PCTs. Such a reduction in the number of organisations would release £250 million of NHS money, but in some PCTs the push to save costs has overridden other considerations, such as maintaining local engagement. I hope that that is not what the Government intended.

The Secretary of State announced last week that she is willing to accept full responsibility for the financial circumstances in which the NHS finds itself, and she has pledged to go ahead with market-based reforms and be judged on their success. That has been accompanied by the news that hundreds of jobs are likely to be axed—we have already heard about the announcement by the University Hospital of North Staffordshire NHS Trust that 1,000 jobs are to be cut from its 7,000-strong work force. The Secretary of State accepts that there will be more turbulence, more disquiet and more criticism, but believes that measures to improve efficiency could be made without jeopardising patient care. However, the departure of Sir Nigel Crisp smacks of his being fingered as the fall guy for the problems. The Minister of State should say more about that.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) talked about proposals to ease the cash crisis by cutting the number of emergency hospital admissions for chronic illnesses, but I wonder whether that is a sensible move. The Royal College of Nursing has acknowledged that many people with chronic conditions could be treated in the community rather than admitted to emergency units, but points out that that would require extra funding to pay for the nurses, which would still take resources, so it is not necessarily the cheaper alternative that the Government are seeking. The Government should reconsider that idea very carefully.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): The debate is timely because, as my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) has already pointed out, last week our local hospital, the University hospital of North Staffordshire, published its plans to tackle its financial deficits. I hope that the House will bear with me as I focus on the same subject, although I shall take a different tack from that taken by my hon. Friend and neighbour, even though I share her ambitions for the NHS in our area.

Ours is, I believe, the first of the 18 so-called turnaround trusts to announce its financial recovery plan, although I understand that the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust has made an announcement today. Whatever one thinks of its record, the Shropshire and Staffordshire SHA is now certainly leading the way. The cuts announced in North Staffordshire last week affecting up to 1,200 workers make gruesome reading, and they have already had a devastating effect on morale. They include 573 nurses, midwives and nursing auxiliaries—one in five of all nursing staff. In total, one in six of the hospital's dedicated and hard-working staff will go if the plans go through.

It is true that the 18 trusts singled out in the NHS hall of shame are a small minority of NHS trusts, and the projected deficit of approximately £800 million is only a small percentage of total annual spending, which has grown enormously for the benefit of patients everywhere in the country, but the problems exemplified by the situation at my local hospital point to an NHS that is creaking at the seams—in some places, but by no means all—because so much change is happening all at the same time. Even if eyes have been taken off the ball—amid all the change in my area, they certainly have—what is important now is that the response to tackle the deficits must not veer out of control.

The brutal announcement in North Staffordshire last Thursday, however, appears to provide some evidence of a system in panic—or, in my patch at least, of a response calculated to cause political panic. Either way, the consequences are appalling for staff and for people's confidence in our local NHS. I am afraid to say that the document issued to staff last Thursday was a disgrace both in content and tone, whatever apologists say about the legal requirement for statutory 90-day notice of redundancy.

The document was predicated on the fact that we must save £43 million over two years—to put it crudely, every £1 million means that 30 jobs will go. However, we are talking about a hospital, not a business going bankrupt, and that is no way to secure the good will of staff, which is the basis on which much of the NHS operates. Staff representatives from Unison, the Royal College of Nursing and other trade unions are rightly up in arms because, in many respects, the hospital was allowed to drift in a relatively short period by its board, by the SHA, whose chief executive was replaced last autumn and, ultimately, by the NHS executive. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), I am certainly not a softy or an apologist for poor management by the hospital itself.

At a time of immense change and huge investment, the hospital was allowed the luxury of letting its former chief executive, David Crowley, serve 13 months' notice before leaving for personal reasons. The NHS is not a business, but it needs to be run to the exacting standards demanded elsewhere, and I complained that that symptomatic drift would not be acceptable in other organisations. After 13 months, in August last year, the hospital appointed only an acting chief executive, Peter Blythin, who was shifted in January, with the obligatory warm words, to another part of the NHS. In the meantime, the wake-up call came loud and clear last November, when the trust announced a doubling to £18 million of its predicted deficit for the current financial year. The bell tolled deafeningly with the resignation of the chairman and all the non-executive directors only three days before Christmas—just the sort of festive present that people do not want.

Since then, local MPs have tried to get to the bottom of the hospital's £18 million deficit. As late as mid-February, at a meeting in Parliament, the SHA could not provide us with all the details and assumptions that we needed, but they are crucial, given the vagaries of NHS accounting. It promised to do so, but out of the blue came last Thursday's news: £43 million of savings are now planned over two years, with calamitous consequences for staff. Despite those consequences, the statement and plan were issued on no higher authorisation than that of the hospital's acting chief executive. They were not issued on the authorisation of the SHA board or, as far as I am aware, the Department of Health.

Mark Pritchard: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Paul Farrelly: I am afraid not, because the hon. Gentleman intervened earlier, and other hon. Members wish to speak.

The so-called NHS turnaround team consists of one man from Deloitte, who only got his feet under the table last Monday, so he has not had any input. When I asked what was the point of the turnaround man, the reply was, "Good question." The purpose of my gnashing of teeth is to make the point that the process is hardly well stewarded. At times there is a vacuum of governance, accountability and control. I do not want to bog the House down with too much detail, but some is necessary to illustrate the impact on the deficits in my local area of different policies changing at the same time.

On Friday I was finally provided with the first draft of the hospital's financial recovery plan, dated 18 January—two months out of date, but a first faltering step on the road to accountability. It is clear that for some time the hospital was allowed to employ accounting staff who found it difficult to recognise basic accounting principles. For example, one does not make up for recurring overspends by using the budget for one-off items. It is clear, too, that there is a cosiness among NHS accountants locally. The hospital did not bill PCTs for extra work, as it did not want to embarrass them and force them into deficit, and it knew that they could not pay. Unfortunately, the numbers have to add up for big payments on private finance initiative projects such as our new hospital, so that eventually leads to a brick wall.

We need rigorous accounting, not because the NHS is a business, but because we need to know what everything costs so that the taxpayer can obtain value for money. In the hospital's predicted deficit, some items stand out like a sore thumb. For example, there are £4.2 million of unfunded costs for the new consultants' contract, the working time directive and "Agenda for Change". In addition, £7.2 million so far this year and £4.2 million next year have been earmarked for the new policy of payment by results. In many respects, those are unknown, unintended or poorly predicted consequences of policy change. The new chief executive has acknowledged that much of the recruitment that has been undertaken is in line with national targets, but we want to know exactly how much.

Clearly, I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley and other hon. Members that we must know not just what we spend in the NHS, but how well we spend it and what everything costs. In North Staffordshire and elsewhere, the financial recovery plan does not seek to restore finances just to an even keel. The requirement is that in the following year, trusts must recover the underlying deficit, plus an element of the deficit carried forward from the previous year. That is a painful incentive not to get into deficit in the first place and a powerful signal, but where recognisable failures have occurred in the NHS system at a time of great change, it is too brutal in its effects now.

In North Staffordshire, some of the vagaries of the modelling, particularly with payment by results, may yet lead us to predict another £20 million of deficit. Staff and patients in areas such as north Staffordshire, which are already underprivileged, should not bear the pain of that brutality. The response must be managed and planned; it should not cause chaos, run amok or be out of control.

9.10 pm

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): A lot of good points have been made today, particularly by the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor). He and the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) made the same key point that a lot of trusts bill one another within the health economy, so there is a risk that deficits are concealed for some time. It is very difficult to pin down what the deficits are, and sometimes people do not find out until the end of the year.

A lot of the problems were predicted, which is backed up by the evidence. I shall quote from "Early lessons from payment by results"—a report produced by the Audit Commission in October 2005 that one would expect the Minister to have read. It says:

> "There are valid concerns that the level of risk inherent in the current policy design, particularly given the pace of implementation and the size of the change is too great."

In other words, we may not be in meltdown now, but if we keep going in the same way, we are likely to be in meltdown.

In the current financial year, about £8 billion is dealt with by what is called payment by results, but it is actually a transactional fee, not a market-based system. So Woolwich hospital's underlying costs are higher, because it cannot pay its tax bill and because its PFI costs are so high, but from the health service's point of view, the hospital cannot be shut down, because those costs must still be paid—so chaos ensues. We have chaos at the centre.

We have had a triple whammy, whereby well-managed Peter is being robbed to pay badly managed Paul. Eastern Birmingham PCT, which covers my constituency, is very well managed—it controls things very effectively—but it has been hit by three things within six weeks of the start of the financial year. First, it has been hit by the phasing out of the purchaser protection adjustment, to which hon. Members alluded earlier. Secondly, it has been hit by top slicing. Although we do not know the final top-slicing figures, they vary nationally between 1.5 per cent. and the 3 per cent. figure that is often quoted. Some people argue that that at least gives them a bit of money to deal with the chaos created by Government policy. Thirdly, we do not know what the tariff will be.

There is an argument that, if anything should be top-sliced, it should be the tariff, because that is where the real danger lies. There is a good argument for a scheme whereby people aim for a 3.2 per cent increase for non-elective surgery, and if people go above that, transactionally, it is only 50 per cent. of the cost and if they go below it, transactionally, it is only 50 per cent. of the benefit. There is a substantially stronger argument that that figure should be reduced, because it is very clear that the current chaos—as I say, it is not meltdown, but it is likely to turn into meltdown—is caused by too rapid an implementation of the process. If the speed of implementation were reduced, we would have a chance of people managing. The hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) made the point that we want to plan expenditure. With payment by results—or transactional payment—people cannot plan such things.

Let us take the situation that we are in. We have deficits all over the place and we are not quite sure what they are. We will go further down a route that will create more and more deficits. Suddenly, we decide that we will take the money off the PCTs. We are top slicing some of their money. We are removing the purchaser protection adjustment from many of them. We are not telling them what they have to spend in the next financial year, which starts in a couple of weeks. They do not know the cost.

What do we do if we want to create total chaos? We sack all the senior managers and tell them that they must re-apply for their jobs. That is really clever. For proper financial accounting, the deficit at the end of the financial year must be predicted. If accounting staff are told that they will not have a job if they predict a figure that is in deficit, of course no deficit will be predicted. Suddenly we find that PCTs have been merged and there are massive deficits all over the place, beyond the amount top-sliced by the PCTs. What do we do?

We encounter a further problem, which was raised by the Royal College of Nursing. If someone is made redundant, their redundancy pay must be included in the accounts for that year, which is why there is such a big rush to make people redundant. If cost savings have to be made all in one year, it is difficult to find savings, so more people are made redundant than need to be.

We are caught up in a horrible administrative mess. The Prime Minister said that every time he reformed something, he wished later that he had gone a bit further. When everything in the health service settles down, we will look back and think, "No, we did that a little too fast." There is far too much change. The well organised managers who can add up are reeling with the pace of change, and we get more and more change.

We should look for a couple of things from the Government. First, they should stop reorganising the primary care trusts. They will never get anywhere if they tell all the people who are responsible for dealing with the tight management that they are to be sacked and will have to re-apply for their jobs. That will create chaos. Secondly, the Government should review the rise from £8 billion to £22 billion. I know that they are constrained to do it for the foundation trusts but it is clear that the Audit Commission views that as causing a massive problem. Thirdly, the Government should listen to the points made by the RCN, especially about timing. If everything is done in one year, the result is total misery. We must remember that our concern is with the patients—the people who need that health care.

If there is no nurse or doctor to treat them, they do not get treatment. Action is needed from the Government to stop pushing us down that route.

9.17 pm

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Selby and York faces the most severe primary care trust deficit in the north of England, and it is not a consequence of underfunding. This year the PCT will receive £307 million. Three years ago it received £199 million. That is an increase of £108 million a year, about £2 million a week, £300,000 a day extra for the NHS or about £470 a year extra for each person in the catchment area. The extra spending is being used to buy more treatment for more patients. It is saving lives and reducing waiting times for treatment.

The problem that the PCT faces is not underfunding, but poor management of the fastest growth in NHS spending in the history of the NHS. That view is shared by local clinicians—GPs have made similar comments to me—and by managers in the health service. Nationally, the deficit is projected at £800 million or roughly 1 per cent. of NHS spending. That, perhaps, is not a huge problem when the NHS budget is due to increase by some 6 per cent. above inflation this year.

But 1 per cent. is the average, and averages can be misleading. If my head is in the fire and my feet are in an ice bucket, my average temperature is probably fairly good, but that would not make me comfortable. In Selby and York we will be extremely uncomfortable because of the size of the deficit. The end of year deficit is about £24 million or about 8 per cent. of expenditure.

Despite the growth in this year's allocation, the PCT will need to cut £21.5 million if it is to break even in the forthcoming year. That will be painful. Already the PCT has cut the hours of the NHS walk-in centre in York and reduced the night-time GP cover between the hours of midnight and 8 am to just a single doctor for the 270,000 in the area. I am afraid that worse is to follow: the hospital will need to cut excess bed days—that is to say, to discharge patients earlier—and it may end up ending or limiting treatment for some non-life-threatening conditions. It could well be forced, as in Staffordshire, to make staff redundant, and GPs will need to change their referral rates if the deficit is to be brought into balance.

The real problem that we face in Selby and York is that under the Government's financial rules, the PCT does not need only to reduce expenditure in the forthcoming year by £21.5 million to bring its budget into balance. It will be required to make savings of about £45 million, first to break even, and secondly, to repay last year's £23.5 million overspend. If a £45 million cut were actually required to be made in Selby and York, the results would be catastrophic, as it would mean a cut of some 15 per cent. in expenditure. We could be left with little more than an emergency service.

I ask the Government to give Selby and York PCT some additional time to repay the accumulated deficit. I am not asking for a blank cheque. The Government need to know that the bad management that led to the overspend has ended. The Department of Health has put its turnaround manager into the PCT, and the PCT has already clawed back the deficit from a predicted end-of-year shortfall of £32 million to £23 million. My question to the Minister is: when the Department is satisfied that the PCT budget is back in balance, will it extend the time scale for clearing the accumulated deficit? If £45 million had to be saved in the forthcoming year, a postcode lottery would be created in our area compared to neighbouring areas. NHS treatments for patients in Selby and York would be based not on objective need, but on the PCT's ability to pay.

There is relatively little further time for this debate. I challenged the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) to set out ideas for how his party would increase productivity for the national health service. I am afraid to say that he flannelled, but I have some specific proposals to make. First, much of the additional money for the NHS has been spent on increased remuneration for doctors and other health service staff. Much of it has been earned and is deserved, but as other hon. Members have made clear, the increase in pay has not been matched by an increase in activity or the number of treatments for patients. I recommend that the Government publish data drawn from the hospital episode statistics on the activity rates—the number of patients treated—of each consultant. Those rates vary enormously from consultant to consultant. The Government should change the consultant merit award system so that additional awards are tied to improved productivity, ensuring that it is the doctors who treat greater numbers of patients successfully who get the awards.

Secondly, spending on drugs has spiralled. Hitherto, under the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme, the Government have controlled pharmaceutical company profits, not prices. Given the very high price of some new drugs that are being introduced, however, I believe that the Government now need to control both. Herceptin, for instance, costs £21,500 per patient per year, and it is being provided on the NHS even though it is a drug that has not been licensed for general use among cancer patients. That will add £0.5 million to Selby and York PCT's costs in the forthcoming year—£0.5 million less for it to spend on other treatments, such as hip replacement, which is a proven treatment. I ask the Government to look at the question of price regulation as well as profit regulation for the pharmaceutical industry.

Thirdly, I believe that the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence should be asked to evaluate existing health technologies and not just new technologies. When it publishes guidelines, those guidelines should be followed. For instance, on hip replacement, it has recommended the general use of the Charnley prosthesis, which would save money and produce better outcomes if it were to become standard.

I agree with the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) about two matters. First, once PCTs and trusts that are in the same difficult position as Selby and York have stabilised the overspend, they need time to pay back the accumulated deficit. Secondly, he is right to raise the issue of rationing, without which there could be a feast in parts of the NHS and a famine in others. During the second world war, we introduced rationing to ensure that everybody had access to their necessary diet. We must engage with the rationing debate, as people are doing in other countries. If we do not do so, we will face the problems of variable patterns of health expenditure and variable levels of health care across the country.

9.25 pm

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): I promise faithfully to finish before 9.30 pm, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I am deeply grateful for the opportunity briefly to participate in this debate. I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), whose reasoned arguments about how deficits occur were in marked contrast to some of the contributions from Opposition Members—I began to lose the will to live given some of the nonsense that they came out with.

Most hon. Members have to spend time considering these issues. That certainly applies to me because the acute trust that covers my constituents, who desperately need care, has the mother and father of a deficit. I have attempted to work with the acute trust for many years to try and ensure that it delivers a good service for my constituents. I understand that we should concentrate on the issue of deficits, but the matter is about getting the best care for our constituents, and I have no doubt that poor financial management often goes hand in hand with poor clinical outcomes.

Surrey and Sussex Healthcare NHS Trust is at the last chance saloon, and we must get things straight so that it delivers health care properly. The turnaround team has been called in, a public interest report has been produced and we are beginning to know exactly where all the money went. Some hon. Members have said that deficits are caused by one or two issues, but that is just not true. In my area, for example, we have examined the use of agency staff. It is difficult for a trust to recruit when it is unattractive to staff, and we need to assist such trusts.

I have noticed what has not been at the top of the agenda in this debate, although hon. Members have rightly raised examples of trusts that have maintained financial order and have delivered an excellent service. In my area, Crawley PCT has provided a fantastic service under budget for the fourth year, and it has picked up all the community services that were so poorly developed in 1997—it has done an excellent job. The Sussex Partnership Trust looks after people with learning disabilities and mental health problems. I know that it is in a challenging financial position, but it is delivering a new hospital in my area. That is not top news in this debate, and all we have heard about are crises and disasters, but that is not the case, and I make that point as an MP who represents one of the areas with the greatest difficulties.

My PCT wants to ensure that the acute trust delivers, because it understands that its patients and those of the acute trust are the same people and that it must work with the acute trust to make sure that that happens. Getting that trust into order is our first priority, and I desperately hope that the debate will be very different for me this time next year.

9.29 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt), who illustrates one of the reasons why things have gone so badly wrong—because prior to the 2001 election, she and the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) got together to offset the possibility of hospital reconfiguration in the Royal Surrey hospital. I have been to that hospital; I talked to its chief executive last year. If she and the right hon. Gentleman had not intervened, it would have saved £10 million a year and it would have been possible for it to have survived financially, whereas at the moment it is in crisis mode.

Mr. Blunt: My hon. Friend will be interested to know that I have calculated that the cost of general elections in the constituency of Crawley is about £20 million.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Laura Moffatt rose—

Mr. Lansley: Perhaps the hon. Lady would like to explain, because she did not get much time to speak. If hospital services in Crawley disappear, it will be because at an earlier point she was more interested in saving her political skin than in the services provided by that hospital.

Laura Moffatt: I am deeply grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, but not because I believe that I have anything to answer for—my constituents know very well what I was fighting for. I am intervening on his behalf because he is talking about the wrong hospital, which many of my constituents will find most amusing.

Mr. Lansley: I went to Crawley and to Reigate prior to the last election, and I have been to the East Surrey hospital. I remember the conversation exactly. The hon. Lady has to deal with the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) made. Instead of making cheap shots, she might contemplate the expense that she has caused her constituents.

With one or two unhappy exceptions, it has been a good and important debate, and I congratulate the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on securing it. It comes at precisely the right moment. That was reflected not least in the contributions by Government Back Benchers, who displayed an attitude that was not present, by and large, in mid-November, when we initiated a debate in our own time on deficits. We said then that we believed that £1 billion of gross deficits and several hundred million pounds of net deficits were in prospect this year. The Secretary of State came to that debate and said, in effect, that recovery plans were in place and that it was going to better this year than last year.

Frankly, the Government have been, and remain, in denial. On 6 December, in front of the Health Committee, the Secretary of State said:

"We believe that by managing this very closely we will get the net overall deficit back to around £250 million at the end of this year and we will, at the very least, get back to balance by the end of next year."

One has to wonder what world she was living in at that point, as at about the same time she admitted that the net deficit was rising to £620 million. We now know, although the Government still will not admit it, that subsequent forecasts by strategic health authorities add up to some £755 million. There are some very serious deficits in several trusts, but there are also deficits across a much larger number of trusts. Our latest estimate from board papers suggests that more than 139 trusts are experiencing deficits. It is a system-wide problem.

The right hon. Member for Rother Valley was right to say that we know what the NHS spends, but we do not know what it costs. The system has to be open and transparent. He has not heard from me, and he will not hear from me, the idea that we should go back to the bad old days of everybody covering everything up. However, he should talk to his Front-Bench colleagues who, far from pursuing a direction of openness and reform, are, through the proposal that primary care trusts should top-slice allocations, moving in precisely the opposite direction. Contrary to shifting the balance of power, they are taking control of the budgets. The Government will renationalise much of the growth money, which will then be spread around the system to try to obscure the financial consequences of necessary reform.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (John Hemming) understands such matters, but reached the wrong conclusion about what is required. It is necessary not to delay the structure of reform, but to complete it consistently. One of the central problems is not too many changes at once—if they were all mutually reinforcing because a clear strategy existed, managers and others in the NHS would understand and accept them. However, they find constant, mutually inconsistent changes impossible to tackle. For example, how is it possible for the chief executive of the NHS to say one thing about the future structure of PCTs and their functions—that they are commissioning, not provider bodies—at the end of July, yet, two months later, they become provider bodies again? The same is happening to allocations. Contrary actions will not deliver successful reform.

I have every sympathy for the position of the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), which requires reform. I suspect that he believes in the structure of reform and that we need devolved decision making and the provider trusts to be held to account for their productivity. The consultants' contract did not achieve that. Simon Stevens, who was special adviser at No. 10 at the time, subsequently admitted that the contracts were negotiated without building in productivity. Provider trusts, like foundation hospitals, should have the freedom to manage their costs more effectively. The Government's imposing of costs lies at the heart of much of the problem.

There is a 7 per cent. increase in costs on the tariff this year compared with last year. Is it any wonder that the hospitals that receive increases in cash resources find that most of it goes straight out of the door? The tariff takes no account of the impact of the working time directive. The 7 per cent. includes nothing for the costs of implementing the NHS programme for IT, as if hospitals paid nothing for that. It also contains nothing directly for implementing waiting time targets.

I have asked Ministers which part of the tariff for next year reflects the Government's proposal to move towards 18-week waiting times. I am sure that the Minister has included something in her speech about that. However, I have also received replies to questions that show that, next year, the Government estimate that the move will cost £1 billion, yet that is not included in the tariff. Where, therefore, will those costs be met?

We heard conflicting and contrasting speeches about the circumstances at the University hospital of North Staffordshire. I shall not comment on that except to say that a central question for the hon. Members for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) and for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) is how the University hospital of North Staffordshire can possibly afford rebuilding. That can happen through only two means. Either the tariff—the payment by results—adjusts in future to reflect the costs of building new hospitals and providing new services, or hospitals cut back their activities so dramatically that they are deemed affordable by the Government and Monitor. Clearly, the University hospital of North Staffordshire is moving in the latter direction. It must do that because the Government are telling us nothing about the former possibility.

The operating rule book for 2006–07 was published at the end of January and it stated that the Government would shortly publish new affordability criteria for PFI projects. That has not happened, just as we do not know what will happen to the tariff after the end of this year. We discussed the possibility of marginal pricing Upstairs in Committee. Time and again, I said that, if the NHS has capacity and primary care trusts have patients who need treating but constrained budgets, one might at least allow for the possibility that they could reach agreement between themselves about marginal pricing of additional capacity towards the end of the year for treating those patients.

The hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) appears to consider it reasonable that Darent Valley hospital should spend 10 months treating patients over trade and then stop. That is not a sensible approach.

Dr. Stoate: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No, I do not have much time. Also, in the course of his 10 minutes, the hon. Gentleman used as many words as most people would use in 20.

I want the Minister to accept reality. Up to now, the Government have refused to respond to freedom of information requests for the month nine and month 10 forecasts of the strategic health authorities. Will the Minister tell us what their forecast estimate is? Will she also be clear about how the SHAs can possibly move from their present position to system balance within the next year, in the light of the way in which resource accounting works? The present structure dictates that if an organisation consumes its resources in the first year of a three-year public expenditure round, it has consumed in advance the resources that would otherwise have been available to it for the following year. That is understandable in theory, but it is going to be disastrous in practice.

The Government are going to cover many of the deficits. Let us face it, they have increased their departmental expenditure limit by £112 million for this purpose. They will also add about £116 million by underspending on their central programmes. Procurement on the connecting for health programme is slow, which gives them another £200 million, and the end-year flexibility will give them another £200 million. They were lucky last year, in that a gross error in the calculations of the NHS litigation authority meant that they had hundreds of millions to spare. That is not going to happen this year; the contingent liabilities on that are going up. The Government can cover deficits in regard to the departmental expenditure limit this year—the question is, will they, and what will they do next year to help trusts to achieve these ends?

There is a better way forward. It would mean that demand management could not be achieved by manipulating the tariff and that it would have to be achieved by giving genuine budget control to general practitioners through the reintroduction of GP fundholding in a form that allowed the care of patients in the community to be managed by those who have a responsibility both for the clinical care of their patients and for the budgetary consequences of that. This would require genuine freedoms. I suspect that, at the end of the year, we will find that—contrary to the prediction of the Royal College of Nursing—foundation trusts will deliver a far better outcome than other NHS trusts in terms of finances. This is a condemnation of the performance management system in the Department of Health.

We do not want to see primary care trusts top-slicing, a return to cash brokerage—which is in fact happening—or short-term measures that are to the long-term detriment of the NHS, including the closure of intermediate care beds in community hospitals and the sacking of staff. A year ago, the staff were the heroes—the Government were cheering as they headed towards their waiting time targets, but now, in too many places, they are going to suffer the consequences of the Government saying, "Balance your books, and don't worry about the waiting time targets."

That is completely contrary to what the then Health Minister, the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), was telling the House almost exactly a year ago. He said that people were always forecasting deficits at this time of year, but that things always turned out all right in the end. Either that showed a lamentable failure to understand what was going on—which has continued for months—or he was simply focusing on the general election and the waiting time targets, and to hell with the financial consequences after the year end. I do not know which it was, to be honest, but this must not happen again.

Given the present resource constraints—astonishing, despite the 9.6 per cent. cash increase—the Government cannot carry on trying to achieve waiting time targets while loading costs, pressures and change on to the NHS in the way that they are now doing. At the moment, the tariff for next year promises a 6.5 per cent. increase in costs. Hospitals are being told that they will receive a 1.5 per cent. increase in tariff. The squeeze on hospitals will be dramatic.

The Government say that everything is to be looked after in the community. Well, Labour Members might like to have a look at the Department of Health's annual report. The number of health visitors went down between 1998 and 2003, and the number of district nurses also went down during that period. The resources in the community are simply not there, and until they are there cutting back the hospitals will be dangerous for patients. It would be far better for the Government to be realistic about this, to give GPs the opportunity to manage their budgets on behalf of the patients, and to give the professionals throughout the whole of the NHS the freedom to deliver services for patients, and the budgets to do the job.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): I join hon. Members in complimenting my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on securing this debate, which has had some thoughtful contributions. I appreciate his great experience as a former shadow health spokesman, and well remember working with him in opposition when the health service was very different from the one we know now.

Back-Bench scrutiny of the searching variety that we have heard today is the most testing of Ministers and deserves the most thoughtful response. I will try to give that. I wish to cover three main areas. I cannot guarantee that the whole of my response will be completely thoughtful—one or two contributions merited something less—but I will try.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) had an interesting column in last week's Health Service Journal, which I commend to the House. The title was, "Stop focusing on the size of the deficit and start looking forward to creating a stronger financial framework". I echo that. I will not quote him selectively, because he is also critical, and we need to consider some of the criticism. He says:

"Payment by Results is essential".

He continues:

"Accumulated deficits cannot be written off", as that would send the wrong signals. He then goes on to criticise what he describes as "top-slicing". I will come to that in a moment.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley rightly pointed out that the NHS budget has doubled since 1997 and will have almost trebled by 2008 to more than £92 billion. It is right that we examine where the extra resources have gone and the way in which those resources are being used. The extra resources have helped to deliver a transformation of health services. It is important that the House does not lose sight of that. My hon. Friends the Members for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey), for Dartford (Dr. Stoate), for City of York (Hugh Bayley) and for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) recognise that, as do a number of others.

It would take too much time to record all the improvements that we have seen. In 1997, however, it is fair to say that almost 300,000 people were waiting more than 15 months for their operations. Now, no one waits more than six months, and the average is about eight weeks.

Mr Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con) rose—

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman has not been in for the debate, and I would ask hon. Members to allow me to reply to the many points that have been made.

I take on board the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford about accident and emergency targets and I agree with what he said about follow-up appointments. On the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins), ambulances are reaching more patients more quickly than ever before, and not just in Staffordshire. She has repeatedly said how important the structure of the ambulance service is in Staffordshire. Ambulance services are extending the range of care that they provide to transform patients' experience and improve efficiency.

Notwithstanding the comments of the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor), we have begun to improve the lives of 17 million patients suffering from long-term conditions such as diabetes, mental health problems and coronary heart disease. Those improvements have been enabled by innovation and new treatment methods, but have largely been delivered in the community through improvements to general practice and general practitioners' services. It is true that we have thousands of extra clinicians throughout the country, old buildings are being replaced with new hospitals or surgeries, and new ambulance stations, ambulances and equipment are being provided. We are upgrading the NHS's IT systems with the largest civilian IT project in the world.

The increased spending will be backed up by key reforms—payment by results, new work force contracts, PCT commissioning, foundation trusts, independent inspection and regulation and an efficiency plan to deliver better value for money. In addition, we have made significant investments in pay reform for NHS staff. The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) raised the issue of costs. I do not apologise for addressing the scandal of low pay in the health service.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Jane Kennedy: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue. I beg his pardon, but I did not see him during the debate—[HON. MEMBERS: "He was here."] I am sorry. I will give way.

Mr. Lilley: I am extremely grateful.

The Minister has not mentioned deficits so far. I asked the Library about the cause of the deficits and was told that 21 per cent. of the increased expenditure last year went on pensions. I was also told that, according to the British Medical Association, consultants' pensions would rise by 24 per cent. and GPs' pensions by 56 per cent. because of the new contracts. Is that a wise and fair use of money when the Government are refusing to do anything about the pensions of those who have been misled and awarded them by the ombudsman?

Jane Kennedy: I believe that it is an appropriate way of proceeding with pay reform. We negotiated the arrangements on the clear understanding that the investment was in return for reform. The new contracts for NHS staff are designed to support service improvement, to deliver real benefits for patients and the service and to improve the working lives of NHS staff. The issue was raised by the hon. Members for Mid-Sussex, for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) and for Southend, West (Mr. Amess). I will look into the matters raised by the hon. Member for Southend, West about his local hospital and its application for foundation trust status and write to him if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. Lansley: What about the tariff?

Jane Kennedy: I shall come to that in a moment.

Most NHS organisations are delivering high-quality patient services and balancing the books. The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) mentioned Castro and Mao Tse Tung in one breath, which impressed no Labour Members, or at least very few, but he also said that it was very difficult to manage a demand-led service. That is a typical comment from a Liberal Democrat: the Liberal Democrats find it very hard to make decisions that might prove difficult to handle and unpopular locally. I can tell him that the NHS does manage a demand-led service in large part, and does it very well.

Martin Horwood: Will the Minister give way?

Jane Kennedy: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I want to deal with the deficit. While it is small in relation to total expenditure, it is unacceptable and must be eliminated. The majority of the NHS is living within its means and delivering on target, but there is much more that some parts of it can do to eliminate inefficiencies and improve productivity.

Let us take the example of University Hospital of North Staffordshire NHS Trust. In 1997, the trust had just under 3,900 staff. In September 2004, there were slightly more than 5,100. The number increased by 1,232, more than a third. I have observed statements from North Staffordshire with some concern, but let me tell my hon. Friends the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) and for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) what the trust is saying. It has benchmarked its work force costs against those of similar trusts and they were the highest for all staff groups except nursing staff, for whom they were the second highest. It will aim to reduce its work force costs towards the average for similar trusts.

I realise that the issue of 1,000 redundancy notices is cause for concern and I appreciate the impact on morale. Nevertheless, I think that the steps that the trust is taking to restore its financial balance are worthy of support, especially where they will not worsen patient services and may even improve them in the long run. Certainly that is the intention.

I am conscious of how quickly time passes. Our aim is to restore financial balance in the NHS by the end of 2006–07, and we have introduced a series of measures to achieve that. Achieving financial balance is not a book-keeping exercise; it is essential to the delivery of sustainable improvement in the future. As well as providing additional investment, we have increased the transparency of financial reporting so that financial problems are exposed and we can deal with them. It is true that we have brought this about by shining a light on deficits. Let me be clear about why we have introduced payment by results. It is a fair and transparent system for paying hospitals for the work that they do. We are putting record funding into the NHS and we want to see results. The experience of other countries that operate systems such as payment by results is that they can help to increase activity.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley questioned us about the tariff. He said that it is only as good as the data and that reference costs are not detailed enough. A lot of what he said I agree with and I welcome his comments; sight of the letter that he mentioned would be useful to us. We are keen to continue to learn lessons and to improve current systems. As they stand, the reference costs provide reasonable data for the purpose for which they were designed—getting average costs—but they are not sensitive enough to derive patient-level data and could be improved in that respect. That is why we have to make adjustments for specialist top-ups, for example.

We have made some changes to the structure of the tariff to ensure that, for example, we manage the risk of growth in non-elective activity. As the House knows, the tariff was published on 31 January but withdrawn on 22 February because there were some material errors that meant that many prices were wrong. We have now made the necessary corrections, which have been road-tested by the NHS and other stakeholders. The corrected tariff was published on Friday 17 March and is now being used by NHS organisations to refine their plans for 2006–07. A review of the tariff-setting process has been commissioned by Sir Ian Carruthers, so that we can learn lessons for the future. I regret the fact that mistakes were made, but we believe that this was an operational problem and that we have fixed it. The review will tell us more.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Will the Minister give way?

Jane Kennedy: I certainly will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ooh."] Well, he made what I consider a most sarcastic contribution and made a number of interventions, so if the House will allow me, I will move on.

We are establishing the right culture for financial balance. We are changing the incentives associated with the performance-rating system, so that those hospitals and PCTs that are failing to meet their financial duties are identified in performance reviews. We are also designing a major drive to improve NHS productivity and efficiency. For example, we know that cutting unnecessary emergency admissions—an issue mentioned by several Labour Members—could help the NHS to save more than £400 million a year through better assessment processes and improved patient care in primary and community settings.

In the minority of organisations where there are significant overspends, we are taking action now to identify and correct the financial problems. I anticipate that this work will continue for at least 18 months, and it will be driven from the centre. At the same time, it will aim to build turnaround experience within the NHS to reduce reliance on external support. In some of these organisations, the overspend is large and it may take more than one year—I hope that my hon. Friends hear what I am saying—to return to financial balance. In these cases, we expect the new strategic health authorities to take the lead in developing and implementing a financial strategy for managing the situation in their locality. This will include creating local reserves to deal with local problems. The size of the reserves and the contribution from each PCT will vary according to local circumstances, but the underlying principle will be fairness.

The House will want to know that we expect SHAs to repay any contributions to reserves over time.

Martin Horwood: Will the Minister give way?

Jane Kennedy: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will not as I have only one minute left. We expect SHAs to have full regard to the financial and service position of each organisation in determining how reserves are generated and applied. However, some SHAs may not be able to deliver a financially balanced position next year without unacceptable service consequences—a point made by a number of my hon. Friends. Where that is so, we will incentivise others to deliver a surplus to cover the situation. The money will not be moved and underspending SHAs will retain the resources for spend in future years, but the system as a whole will balance.

There is no trade-off between meeting standards in service and financial rigour. Excellent patient care and financial control are usually associated with each other. They go hand in hand.

PETITIONS

Grizedale Forest

10.2 pm

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): I am presenting a petition on behalf of the friends of Grizedale forest. The petition

Declares that the Forestry Commission has submitted plans to redevelop the Grizedale Visitor Centre. The Forestry Commission has stated that this will increase the number of visitors from 250,000 a year to 300,000. The Friends of Grizedale Forest object to this development on the following grounds:

1. The projected 50,000 or so extra visitors and traffic entering the valley via the class C road system;

2. The unsympathetic architectural design of the proposed development;

3. The environmental concerns for the whole area.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to make representations to the Forestry Commission for the plans to be withdrawn.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Bassetlaw Primary Care Trust

10.3 pm

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): In addition to the many submissions to the current Trent strategic health authority and South Yorkshire strategic health authority consultations, 8,796 Bassetlaw residents do publicly petition

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The Humble Petition of residents of Bassetlaw,

Sheweth

That merging the Bassetlaw Primary Care Trust ... into a Nottinghamshire-wide Trust would be detrimental to the excellent NHS services currently enjoyed by the people of Bassetlaw.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House shall urge the Department of Health to consider the views of the people of Bassetlaw and their support for retaining a direct geographical link between Bassetlaw PCT and Doncaster and Bassetlaw Hospitals Trust, which runs Bassetlaw and Retford Hospitals.

To lie upon the Table.

Health Services (West Midlands)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

10.4 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss health services in the west midlands and, not least, health services and the health crisis in Shropshire. As the House will know, the Shropshire health economy has been debated many times. Indeed, the Minister herself has replied to questions that have been put before the House on other occasions.

It is unfortunate that despite the fact that we have wonderful nurses, doctors and health workers throughout the whole of the Shropshire health economy, we now have a deficit of more than £50 million, which is made up of the deficits in Shropshire County primary care trust, Telford and Wrekin primary care trust and the Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust. The deficit will clearly have an impact on front-line patient care.

We were told in the previous debate that such deficits would not have an impact on patient care, but it is inevitable that they will. Indeed, that is not just my opinion but that of professionals. I meet nurses and doctors all the time. We recently had a successful march in Shropshire, which was called the march for life, and tried to draw attention to the funding crisis in Shropshire. Many nursing professionals and doctors on the march told me that it would be impossible to find the money through efficiency savings alone. The Minister is an honourable lady, and we get on extremely well together. I hope that she will go back to the Secretary of State after the debate and tell her that Shropshire faces a serious problem.

We heard in the previous debate on health that the situation is often the fault of chief executives. We have had our share of problems with chief executives and chairmen of the hospital trust. Ultimately, however, it is the Secretary of State for Health who approves and appoints the chief executives of trusts, and appoints and agrees to the chairmen of hospital trusts, so the buck must stop with the Secretary of State. That is an important point, because if we accept it the principle of not putting urgent cash injections into trusts can be overcome.

People in Shropshire say to me, "We've paid the taxes, so we expect the health services." The Prime Minister stands at the Dispatch Box week after week and says, "We've put billions of pounds more into the health service," yet people in Shropshire are being asked to have less of a health service for more taxes. Clearly there is a moral point as well as a political one, because the situation is unfair and completely unjustified. An urgent cash injection for the Shropshire health economy is justified if the Secretary of State approved the senior managers whom she then blames for the funding deficit that we face. Additionally, the Government increased national insurance contributions by more than 12 per cent. That has clearly had an impact on the payrolls of all the trusts that I have mentioned, which has had a knock-on effect on patient services, too.

We heard today that the University Hospital of North Staffordshire NHS Trust is laying off 1,000 people, many of whom will be nurses and doctors. That will also have an impact on the Shropshire health economy. Many of my constituents journey across the border for treatment. Those who require brain surgery are dealt with in Staffordshire, as are people who require thoracic surgery and complex spinal surgery that cannot be dealt with in Oswestry; there are fine people in that unit. The situation will thus have an impact on my constituents.

It is of grave concern when the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy) admits to a measure of concern about such issues. There is much concern about those issues and it is deeply concerning that everything I have heard from the Government side of the Chamber today—apart from the speech by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly), which was thoughtful and brave—has been marked by denial and complacency. No Government, of whatever political persuasion, or however good they are at communication, public relations and marketing, can spin their way out of people's own personal experiences.

When people come to my surgery, they tell me of the experiences that they have had at the local hospital. Many of them join me in praising the professionalism of the staff, both on the front line and in the back office, the porters and those working on the switchboard. Nobody underestimates the professionalism and commitment of hospital staff, but people are concerned when they are turned away after they have gone in for surgery. We know that the Minister said earlier that nobody waits longer than six months for an operation, but the NHS website—a Government website—today states that the figure has doubled. So I am puzzled by her remarks.

It is not only acute services that will be affected. I am very concerned that the accident and emergency unit at the Princess Royal hospital in my constituency will be cut. It is no good just putting an accident and emergency sign over the door and saying that the hospital has an accident and emergency department. It needs to be fully functioning, and my constituents are concerned that we will lose the doctor-led unit and end up with a nurse-led unit. The nurses do a wonderful job, and paramedics are getting more and more training—they too do a marvellous job—but they cannot replace the expertise and experience of surgeons on site to deal with emergency admissions.

I know that the Minister has visited Shropshire before, and she has kindly accepted a new invitation to come to the hospital in my constituency in the near future. Shropshire is one of the largest inland counties in England, so however quickly and ably ambulance drivers drive, time costs lives, whether from cardiac arrests, aneurysms or severe asthma attacks. I hope that the Minister will give me an assurance this evening that the accident and emergency department at the Princess Royal hospital will remain fully functioning.

The accident and emergency unit has important links to the paediatric services at the hospital. East Shropshire, including Telford and the Wrekin area, is the part of Shropshire with a younger population, so I hope that the Minister will give an undertaking that the children's services will not be affected.

I wish to widen the debate to primary care services, because I am concerned about the knock-on effects on the provision of drugs, especially for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease. Many constituents tell me that they need my help to obtain Alzheimer's drugs for their grandparents or parents. It is a growing issue, and PCTs have reduced funding for it as they face other financial pressures. The same issue applies to anti-TNF drugs, and I hope that the Minister will give a commitment this evening to meet women representing Herceptin 4 Shropshire Now. She will be aware of the group, which represents women who are desperate to receive the drug to prolong their lives and make them more comfortable as they face breast cancer.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. It is not the convention for Front Benchers to intervene in an Adjournment debate.

Mark Pritchard: My hon. Friend mentioned his intention to me before the debate, and I would have been happy to give way to him. However, I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I will move on.

The other primary care issue that I wish to raise is that of mental health services. So often, people suffering from mental health problems are pushed to the back of the queue and the bottom of the pile. My concern is that the pressures on the local primary care trusts in Shropshire mean that many people facing mental health problems are not being treated, and I hope that the Minister will address that issue as well.

I want to touch on neonatal services too. The Minister is aware that there is a fairly new maternity unit at the Princess Royal hospital—nice clean beds, nice paint on the walls and so on—but there is no expertise for dealing with mothers and babies who have complications. If a mother gives birth at the unit and there is a complication, she and her baby have to go at high speed, with blue lights flashing, to Shrewsbury to save her life or the baby's life. Given the demographics of Shropshire, unless that issue is addressed, inevitably—but God forbid—a mother and/or child will, unfortunately, lose their lives.

I have raised serious issues, and we are in serious times, so I hope that as the Government appointed the previous chairman and a series of chief executives they will take responsibility, accept that the buck stops with them and reconsider funding in Shropshire. The problem is not just the financial mismanagement of the previous trust; it relates to historical per capita underfunding for Shropshire patients—my constituents—over many years, going back to 1997–98. That is the key issue, and it should be addressed urgently.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) on securing the debate. As he said, it is one of a number of debates, in which he has taken part, reflecting the situation in his constituency. Obviously, I, too, have participated in those debates, answering for the Government. The hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) have invited me to visit their area and I understand that arrangements are being made. I am looking forward to the visit.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin raised several concerns to which I shall respond, but it is important to remember some of the improvements that have been made to health services in his area. He referred to national insurance contributions, and I remind him that although the Conservatives voted against increased NICs, NICs have actually massively increased investment in the national health service: from £33 billion in 1997 to about £92 billion by 2008. That investment has led to improvements in his area, which I hope that he will recognise.

In 1998, 91 patients waited more than 12 months for in-patient treatment, and 339 patients waited between nine and 11 months, at the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital NHS Trust and the Princess Royal Hospital NHS Trust, which were merged in October 2003. Now, no English patients wait more than six months for treatment at English trusts in Shropshire.

Out-patient waiting times have been reduced. Nobody waits more than 13 weeks for an out-patient appointment in Telford and Wrekin PCT. A total of 100 per cent. of urgent referrals for suspected cancer are seen by a specialist within two weeks, and 100 per cent. of patients who want to do so can see a general practitioner within two working days, or a primary care professional within one working day. Mortality rates for heart disease and cancer have been cut dramatically in the area.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I pay tribute to local staff for their extremely hard work and commitment in helping to make those improvements, but they would not have happened without the extra investment that has been made.

That is not to say that there are no challenges in the area. I shall set out the background to the current position. In October 2003, two trusts merged to form the new Shrewsbury and Telford Hospital NHS Trust. At that time, their combined deficit was approximately £4 million, but by the end of the financial year the deficit had increased to £7 million. In 2004–05, Shropshire and Staffordshire strategic health authority agreed to provide the trust with brokerage of £2 million, on the condition that the trust broke even in that year. Throughout the year, the trust sent returns to the SHA, which was closely examining how the deficit was being handled, but at the end of the year the trust changed its forecast to a £3 million deficit. Then, extremely unfortunately, as the hon. Gentleman said, the external auditors found that, in fact, the trust had run up a £10 million deficit, so at that time the trust had a total deficit of £19 million.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, there was an independent inquiry into the financial management and governance at the trust, which was extremely critical of the former chair, the chief executive and director of finance, all of whom had resigned in the meantime. A new management team is now in place, and I know that the hon. Gentleman thinks highly of them.

Mark Pritchard: I do admire the new senior management team, but does the Minister agree that if the team is to continue to have the support of the local Member of Parliament and of the public, it needs to be transparent and open in its dealings, and that it is not helpful when it sends out mixed messages about the future of the accident and emergency ward?

Ms Winterton: I shall deal with the question of A and E services, but I have looked at the consultation that has taken place and I think that the management have been quite open.

As I said, the trust is forecasting a further deficit of more than £10 million in the current year. The situation is serious and it must be addressed. I believe that we are seeing the whole local health community come together to work out, in consultation with the local community—which has an important part to play—how to manage the situation for the best. Decisions have to be made and acted upon, and I believe that the process being undertaken now is leading in that direction.

The review now being conducted takes in the whole of Shropshire and is considering what can be done to achieve clinical improvements and financially sustainable health services throughout the area. The local NHS commissioned Finnamore Management Consultants to examine a range of options and in November and December last year, a pre-consultation was held involving key stakeholders. The hon. Gentleman pointed out the level of local awareness, which shows that there has been a considerable amount of consultation. What is being considered now is how to assemble a strategic service plan involving all four NHS organisations in the area, with the two PCTs taking the lead on consultation.

Turning to the future of the accident and emergency service at the Princess Royal hospital, it is difficult to comment on the proposals, because it may fall to the Secretary of State to make decisions on them at a future date. I can only repeat the answer that I have previously given to the hon. Gentleman—the trust's new chief executive has made it clear that he would like accident and emergency departments to be provided at both hospitals. I can confirm that the "hot and cold" site option, in which one hospital would deal with emergencies and the other with routine scheduled operations, has been dropped following advice from the joint overview and scrutiny committee, and it will not be submitted for consultation.

Mark Pritchard: Can the Minister rule out the option that the accident and emergency ward at the Princess Royal hospital will change from a doctor-led unit to a nurse-led unit?

Ms Winterton: It is not possible to rule in or rule out a proposal that may be made later. However, I can repeat the chief executive's view for the hon. Gentleman. The "hot and cold" site option was floated, but it has been dropped.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about paediatrics, mental health and neonatal services. Difficult decisions have to be made about service delivery, and we must look at what is most clinically appropriate in different areas. Specialist centres are important, and they are sometimes the best way of delivering care. The issues should be discussed openly, and the options thoroughly considered. It would not be right to make a decision here and now, because it is for clinicians, managers and local people to look at the available options, but they should always remember that what is important is patient safety. The highest-quality services should be provided on the advice of clinicians and others.

Surveys show that only 11 of a total of 84 trusts have considered making small cuts in mental health services. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman's trust is one of those considering that option, and I am happy to write to him with further details. As I have said, the 11 trusts were going to spend £893 million, of which £16 million has been earmarked for service reductions. It is, however, a small percentage of the overall amount spent on mental health.

Mark Pritchard: The Minister has been very generous in giving way. She will be glad to know that this is the last time that I shall seek to intervene.

We are still waiting for the strategic health authority to sign off the mental health plan for the whole of Shropshire, so I hope that she will encourage it to do so, as the plan is desperately needed by mental health patients in my constituency. Finally, will she comment on the proposal by the hospital trust to cut up to 300 jobs, including doctors and nurses? Would that protect front-line patient care, as she mentioned a few moments ago?

Ms Winterton: We have made it clear that it is important for local trusts and local health economies to deal with the financial problems that have built up. Of course, it is regrettable when any redundancy has to occur, but it is important for staff that their local trusts get back on to a stable footing. What is worse for patients and staff is when deficits are allowed to continue without a proper grip being taken of them.

Any proposed significant change will be subject to 12 weeks' public consultation. Strategic health authorities are coming forward where deep-seated problems are found and considering the time scale of the deficits, and they will come back to the Department if it is felt that a longer repayment period is needed. Those detailed plans will be produced shortly.

A turnaround team has gone into the constituency of the hon. Member for The Wrekin and is currently agreeing a tailored package of help with the trust and the SHA. It is important that we have those teams in areas, working with local people and considering how to sort out the problems, while ensuring—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be interested in this—that the trust delivers both its key targets and financial balance. Getting those two things right is essential.

I must reassure the hon. Gentleman that this approach is not about denial or complacency—quite the opposite: it is about saying that those problems have existed for some years, but it is important that we sort them out. It would be complacent if we were not to sort them out. Local people and staff would not appreciate it if they felt that we were not working with the local health staff and health economies in ensuring that we were proposing packages that got the trusts back into financial balance, while ensuring that they continue to meet their key targets.

In conclusion, enormous improvements have been made in the health services in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Investment has been increased, but challenges lie ahead. I re-emphasise that a programme has been put in place to achieve those aims. That is the right approach for local people, for patients and for the hard-working and committed NHS staff in his constituency.

TRANSPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Local Transport Monopolies

1. Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): What discussions he has had with the Office of Fair Trading on local transport monopolies. [59776]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): My officials meet regularly with the Office of Fair Trading. It is for the competition authorities to consider whether a local monopoly is abusing its position and having a detrimental effect on consumers.

Mr. Turner: Wightlink, which enjoys what the OFT calls a dominant position in the cross-Solent ferry market, has just been sold for £230 million, which can only be recouped from its customers. Fares have increased significantly, potentially damaging the local economy and causing hardship particularly to those who have to travel because of a need for health care. Does the Secretary of State agree that instead of launching investigations only after the ill effects become apparent, the OFT should keep local transport monopolies under review and ensure a fair deal for local communities?

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having raised his concern directly with my Department. I appreciate the problem that he sets out. I think that the competition authorities last looked at the position on the Isle of Wight in 1995, although there was a further review in 2000. The test is not whether there is a monopoly but whether those involved are abusing the position. As I understand it, there are three operators on the Isle of Wight, two of which are bigger than the other one. If the hon. Gentleman, or anyone else on the Isle of Wight, has a particular problem, he might want to raise it with the OFT.

On the hon. Gentleman's general point, I am not sure that I would want the Competition Commission to keep a constant watch over everything that might constitute a monopoly. I imagine that its resources would have to be significantly increased were that to happen. The best thing to do in relation to this particular case, if the hon. Gentleman is so minded, is to raise it with the authorities.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that open access arrangements on our railways can have a very positive effect? Does he particularly welcome the competition that will be created by the proposed link between Wrexham and London, which will compete with the Virgin railway service that currently operates?

Mr. Darling: Competition can be beneficial. However, it is also important to ensure that there is sufficient capacity on the railway lines to allow for additional services to run, whether between Wrexham and London or anywhere else. The other relevant factor that must be considered is the effect that it has on the overall finances of the railways.

Air Travel

2. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): What his policy is on the extent to which demand for air travel should be met by increased spending on infrastructure. [59777]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): Investment in airport infrastructure is essential in order to deliver the objectives of the White Paper that I published in 2003 and to ensure the international competitiveness of the UK. Perhaps I should draw the House's attention to a statement that I made this morning on the Government's response to the Civil Aviation Authority's price control review consultation, which emphasises the importance of investment in order to deliver the objectives of the Government's White Paper. I also draw the House's attention to the recent statement by the CAA, which stressed the importance of airport operators maintaining a sufficient credit rating to be able to fund future investment.

Mr. Crabb: Given that the White Paper forecasts that demand for airport capacity in the south-east region will reach £300 million passengers by 2030—more than double today's level—and that existing airport capacity serving this market is already, in effect, fully utilised, how confident is the Secretary of State that current plans for the provision of additional runway capacity in the south-east will match this demand in a timely and appropriate manner? What does he think will be the consequences for the UK if we fail to do so?

Mr. Darling: I am in no doubt that if we do not implement the proposals set out in the White Paper of three years ago, that will have adverse consequences for the United Kingdom. I am concerned that the hon. Gentleman's Front Benchers seem to be having doubts about the position that I set out in 2003, which strikes a reasonable balance between the need to meet some of the increased demand that will come in the south-east and elsewhere and the need to meet our environmental obligations.

As the hon. Gentleman suggests, the problem that we now face is that Heathrow is full for most of the day, Gatwick is fairly well used, and growth at Stansted has been dramatic over the past few years. If we get ourselves into a position whereby we do not take decisions, which is essentially what happened in this country for nearly 20 years, or do not accept that some capacity is needed to meet all the demand that might arise, the position of the UK generally will be very bad. That is why I believe that what I set out in the White Paper in 2003 was right then and remains right now.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): On the specific problem of airports, does my right hon. Friend agree that, given the BAA's virtual stranglehold in the south-east and throughout the country, it is now time to do something? In addition, given the speculation about that company, does he believe that it is time to consider breaking it up to allow development elsewhere, by airports such as Prestwick in my constituency, so that they can fight on a level playing field rather than suffer strangulation by the BAA?

Mr. Darling: I am not sure whether I agree with my hon. Friend. First, it is up to the competition authorities to decide whether an abuse of the monopoly position has occurred and, if so, to make recommendations. It is not open to the Government to expropriate property from a private company—that is not the right approach.

The BAA is currently committed to substantial investment in not only the London airports but airports in Scotland, as my hon. Friend knows. However, the competition position is for the Competition Commission to determine, as set out in the Enterprise Act 2002. It is important that investment is maintained in airports, whether by BAA or anyone else. No Government can be indifferent to that.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): The Government have committed themselves to an extra runway at Stansted, despite its failure to attract long-haul operators. Who will pay for upgrading the railway line, which, as the Secretary of State knows, is getting slower through the extra stops? Who will pay for the water that is needed at a time of unprecedented water shortages in the area? Above all, who is responsible for joined-up government, covering every issue from skills shortages to housing shortages, which will arise as a consequence?

Mr. Darling: I am intrigued by the hon. Gentleman's proposition that an airport is not an airport unless is caters for long-haul flights. Stansted has many short-haul flights, and many low-cost airlines fly into it. Millions of people every year fly from Stansted to different parts of Europe. It is a viable airport. The test is not whether it has long-haul flights.

As I have said on several occasions, the White Paper strikes the right balance on the need to increase capacity, especially in the south-east. If we do not do that, the implications for this country are serious, not only in loss of business to other parts of the world but in relation to the country's economic health.

If an application to build a second runway is granted, the developer will be required to meet some of the additional costs for surface access. The Government have much responsibility for the general railway network and the line from Cambridge to Liverpool Street. That presents a problem for the hon. Gentleman. He cannot say that he favours more investment while signing up to a policy that means cuts in investment.

Mr. John MacDougall (Glenrothes) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend continue to press the case for improved links between Fife and airports such as Edinburgh? Will he do what he can to encourage BAA to improve the links and make the necessary investment for better public access?

Mr. Darling: Yes, I will. The Scottish Executive propose a railway line from Fife as well as Edinburgh and Glasgow through Edinburgh airport, and BAA is fully involved in that. If that happened, it would provide fast links from all over Scotland to Edinburgh airport, which is one of the airports that the White Paper identifies as experiencing significant growth in the next 30 years.

Blackpool Trams

3. Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): What discussions he has had with Blackpool council on investment in the town's trams. [59778]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not had any discussions with Blackpool council about investment in the trams. However, officials from the Department have had several meetings with the promoters, Blackpool and Lancashire councils, to discuss their proposals to upgrade the tramway.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Under-Secretary set out a timetable for a decision on any request for extra investment? Will he study carefully any request to deregulate from the rail vehicle accessibility regime, which is imposed 100 per cent. on the Blackpool trams? If there is no deregulation, that could threaten their existence in the long run.

Derek Twigg: Blackpool has said that it needs £16 million over the next three years to keep the tramway running. This issue is being considered as part of the regional priorities exercise that we have carried out around the regions, including the north-west. Ministers are considering those priorities at the moment, and we will make an announcement in due course.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that Blackpool council had to undertake emergency repairs on the tram track in Fleetwood last year? The only answer to these problems is proper investment, because that tram track carries not only tourists visiting the area but local residents—my constituents—who travel to work between Blackpool and Fleetwood and who are getting increasingly anxious about the trams' future.

Derek Twigg: My hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) have been great champions of, and advocates for, the trams in Blackpool. In fact, I recently responded to an Adjournment debate secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South on the subject. I am aware of the importance that Blackpool places on the trams in regard to its economic regeneration. The matter is under consideration as part of the regional priorities exercise in the north-west, and we shall make an announcement on our decision in due course.

Rail Capacity (Chippenham/Paddington)

4. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the rail capacity available for trains from Chippenham to London Paddington. [59779]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): The most recent assessment of the rail capacity available for trains from Chippenham to London Paddington was made in the Great Western main line route utilisation strategy, which was published in its final form by the Strategic Rail Authority in June 2005.

Mr. Gray: That is an entirely factual response, but the truth that lies behind the Minister's answer is that substantial cuts have been made to rail services in the west country. In Chippenham, we have lost our early morning train to London, the 5 o'clock service. We have also lost any possible connection with Oxford, to which there used to be a direct line. We used to have a service via Didcot, but 18 fewer trains a day now stop at Didcot. We have also lost our west Wiltshire link to Waterloo. The truth is that deep and damaging cuts have been made to our rail services in Chippenham and across the west country, and that is directly attributable to this Government. Does the Minister not accept that, if he puts up the price of a return rail ticket from London to Chippenham to £100 and cuts the train services, people will get back into their cars?

Derek Twigg: The hon. Gentleman has spoken to me before about these concerns. A consultation exercise has taken place, and our officials will be talking to First Great Western about the results to see where we can make improvements. I must point out, however, that most people in the greater western area are either getting the same service or seeing an improvement in services.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Will the Minister confirm that the cutbacks to rail services in the Chippenham area, and in the west of England as a whole, were specified by his Department in the detailed documentation for the Great Western franchise?

Derek Twigg: The hon. Gentleman will know that we put part of the base case as part of the invitation to tender and the specification process. If representatives of First Great Western want to come to us with proposals for improvements in services that would not have an impact on the capacity of the rest of the line, we will listen to them and talk to them about that. The key issue here is that, apart from the fact that most people are experiencing the same or better services, there will be £200 million worth of investment going into trains and stations along the First Great Western route.

Chris Grayling: I think that that is an admission. Does the Minister realise the consequences for my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) and other hon. Members of the Government's decisions to cut back services in many parts of the west country? Last week, I visited a rural station in Hampshire where the train used by local children to get to school is to be axed as a result of the specification that has come from the Minister's Department. How can he expect people to leave their cars at home and use public transport when his Department is taking decisions to cut their train services?

Derek Twigg: Let us be clear about this. We are investing £87 million a week in the railways, the number of rail passengers increased to 1 billion last year, and we now have the youngest rolling stock that we have had for years. In regard to the First Great Western franchise, let me repeat that we are investing £200 million in trains and stations, and most people will experience the same or better services. We shall listen to the results of the consultation, but the key issue is that the Government are investing in the railway—which is resulting in improving services and a growth in passenger numbers—unlike the Tories, who did not invest in the railway. We are now picking up the pieces after those decades of underinvestment.

Pensioner Travel

5. Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): What steps he is taking to encourage local authorities to enter into reciprocal agreements on free off-peak travel for pensioners. [59780]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): We are keen for local authorities to work together to provide cross-boundary, county or region-wide schemes where that suits local circumstances. Local authorities will have the discretion to work together to provide cross-boundary travel, as they do at present, based on their judgment of local needs and their overall financial priorities.

Mr. Hoyle: Is my hon. Friend aware that there are no such agreements in Lancashire? At the moment, pensioners are able to travel free only within each small district, which goes against the ethos of the Government's provisions. It is wrong that people in Greater Manchester, London and every other major city will be able to travel free across several districts, while free travel will be available only within each district in Lancashire. That is unacceptable. It is not the way forward for pensioner travel. What can the Minister do to end the postcode lottery for pensioner travel in Lancashire to ensure that my pensioners get a fair deal, just like pensioners in the rest of the country?

Dr. Ladyman: I am sure that my hon. Friend would be the first to acknowledge that the Government have done their part by making a substantial amount of money available for free travel for pensioners. Other counties have been able to reach agreements that have allowed cross-county travel to be provided. I hope that, even at this stage, Lancashire will try to find a way forward to offer the service that is being offered in many other counties.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): My constituency contains two major towns, Wellingborough and Rushden, but they fall into two different district council areas. When free off-peak travel for pensioners was announced, it was welcomed by local people, but they have found that it does not, in effect, apply to them, as they cannot use the No. 46 bus that links the two towns.

Dr. Ladyman: Once again, it is for the two boroughs to discuss how they can work together to provide that sort of service. At present, boroughs work together to make the half-fare concessionary services available. All we are doing is providing additional money so that they can provide free local services. It should not be beyond the wit of local councils to see whether there is a way forward through working together.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that the passenger transport authority in south Yorkshire is using the money that it is getting from central Government, together with the existing money that it is spending on its current discount scheme, to ensure that pensioners get free travel from not 9.30 but 9 o'clock, not merely on the bus but on the tram and train as well, and also on journeys between south Yorkshire and west Yorkshire and some journeys between Sheffield and Derbyshire? Is not that a good example of a Labour Government and Labour local authorities working together for the benefit of pensioners?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is a good example of councils getting together to provide added benefits with the money from the Government. There is no reason why all those other Tory councils cannot do the same.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I take it from the Minister's answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) that the real answer is that the Government are taking no steps to encourage reciprocal agreements between local authorities. Does not he accept that when many local authorities are struggling to meet the costs of funding concessionary travel, and having to cut existing, local, popular concessionary schemes, that will simply not be good enough?

Dr. Ladyman: First, I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new portfolio, and I hope that he enjoys it very much. How can we, as he puts it, not be encouraging such schemes when we are putting £350 million into making the service available? If councils are not able to work together to make that into a reality, I suggest that people ask questions of those local councils. Such a substantial additional sum of money will provide free bus travel for pensioners all around the country, and he should welcome it as good news.

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Following the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), may I reiterate the problems experienced by Lancashire, with 12 district councils and the county council having to reach agreement? There are real problems, if those 13 councils do not reach agreement, about not having a scheme at all. Will the Minister be proactive in leading discussions with Lancashire councils on a way forward to ensure that my constituents can get to local hospitals and shopping centres without having to pay half-fare, which is the existing scheme?

Dr. Ladyman: I find it difficult to understand how the Government can be criticised for putting an extra £350 million into free travel for old people. It seems obvious that councils in Lancashire need to get together and come up with a solution that can meet local needs and the demands of my hon. Friend's constituents. If they are not prepared to do that, I suggest that he reminds people that local elections are coming up soon.

Rail Services (Greater London)

6. Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): If he will make a statement on the performance of rail services in Greater London. [59781]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): The performance of rail services in Greater London continues to improve. In February 2006, which is the last period for which I have figures, punctuality on South West Trains, which serves the hon. Lady's constituency, stood at 93.5 per cent.

Justine Greening: One aspect of performance that is often overlooked, although it is very important to my constituents who use Putney main line station, is ticketing. Pre-paid Oyster cards are now used regularly by my constituents who take the tube, but many who begin their journeys at Putney main line station want to be able to use flexible tickets there as well. Can the Secretary of State say whether the Government intend the tender document for the South West Trains franchise, which is due to be renewed in February 2007, to mandate franchise bidders to offer pre-pay or flexible ticket systems?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Lady makes a good point. We want to ensure that Oyster cards—and the next generation of cards—are available not just in Greater London but in the rest of the country, so the invitation to tender, which we will publish shortly, will include that requirement.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend may know of the tragic accident that occurred in my constituency over the weekend, when two 16-year-olds were ploughed down by a train travelling at 80 mph. Rumours abound about why it happened, and obviously we must await the facts, but it is already clear that there were no lights or safety gates at the crossing, and that there was no warning sound when a train was approaching. Will my right hon. Friend reassure me that there will be a proper inquiry, that a report with recommendations will follow, and that, while we wait for the recommendations, the crossing will be closed to ensure the safety of others who wish to cross the line?

Mr. Darling: I understand my hon. Friend's concern about the accident, and we must extend our sympathy to the families of the two young boys who lost their lives. I would, however, caution my hon. Friend and the House about reaching conclusions on what happened at this stage. An investigation is in progress, and it might be better to await its conclusions before drawing our own.

This was a tragic accident and we must do our best to prevent such events, but, as the House will appreciate, railways are inherently dangerous places for people who go on to them. We need to find out how those young boys came to be on the line and what they were doing, and then draw our conclusions accordingly.

Light Rail/Trams (Funding)

7. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): If he will make a statement on future funding of light rail and trams. [59782]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): Trams can be very effective in areas with heavy traffic. We remain prepared to support trams where they are the right solution, but we must take account of the cost. In many cases a well-designed and promoted bus-based system is likely to provide a more cost-effective solution.

Andrew Stunell: The Minister and I share an interest in improved public transport in the north-west. Can he confirm that the south-east Manchester multi-modal study continues to be a priority for him and his Department, and that therefore the extension of the Metrolink tram to Manchester airport and Stockport town centre also remains a priority for him?

Derek Twigg: We are awaiting regional advice on the study, but, as the hon. Gentleman will know, this year we devolved some decision-making on priorities to the regions. The regional priorities have been submitted to the Department, and we are considering the various schemes that have been suggested, including those from the north-west.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I acknowledge the Government's real commitment to the Manchester Metrolink, including the extension to Ashton-under-Lyne, which will go through my constituency. For the vast majority of people in Denton and Reddish, however, the bus will still be the main form of public transport. What discussions has my hon. Friend had with Stagecoach Manchester, particularly on the subject of tram-like buses?

Derek Twigg: I know that my hon. Friend is a champion for his constituents when it comes to improving transport. I have had no discussions with Stagecoach Manchester about buses, but as part of the overall public transport agenda we must try to find the best solution for each area. If possible that will include integration, whether it involves buses, trams or other forms of transport. I will try to find out more about what discussions have taken place, and then inform my hon. Friend.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Is any consideration being given to restoring the tram service to Birmingham? That would greatly improve congestion for those who go into the city every morning. Some of the routes for the tram service that was withdrawn still exist, and could be used for the new service.

Derek Twigg: As the hon. Lady probably knows, Centro has submitted a scheme. It is also one of the regions that have involved themselves in the transport innovation fund. We will decide on its proposals in due course, when we know the details.

High Occupancy Vehicle Lanes

8. Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): What plans he has to use high occupancy vehicle lanes to tackle congestion. [59783]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): Yesterday, I announced that the Highways Agency will trial a car-share lane on the junction of the M606 and the M62 south of Bradford. A second car-share lane will be created on the M1 between junctions 7 and 8—the St. Albans to Luton stretch. Construction started yesterday.

Lynda Waltho: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer; however, we in Stourbridge and the wider black country have our own congestion problems. Will he ensure that the lessons learned from these trials are shared with those who plan transport in the west midlands, so that our congestion and traffic-flow problems can be dealt with?

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend, and the conclusions that we draw from these trials will be available to local authorities. Authorities in two parts of the country have already used car-share lanes, which have resulted in a decrease in journey times and more people sharing lifts. The system works in America, Australia and Canada and there is no reason why it should not work here. Of course, we are also doing other things. As my hon. Friend says, there are congestion problems in the west midlands, but measures such as the traffic management scheme on the M42—from next year, use will be made of the hard shoulder during peak times—show that we are getting more out of the current network. As she will be aware, one of our priorities must be to get more out of what we have. We cannot simply build our way out of the problems that we face because of increasing pressure from cars and lorries.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I ask the Secretary of State whether high-occupancy vehicle lanes can also be used by public service transport, given that such vehicles are of course high-occupancy vehicles? Following up the questions from the hon. Members for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) and for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow), would it not be helpful if the allocation of resources for retired people was made more equal throughout the country, because it is the allocation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Someone of the hon. Gentleman's experience should know that he should not string on to his first question a second one that is outside the scope of the question before us.

Mr. Darling: In the light of your warning shot, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall answer the first question but not the second; perhaps I will come back to it on another occasion. I am not sure how many buses travel along the stretch of motorway in question. However, the precise regulations will be laid during the next few weeks. In general, we are trying to encourage people who are minded to share vehicles in order to secure priority to do so; indeed; I met a number of people in Leeds and Bradford yesterday who did just that. As I have said, the system works elsewhere and there is no reason why it should not do so in this country. We need to come up with thoughtful and radical solutions to the congestion problems that we face, for the very obvious reasons that we have discussed on many occasions in this place.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): For a moment, I was worried that I had stumbled into transport in Lancashire questions. One of these new, shared-vehicle lanes is on the M62 close to my constituency, and my right hon. Friend is absolutely right to experiment with this scheme. As I saw when I was in north America, it is a very effective way of speeding up traffic. However, will he look more closely at the M62 and at junction 27 in particular, which is a real worry? The M62 will seize up if he does not act more boldly in sorting out the problem.

Mr. Darling: As my hon. Friend knows, there are proposals to deal with congestion problems on various parts of the M62, and I shall write to him about junction 27. As he says, car-pool lanes, as they are known in north America, do work; indeed, I have driven along them myself. They have significantly reduced congestion on both the east and west coast, and they are good for the environment because they encourage the use of fewer cars.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I am surprised by that last comment. A recent report from the University of California, Berkeley suggests that car-pool lanes are underused in California and that they have resulted in increased average journey times. That was confirmed by the Legislative Analyst's Office, which showed that capacity is running at only about two thirds. The Secretary of State mentioned Canada earlier, but a recent report by the Fraser Institute—under the helpful heading "HOV Lanes Make No Sense"—said that high-occupancy vehicle lanes are seriously underused in the Greater Vancouver Regional District. Did the Secretary of State or any of his officials read these reports, which were published very recently, before making yesterday's announcement?

Mr. Darling: Yes, we have read them, and my experience is that one does not have to go far to find an expert report condemning any proposition in respect of transport that one cares to put forward. I was struck by something that the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), who speaks for the Conservatives on these matters, said the other day. He said:

> "I think we have not had a clear transport strategy in this party in recent years; we've had tactical positions."

I suspect that what we have heard from the Opposition today is simply a tactical position.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): I welcome the proposals for a car share lane on the M1 up to my constituency in Luton. It will benefit local people and those using London Luton airport, which we hope will be expanded. Will my right hon. Friend look at ways to encourage the local authority to work with local businesses and the airport to facilitate car-sharing schemes, so that we can continue to reduce congestion on the M1 and make maximum use of what is an excellent proposal to reduce congestion generally?

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her support. Given that all parties are considering ways to reduce the environmental damage caused by cars and by transport in general, any suitable proposal should be examined. I am sorry that the Opposition have turned their minds against that. We know that they oppose the climate change levy, but they also seem to be against just about everything else that would help to improve the environment. We are prepared to put these measures in place, no matter how difficult that may be. We will not run away from difficult decisions.

Transport Infrastructure (South Hampshire)

9. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): If he will make a statement on the transport infrastructure in south Hampshire. [59784]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): We are aware that local authorities in south Hampshire have ambitious plans for growth. We look forward to seeing their proposals to support that in their new local transport plan.

Peter Viggers: Is the Minister aware that 38,000 people on the Gosport peninsula have jobs, but that there are only 19,000 jobs on the peninsula? The result, of course, is a tidal flow of traffic out and in every day, which causes intense frustration for people stuck in that slow-moving traffic jam. The Government encouraged Hampshire county council to consider a light rapid transit scheme and then turned the idea down flat. They refused to compensate the council and its council tax payers for the costs incurred. When will there be a new Minister for local transport who will honour the promise that there would be a meeting with the county council to discuss the way ahead? What chances are there of improvement and will the Government fund it?

Dr. Ladyman: On the south Hampshire rapid transit scheme, the Government said in March 2001 that we would consider it but that the public contribution had to be capped at £170 million. That cost had risen by £100 million by 2003. In 2005, south Hampshire produced a much reduced scheme costing £250 million-odd at today's prices. That increase in costs is not sustainable and that was why the Government were not prepared to back the scheme any further. Of course we are prepared to meet the local council to talk about these issues and to try to find a constructive way forward. We have made that offer already and look forward with great interest to studying the council's further plans.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): The Minister referred to the plans of councils in south Hampshire for more development and more transport infrastructure. Will he commit to work with them, so that firm and costed plans are in place before new housing developments are begun? Many of the problems in south Hampshire arise from the fact that, in the past, transport infrastructure has lagged behind housing developments.

Dr. Ladyman: Of course my Department and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will work closely with local councils. That is happening already, but plans must be practical, affordable and sustainable. These are difficult questions to answer, but we will make sure that infrastructure funding is available to support much needed growth in the area.

Trunk Roads (East Anglia)

10. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When he next expects to meet East Anglia's local authorities to discuss improvements to local trunk roads. [59785]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): We currently have no plans to meet local authorities in East Anglia to discuss improvements to either local or trunk road schemes.

Mr. Bellingham: I am sorry to hear that, because if the Minister had a meeting, he would learn that Norfolk has fewer trunk road bypasses and less dual carriageway than any other county in England. Not only is that harming the quality of life in many villages, it is holding back job creation and enterprise. When will work commence on the A47 Middleton-East Winch bypass and when can we expect some improvements on the A17?

Dr. Ladyman: Although I have no plans to meet the local authorities, we have been talking to them and to the region about plans hitherto. I have visited the A47 to see the issues for myself. We have just had guidance from the region about where road funding priorities ought to lie. We are considering that and will make our decision known very soon. I remind the hon. Gentleman that, given what he has just said, he might want to discuss the presumption against road building, as it was described, with the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who is leading the Conservative commission on that subject.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware of the Highways Agency's proposals for repairing the lift-up bridge on the A12 trunk road in the middle of Lowestoft? It envisages closing the bridge down for whole weekends, which will bring the town to a standstill. It simply would not be able to function if that were to happen. The cost to the town would be enormous in terms of lost hours, lost production and lost business. Will he look into that matter and agree to meet me before any final decision is made on what kind of contract will be offered?

Dr. Ladyman: Of course I will meet my hon. Friend to discuss that. The Highways Agency will consult thoroughly to find the best way forward. Obviously, if repairs are needed, we have to find some way of dealing with the problem without disrupting traffic for his constituents and others in the town. We will do our best to do that and I will make sure that he and I meet to discuss it.

A303

11. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What the timetable is for the planned improvements to the A303 in Somerset; and if he will make a statement. [59787]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): We are considering the south-west region's advice on its priorities for major schemes in the south-west, including schemes on the A303. We hope to announce our response to that advice later in the year.

Mr. Heath: There are two things that interest my constituents: the Sparkford to Ilchester safety improvements and the replacement of the road surface on the A303 with a low noise surface. We are disappointed that, given that other schemes on the A303 have been delayed for unavoidable reasons, the safety improvements—not capacity improvements—between Sparkford and Ilchester have not been brought forward. There is also disappointment that the anticipated change of road surface has apparently been delayed because the money that would have been used has gone instead to the A1. Will the Minister consider both schemes and write to me to say whether they can be undertaken at the earliest possible opportunity? They would improve my constituents' quality of life.

Dr. Ladyman: I will write to the hon. Gentleman and tell him what the latest position is on any safety and surface improvements that are needed on those roads. As for the capacity increases, he is a member of a party with a presumption against road building—we are constantly being told that we should not be building any—but he and the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Andrew Stunell) between them have proposed £2 billion of road building.

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): There is an intrinsic link between the A303 project being mooted by the Government and the A358 dualling, which links the end of the Ilminster bypass on the A303 to junction 25 of the M5 at Taunton. Will the Minister give us an update on the progress that the Government are making with the dualling of the A358 on that stretch and when they anticipate starting work on that project?

Dr. Ladyman: Once again, we are considering the advice from the south-west region on priorities and as soon as we have that advice, we will make it known.

UK Airports

13. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the effect of the structure of British Airports Authority airports on his policy on UK airports. [59789]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to Question 2.

Tony Lloyd: Referring to that answer, although I accept that it is the competition authorities that must ultimately decide on the balance of advantage, will the Minister ask the competition authorities if they will look carefully at producing a report on the costs and benefits of the BAA monopoly, particularly in the south-east, and the way in which that impacts on airlines and the travelling public, particularly in the light of the calls for the break-up of BAA by many of the internationally known airlines?

Mr. Darling: We have responded to the Civil Aviation Authority consultation, which deals with the designation of the London airports. Any question of an investigation of the ownership of those airports has to be dealt with by the competition authorities. The most important thing is for us to ensure that, whoever owns the airports, we get the investment that we need to provide additional runway and terminal capacity. That is the most important thing for the well-being of the economic health of this country. As I said earlier, no Government can be indifferent to that.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): When my right hon. Friend considers the structure of BAA and airports in the months to come, will he widen his net to look at those cases in which regional airports are owned by the same organisation? The Manchester Airport Group owns the large Manchester airport, as well as East Midlands airport in my constituency, which has significant problems that MAG has not addressed. Will he also review regional airport ownership?

Mr. Darling: No, there is no reason why Manchester Airport Group or anyone else should not own East Midlands airport. The test is whether there is a monopoly and whether that monopoly power is being abused. That is what the competition authorities have to decide under the Enterprise Act 2003. There is no reason why a company cannot own more than one airport. What is important is that the company concerned is prepared to commit sufficient investment to ensure that the airport can meet the demands on it and continue to contribute to the British economy. East Midlands airport, as my hon. Friend knows, has seen a substantial increase in freight traffic. I appreciate that there are local concerns about noise, but the contribution that the airport makes to the east midlands economy, and therefore to jobs, cannot be overlooked.

Night Flights

14. Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): If he will make a statement on the frequency of night flights to Heathrow airport. [59790]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): The Government set night flying restrictions at Heathrow airport on a seasonal basis. Those restrictions include a limit on the number of flights to and from the airport between 23.30 and 06.00. For winter 2005–06, that limit was 2,550; for summer 2006, it will be 3,250. That works out on average as about 16 flights per night; however, the limit is not set on a nightly or weekly basis.

Mr. Mackay: Does the Minister accept that many of my constituents believe that there are more night flights in and out of Heathrow, which are causing unreasonable disruption? Can he give some assurances that the limit will not be raised in the future?

Derek Twigg: The right hon. Gentleman knows that last year we had the second stage of a consultation on night flying restrictions that will apply from October 2006 to October 2012. It a question of striking a balance between the economic benefits and the noise nuisance caused. We need to consider that carefully.

Secure Station Scheme

17. Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): If he will make a statement on the outcomes from the secure station scheme. [59794]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): Network Rail and most train operating companies are participating in the scheme. Their accredited stations have a comprehensive package of measures to reduce crime and reassure passengers. The relaunch of the scheme last March has seen a 52 per cent. increase in accredited stations.

Simon Hughes: Is the Minister willing to meet a delegation of London Members of Parliament to consider the fact that several underground stations have lost their safe accreditation and many commuter stations on the overground rail system are also not regarded as safe? At such a meeting, we could consider what is a major issue for London and what we could do to make all stations, not only those in the capital city, safe at all times for all passengers.

Derek Twigg: As the hon. Gentleman knows, there is a difference between the Mayor's responsibilities and the Department's responsibilities. We want improvements in security at all stations, including CCTV. We have the secure station scheme, and the new South Western franchise includes a particular section on the need to consider and improve security. I would be happy to meet him to discuss the issue, but he will understand the division of responsibilities between the Mayor and Ministers.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend have discussions with the Minister for Economic Development and Transport of the Welsh Assembly Government and bring to the attention of the appropriate Minister the fact that stations such as Bangor in my constituency are unmanned after 9.30 pm? It is not only a question of security, but of people with disabilities not receiving the help and attention they need when using lifts and so on.

Derek Twigg: My hon. Friend takes a great interest in rail matters and I have met her and colleagues to talk about train services in Wales. As she knows, responsibility for trains in Wales has been transferred to the Welsh Assembly, so it would be best for her to direct her representations to the relevant Minister in the Assembly. I am sure that she understands that we are very much aware of the situation and want improvements in security at stations.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I am grateful for the interest that the Minister has shown in the Cotswold line recently, but sadly it is too late to deal in the franchise process with the large number of unmanned stations on the line because the franchise has been let. In future franchise extensions and renewals, will the Department take a careful look at suggestions from train operating companies that more stations should have people actually manning them? As the hon. Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams) has just said, it is intimidating for elderly and disabled people in particular who are trying to get access to rail stations.

Derek Twigg: As the hon. Gentleman mentioned, we have exchanged correspondence on those issues and discussed them at previous Question Times. I understand his point, but we have to look on a station-by-station basis at the business case and at affordability, in terms of achieving the best value for money through improvements in the whole franchise. The early part of the Greater Western franchise will put in £200 million of investment, which will obviously improve trains and stations. We want improvements in those areas, but we have to look at things station by station.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was asked—

Information Technology

19. Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the use of information technology to help reform public services. [59768]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Jim Murphy): Information technology is an essential component of the Government's programme to reform public services and enable citizen choice. IT can help deliver the responsive and increasingly personalised services that the public increasingly have a right to expect.

Anne Snelgrove: My hon. Friend knows, because I wrote to him last week, that we have a particular problem in Swindon, which I am trying to help the local education authority to solve. The LEA and schools feel that not enough children are taking up free school meals, which affects both funding and the relative position of schools in examination groups. Is there anything that my hon. Friend can do to help Swindon LEA to improve the take-up of free school meals so that the LEA receives fair funding and the young people have the number of teachers they need in front of them in their classes?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is right. She has raised the matter on a number of occasions, not least in an Adjournment debate. I remain disappointed that there is continued misunderstanding about information-sharing under the Data Protection Act 1998, which is why the Cabinet Office is working with the Department for Constitutional Affairs and the Information Commissioner to try to ensure best practice across public services and public organisations so that some of the unfounded concerns about information-sharing are not repeated. A Cabinet Sub-Committee is also looking into the matter. Finally, we are trying to find ways to ensure that businesses and individuals do not have repeatedly to provide the same information, so I hope that my hon. Friend will be relieved to hear that work is ongoing to overcome some of the misconceptions about the 1998 Act.

Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill

20. Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): What recent representations he has received on the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill. [59769]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Jim Murphy): Since the introduction of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill to Parliament on 11 January, I have received about 50 representations from the private and public sectors as well as from individuals.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Does the Minister accept that this is not just about the Procedure Committee, nor people such as my former law lecturer John Spencer and his colleagues at Cambridge, nor even my hon. Friends the Members for Cambridge (David Howarth) and for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), but people such as my 83-year-old constituent who says that we fought world war two to oppose dictatorship, so it is vital that provisions such as those in the Bill do not pass? Can the Minister tell us whether he is listening to the growing number of people, including the whole of my party, who believe that the measure is terrible, bad and wrong, and that it is anti-democratic legislation?

Mr. Murphy: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his new appointment. I cannot congratulate him on the entire contents of his question. I know that the job that he has is not the one that he envisaged, but good luck to him nevertheless.

There is cross-party acknowledgement of the fact that the attempts at better regulation in 1994 and 2001 have not been effective in delivering the type of better regulation and simplification that we hoped for. As we said, a wider power is contained in the Bill, so it is important that we get the protections right as well. Strong protections are needed, so we are continuing to listen about how that can be achieved. As I say, there are meetings with the Chairmen of Select Committees and others to try to get those protections right. We do not want to repeat the problems of the Regulatory Reform Act 2001, with a narrow definition of the nature of the burdens that prevented us from delivering the type of simplification to which businesses and public services are entitled.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Is there not potential in the Bill to cut red tape and administrative burdens not only on business, but on charities and voluntary organisations, which, when run on a small scale, are often administratively stressed? Is that not a very important step forward? Exactly how will that advantage be measured to ensure that we have done all that we need to do and that there are real benefits on the ground?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. and learned Friend is characteristically correct in saying that the enabling powers in the Bill can provide the simplification that charities, voluntary organisations and public servants can expect. I understand that the Charity Commission is working on its simplification plan to find out how we can lift the burden of bureaucracy, administrative burdens and unnecessary regulations from the shoulders of charities and public servants. As that goes on, perhaps we can have conversations with my hon. and learned Friend and others about the most effective way of doing that, but the Bill is about simplifying rules and regulations that relate not only to business, but to the type of organisations that she mentions.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Would that it were, but the fact is that any good that the Bill may do in deregulating will be far outweighed by the extraordinary powers that the Minister is taking to himself and his colleagues in part 1. Part 1 simply will not do, and we will ensure that it proceeds no further. Given that the Bill reorders the relationship between the Executive and the legislature, will he consider the Power commission report as a representation on the Bill? Will he consider the very sensible suggestion that we now need a concordat that limits the powers of the Executive and enshrines the powers of Parliament?

Mr. Murphy: The principle of an additional legislative route through the House was established in the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 and the 2001 Act. Some of the phrases that the hon. Gentleman has used in the past about the power being unprecedented in a time of peace were made about the 1994 Act as well, and that has turned out not to be the case at all. We are happy to continue to listen, and he is aware that we are actively considering how best to include an absolute veto in the Bill, so that the Commons, the Lords and their relevant Committees will ultimately decide whether the Government can progress with any simplification order that they propose. Ultimately, as we extend the power, it is important that we have additional, effective safeguards and protections in place.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I am pleased that my hon. Friend is listening. I do not for a moment doubt that he is well meaning in proposing the measure, but does he accept that many Labour Members have concerns about the possible dangers to Parliament and that it would be wrong for the measure to pass as it stands at the moment? Let us just imagine what another Government could do if the Bill came on to the statute book.

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is right and I am happy to continue the dialogue not only with those who serve on the Select Committees, but with him as well of course. I accept that we need to get the protections and safeguards exactly right, but I hope that he acknowledges that the 2001 Act, which is currently in place, just does not suit the purposes of delivering the better regulation agenda that emerges from the Hampton report and the simplifications plans that are coming from the Departments. I am happy to have that dialogue, but we do not wish to repeat the mistakes and the tight controls in the 2001 Act, which everyone acknowledges was too tightly framed in its legal sense.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): It is not just the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and the TUC who say that the powers are too wide. Is it not right that the business community has got on to the Minister to say that it wants an effective tool for deregulation, not the abolition of parliamentary scrutiny? Is it not right, as reported on Sunday, that Lord Grocott—the Government's Chief Whip in the other place—has expressed concern that if further changes are not made to the Bill,

"we are missing our last opportunity to avoid likely defeat"?

The Minister keeps saying that he will make major changes to the Bill, but when will the amendments be tabled? I have tabled my amendments for debate on Report—10 of them, all of which offer the sort of safeguards that the Select Committees have asked for. When will he table his?

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman knows that we are actively considering the specifics of vetoes and other matters. He knows that because we had a meeting this very morning to discuss those matters, and I had a similar meeting also this morning with those on the Liberal party's Front Bench. As we develop a consensus on how we enable the veto to be placed on the face of the Bill, we will table our amendments at that point.

Business rightly wants simplification and to maintain an additional route for the delivery of the simplification plans so that we maintain UK competitiveness in a global economy. The current legislative process is not fit for purpose and we need an additional way of bringing about the simplification that UK business, public servants and voluntary organisations so badly need.

Directgov Website

21. Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): What plans he has to publicise the Directgov website. [59770]

Mr. Murphy: On 6 March, we launched a marketing campaign to raise awareness of Directgov. The campaign will run for two months and includes the national press, radio advertising and the online media.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: What guidance is being given to local councils, such as Durham city council which serves my constituency, to provide links from their websites to the Directgov website? What information is available to councils in constructing their websites so that they avoid political bias?

Mr. Murphy: I am not aware of the specifics of my hon. Friend's last point about the political bias of council websites. That is not the intention and it is not in the guidance that we would give. It would be disappointing if that was a feature of such facilities. I understand that 379 local councils are actively participating in Directgov and the major piece of advice that the Government give is that the information on such websites has to be trusted, be relevant and add value to people's everyday lives. That is how we will ensure that IT is at the centre of the transformation of people's lives and public services.

British Nationals Abroad

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement in respect of today's publication of the first-ever comprehensive guide to the Government's support for British nationals in difficulty abroad.

It is obviously traumatic to be caught up in any emergency, to fall victim to crime or to have to go to hospital in an emergency. When that happens abroad, it can be worse still for those involved, who might be far from friends and family and unfamiliar with the local language, laws and procedures. It has therefore long been a central task of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to assist British nationals who get into difficulty while travelling or living overseas.

Demand for such support has never been greater. People from the United Kingdom now make more than 65 million overseas trips a year—three times as many as 20 years ago—and a greater proportion of them are travelling independently and to more distant and sometimes more dangerous destinations. Meanwhile, some 13 million British nationals live overseas.

Our travel advice covers 217 countries and territories and the website receives nearly 5 million hits a year. Our consular staff now deal with nearly 3.5 million inquiries a year, including from the 860,000 people who visit our consulates in person, and we help around 85,000 people a year in need of more acute assistance. For example, last year, we supported 4,200 British nationals in hospital abroad, helped the families of 3,900 people who died overseas and dealt with the detention of 6,000 British nationals. Last year, we also assisted nationals affected by major crises, including the hurricanes in America and the Caribbean and the terrorist attacks in Egypt and Turkey, and we continue to provide support to the British victims of the tsunami and their families. In addition, we are the only western nation regularly to provide special consular services for Hajj pilgrims in Saudi Arabia.

We have responded to the growing and changing demand through a programme of major improvements to the consular support that we offer British nationals. After the Bali bombings in October 2002, we set up consular rapid deployment teams, which are on stand-by to travel quickly to the scenes of major emergencies. Today we have twice as many trained consular staff on 24-hour stand-by for those teams as before the tsunami. In addition, we also have a new team based in Hong Kong that covers the Asian region and we will launch another in north America before the hurricane season this year. Our teams now include staff from the police and the Red Cross and medical personnel when they are needed. We have raised the quality of training for our consular staff and made crisis management training obligatory for all our heads of mission overseas, We have set up specialist teams in specific areas, such as forced marriages and child abductions, and recruited specialist advisers in family law and police and social work. We have expanded our 24-hour response centre in London and have new call-handling arrangements with the police to allow us to deal with a very high volume of calls in a crisis.

We are determined to keep improving the support that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office provides. To that end, in the summer of 2004, we asked the National Audit Office to review our consular operations. Its report was published in November last year and I have accepted in full its recommendations—indeed, many have already been implemented. In the report, the NAO noted that the UK "has a reputation among other countries' foreign ministries as world leaders in consular crisis management".

If we are to deliver consular assistance in the most effective and efficient manner possible, the public need to know what support the Foreign Office's staff overseas can provide to them in times of need, and, just as importantly, people need to be clear about what we cannot do. For example, we cannot get people out of jail and nor can we pay their hospital bills. Helping British travellers better to understand what support is available should encourage them to prepare thoroughly and minimise the risks that they take.

It was for those reasons that in the manifesto for the last general election, the Government said that they would on the support that they could offer British nationals in difficulty abroad. I launched the consultation process with a written statement to the House on 20 October last year. My noble Friend Lord Triesman, the Foreign Office Minister with responsibility for the matter, hosted a major consultative event on 27 October with representatives from the House, the travel industry, non-governmental organisations and consumer groups. The consultation period lasted until 30 November and produced an overwhelmingly positive response. The result is the document that I am launching today.

"consult widely before publishing a comprehensive statement"

The fundamental responsibility in respect of the risks of travelling abroad must be met by travellers themselves through an appreciation of the risks and with comprehensive travel insurance that covers the loss of personal effects, medical care, accidents and criminal acts, and, if necessary, repatriation to the UK. The only alternative to the personal responsibility of the traveller is that the taxpayer should meet the cost, but since travel abroad is plainly a matter of choice, and those who do travel abroad tend to have more disposable income than many in this country, it cannot be right for the burden to fall on the taxpayer as a whole.

However, since the atrocities of 11 September 2001, we have accepted that there may be circumstances so grave and exceptional that it is appropriate for the Government, from public funds, to provide exceptional assistance. The available assistance is set out on page 29 of the guide. When we trigger such assistance must be a matter of judgment at the time, and its potential availability should never be seen as a substitute for good insurance cover.

Where there has been a major disaster and we have triggered an emergency package for victims abroad, there has often also been a need for comprehensive support for victims and/or their families on their return to the UK. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport has very kindly taken the lead on this. For victims of the tsunami and their families, for example, we worked with the Red Cross to help those worst affected to gain access to financial support on their return.

[Mr. Jack Straw]

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear that we must examine the question of financial support for those caught up in terrorist attacks overseas. At present, neither our domestic criminal injuries compensation scheme nor any other victim compensation scheme covers those killed or injured abroad. We are now considering a range of options in that respect, and we will make an announcement when we have concluded that consideration.

I have sent copies of the new guide to all hon. Members, and we will also send copies to all libraries and citizens advice bureaux across the UK and to our partners in the travel industry and other associated industries and bodies. We are producing a summary document in leaflet form, which will be available at airports and our travel agency partners. Information based on the guide is being sent out in the form of a checklist for travellers, which will be included with every one of the more than 5 million British passports that we issue each year. We will place the guide on our travel website, from which hard copies can also be ordered. We are also translating it into Welsh, Bengali, Punjabi, Urdu, Gujurati, Arabic and Chinese, and those versions will be available on our website or in hard copy on request.

Within the Foreign Office, the new guide will provide our staff both overseas and in London with a clear statement of exactly what they can and should do for British nationals in difficulty, and it will therefore be an important tool for further improving the quality and consistency of support across our consular network. Next week, I shall launch an updated document setting out the Government's international strategic priorities for the next decade. For the first time, consular work will become a strategic priority in its own right, which means that every one of our heads of mission abroad will have personal responsibility for delivering support for British nationals in difficulty as set out in the new guide.

Almost a year ago to the day, I made a statement to the House on our response to the tsunami in the Indian ocean. I was struck then by the tributes from both sides of the House on the work of our consular staff around the world. Our staff deal face to face and on a regular basis with the kind of traumatic situations that most people rarely have to confront over a lifetime, and I pay tribute to them again today. I am proud that the consular support that we give British nationals abroad is among the very best in the world. I am determined and confident that it will stay that way, and the new guide will be an important tool to that end.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): I welcome the Foreign Secretary's statement and the publication of the new booklet of advice. Our nationals are prolific travellers who, regrettably, will sometimes fall victim to crime, natural disasters or even kidnappings and terrorist incidents. It is absolutely right that they should know what help they can expect from their nearest embassy or consulate and that the common-sense responsibilities of travellers are also made clear. I join the Foreign Secretary in paying tribute to our consular staff around the world, who take on such trying tasks with such incredible dedication.

Within that general welcome, may I press the Foreign Secretary on a few points? First, have all possible lessons been learned from the handling of previous disasters affecting British citizens overseas? Foreign Office staff worked very hard and generally very successfully on the aftermath of the tsunami. However, the Foreign Secretary has referred to the action taken following the Bali bombings, after which, he will recall, the Foreign Office apologised for a lack of co-ordination on bringing home the bodies of British victims, which placed families under enormous pressure. Is he confident that such a lack of co-ordination is now a thing of the past? In looking at the range of options, he has referred to a victims' compensation scheme: what lessons is he learning from the reserve funds and other arrangements for this purpose already established by Australia, Spain, France and Italy?

Secondly, what plans have been put in place to benefit from inter-departmental co-operation in the event of major catastrophes with, for instance, the Ministry of Defence and the Department for International Development? The Foreign Office is not the only arm of the British Government with a presence overseas, and the forced marriage unit run between the Foreign Office and the Home Office is a welcome example of such co-operation. Will the Foreign Secretary explain why the lead Department on looking after victims on their return to the United Kingdom is the Department for Culture, Media and Sport—there is presumably a good reason for that? The Foreign Secretary is smiling, but I am sure that there is a good reason for that.

Given that the security of our missions abroad is of paramount importance to deliver such services to British citizens, is he satisfied that all necessary and proportionate steps have been taken to ensure the safety of embassy and consular staff throughout the world? In considering the position of British nationals abroad, will he comment on US-UK extradition measures and their current operation? Does he accept that there is concern that British citizens have been extradited to the United States for non-terrorist offences without full reciprocity yet by the United States?

Given that the document asks British nationals to have confidence in what the Foreign Office can do for them, will the Foreign Secretary respond to the recent report by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, which commented on a "woeful lack of professional skills and a disturbing series of failings in senior FCO management".

It said that

"the FCO needs to catch up with the rest of Whitehall, by recruiting professionally qualified, experienced people to . . . top . . . roles".

Is the Foreign Secretary satisfied that those criticisms are invalid? If not, are they being acted on?

Finally, what is the impact on the Foreign Office's ability to give appropriate help and advice of the closure of overseas posts and missions? Four posts have closed in Africa, five in the Asia Pacific region and three in the United States. Has any assessment been made of the impact on British travellers? Again, does the Foreign Secretary agree with the Foreign Affairs Committee report that the changes to overseas posts lacked a clear rationale? Does he accept its concern that "a number of the affected Posts are in Commonwealth countries, with which the United Kingdom has had a long and particularly close association."

The initiative is welcome, but I hope that the Foreign Secretary can give us additional assurances on the matters that I have raised.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's welcome for the initiative and for the tribute that he paid to our staff.

He asked whether we have learned lessons from previous emergencies overseas. I believe so, but I am not at all complacent. We all learned from an unsatisfactory performance in Bali. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) is in the Chamber, and I know that he had a tragic and personal experience of that. We must continue to learn lessons. As for a victims' compensation scheme, we are looking at the examples provided by France, Spain, Australia and the other countries mentioned by the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). On the question of whether there is sufficient interdepartmental co-operation abroad, I have never, in fact, seen any problems affecting the co-operation between representatives of different Government Departments abroad. When they are abroad, they represent the British Government and, as I saw in the aftermath of the tsunami and several other disasters including the Istanbul bombings, they do not stand on departmental loyalties—they get down to business. A bigger issue is the co-ordination between British Government Departments once people return home, and the right hon. Gentleman asked why the Department for Culture, Media and Sport has responsibility for co-ordination. In the aftermath of 11 September there was a need for a Department without parti pris to try to bring together other Departments. It was for that reason that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister invited the Departments of Health, Social Security and others to co-ordinate their work, and I think that that arrangement has worked rather well. I accept that it appears slightly eccentric, but there is method.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether necessary and proportionate steps have been taken to protect the security of our staff. Yes, I believe that we are taking such steps, and a very large amount of money has been spent on protecting staff. However, one can never guarantee staff security, as I saw on 20 November 2003. Moreover, we must ask our staff to take risks. I do not want reach the position in which some Governments have found themselves—their staff are in bunkers, unable to communicate with members of the public—and neither do our staff.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): No. 10?

Mr. Straw: I was talking about other countries. Carbolic soap will be provided afterwards.

There is a balance to be struck, but sometimes, as the House knows from the announcement that I made last Tuesday, security becomes paramount.

I understand the concerns that have been expressed about extradition. It is sometimes the case, not only in respect of extradition treaties with the United States, that there is not symmetry when it comes to ratification of such treaties. That is my understanding, but I am happy to pass on the concerns of the House, if such they be, to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me about the criticism from the Foreign Affairs Committee about a skills shortage in the Foreign Office. I shall respond to that report in due course. I thought that the criticism was over-harsh, but I accept that we needed more professional skills, and a great deal of effort is going into recruiting higher levels of professionalism in the finance, human resources and information technology directorates.

The last question was in respect of the closure of posts. We do assess the effect on British travellers and British interests abroad. Some posts have closed; quite a number have opened as well. I hope there will not be any more closures for the foreseeable future. In any event, we never know where the next emergency will arise. We could pepper a country with posts. We might be lucky and the emergency arises close to a post, or we might be very unlucky and it occurs thousands of miles or thousands of kilometres away. We must ensure that we are flexible and can respond rapidly, wherever the emergency takes place.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): I can assure the Foreign Secretary that what I am about to say is not over-harsh. I refer him to the aspects of his statement that take up what the Foreign Affairs Committee was calling for when we asked in our report for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to make it clear to the public that there are limits to what can be done, and that people sometimes have unrealistic expectations about the support that might be available. The Committee praises and is very supportive of the work of our consular staff over the recent past in the case of the tsunami, Hurricane Katrina and other disasters.

I hope my right hon. Friend's statement is the first step towards implementing measures that we have called for. Will he look at the other recommendations in our second report and act on them in a similarly positive way?

Mr. Straw: Yes, I always look at the recommendations of the Foreign Affairs Committee and I respond to them recommendation by recommendation. I am grateful for the praise that the Chairman of the Committee has just offered the House. I endorse what the Committee stated at paragraph 107 of its report:

"We conclude that in recent years excessive and unrealistic expectations have arisen of what the FCO is able to do for people who get into difficulties abroad, including in circumstances such as natural disasters."

We sought to spell out what we think is among the best available assistance, and we also spelled out clearly what the limits are.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): On the Liberal Democrat Benches we, too, welcome the statement and the publication of the new guide. I echo the tributes paid to consular staff, who have often in recent times been called upon to cope with unimaginable and traumatic situations, in addition to all the duties that they perform with professionalism and dedication day in, day out.

In responding to the lessons learned from those catastrophes and the criticisms from the recent National Audit Office and Select Committee reports, will the Foreign Secretary state what additional resources will be made available to the emergency disaster reserve in the future? Will he be more specific about the types of compensation measures he is considering for people who are injured or families who are bereaved as a result of terrorist attacks abroad? What is the time scale for his deliberations?

What level of resources does the right hon. Gentleman have in mind for the scheme? Will the FCO have to find the money from within existing budgets? Finally, what progress is being made in tackling all the identified shortcomings in the Foreign Affairs Committee report, and has he changed any of the targets for the coming year as a result?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome for this initiative.

On additional resources, the cost of consular services is met from the consular premium. That is included in the cost of a passport, so as demand rises the available resources also rise. We could not possibly have dealt with a threefold increase in the number of travellers abroad and the huge additional demand caused by changes in telecommunications and IT without that relative buoyancy of the income stream. Included in that is an element for the emergency response, which is held by the Treasury and triggered when we declare a full emergency. I can let the hon. Gentleman have full details of that.

We are looking at compensation in respect of, for example, victims of terrorism who do not have insurance. I should say that it is quite complicated. The schemes that are run by countries abroad tend to be pretty restrictive, more so than people might believe. Of course, there is always a difficulty in ensuring that an evidential base for the injuries or trauma is satisfied. That is easier in respect of terrorist incidents than in respect of some others. That is one of the reasons why most countries have been reluctant to set up such schemes.

I should say, too, that as a result of discussions between our consular directorate and the insurance industry, insurance companies are now extending the insurance cover that they provide to include terrorist incidents. In my view, it must be a fundamental responsibility of travellers to ensure that they are covered for all potential risks.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): It is wrong and inappropriate that we should conflate this with the report by the Foreign Affairs Committee, which has very much got my fingerprints on it. I hope that we will have a separate discussion on that on another occasion. I welcome the statement on this narrow issue. It is measured and appropriate and acknowledges, as I want to, the very harrowing circumstances that many of our diplomats have to deal with week after week in respect of bereavements around the world. Some people—I witnessed this myself when I was staying with a diplomat friend abroad—welcome the nanny state when they have the most minor hiccup in their travel arrangements, and test the patience and diligence of our diplomats by more or less expecting from them bed, breakfast and so on. That is inappropriate. I welcome this and hope that we will distinguish it from the discussion on the Foreign Affairs Committee report that we might have on another occasion.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks and for his confession about his fingerprints. We hold good biometric data on him in any event, so we were able to work that one out for ourselves.

My hon. Friend is right that there can be terribly harrowing circumstances. I saw that during the tsunami, when the police and our own officials worked in the most atrocious and appalling circumstances in dealing with bereaved victims and with cadavers. We have to ensure that support from the British state is available when it is really needed. Of course, that is right—consular assistance has always been a principal function of the Foreign Office. At the same time, however, we have to say to people that they must accept responsibility for themselves.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I am grateful for the Foreign Secretary's comments. We met after Bali, and I am very pleased that he took on board many of the comments that were made. We also met, as he may remember, in Phuket directly after the tsunami; again, it is good to see that some changes have been made.

I welcome the Government's initiative, but I would like to see them go much further. More than £50 million was rightly given to those affected by the 7/7 bombings, but not one penny is available to any Briton who is caught up in a terrorist incident abroad. Will the Foreign Secretary allow us to catch up with Australia, Spain, the United States, France, Italy and all the other countries that have set up a reserve fund to help those who are caught up in such horrific incidents? Terrorism is not limited to national boundaries, and neither should be our support for British citizens.

Mr. Straw: As I have already acknowledged, the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) has more acute experience of the harrowing nature of terrorist incidents than probably any other hon. Member. He was critical but generous about what British staff tried to do, and I hope that we have learned lessons post- October 2002 and from what, as I told the House at the time, was not a satisfactory response.

As is set out in page 29 of the document, we provide quite a lot of support for those who suffer in terrorist incidents abroad, including medical evacuation for those who have been injured; paying immediate medical expenses; transporting bodies back home; paying for return luggage costs; and paying for travel to the site of the attack, accommodation and travel insurance for two members of the victim's family. Those arrangements, which worked well after the tsunami, for example, were first put in place by us after 11 September.

I accept that there is a wider issue about victims abroad and compensation, which victims of terrorism at home would receive. We are currently studying that matter, including examples from other countries.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments, with which I agree, about the excellent work of the consular staff at the Islamabad high commission in rescuing mainly young girls from imprisonment and forced marriage. However, does he agree that we could avoid many of those traumatic situations if we introduced a specific criminal offence of forcing to marry or even conspiracy to force to marry?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her comments. I promise to give active consideration to her proposal.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): The Foreign Secretary will recall the tragic murder of my constituent, Mr. Richard Collins, on 8 March last year in Thailand. The right hon. Gentleman kindly arranged for my constituent's mother, Yvonne Hart, and I to visit officials. He will remember that one of the most appalling aspects of the case was that Richard's body was not kept properly and, consequently, within days, it was not only unrecognisable but had deteriorated to such an extent that a proper investigation could not be conducted into the cause of death. Will he ensure that, in future, consul officials overseas have a standing instruction that, when British nationals are murdered, they should try to make sure that the body is properly maintained not only for investigation but identification purposes? Surely that is not an unrealistic expectation.

Mr. Straw: I am happy to give that standing instruction but with the caveat that it depends not only on consular staff but, above all, on the relevant local authorities.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I welcome the publication of the document, but I want to raise two issues that arise from a case with which I have been dealing for the past five years. The first concerns honorary British consulates. My constituent, Christopher Rochester, died in Rhodes in 2001, and the honorary British consul there at the time was frankly of little help to the family. It became clear in subsequent legal cases that he was closely connected to people who were involved in Christopher's death.

My second point is about access to legal support. Christopher Rochester's family have found it difficult to get independent legal advice even in Rhodes, which is part of the European Union. Will my right hon. Friend comment on what assistance can be given to families to ensure that they have access to good, local legal advice?

Mr. Straw: I do not know the details of the service that the honorary consul provided in the case that my hon. Friend raises, but I am happy to examine it on his behalf. We have increased the number of honorary consuls and we are trying to increase their training. However many paid staff we have, there will always be a need for honorary consuls so that we can spread the work even more widely. Overwhelmingly, they do a good job.

We can[not] provide legal advice to British nationals overseas. Th[is] a matter for insurance.

Mr. Kevan Jones indicated dissent.

Mr. Straw: No, I am sorry. The House must make a judgment about that because the costs could be large. On the whole, people who travel overseas have higher disposable income than the average British taxpayer. I do not believe that an elderly lady in any constituency should pay tax towards covering a risk that should be met by insurance. However, we can provide lists of lawyers, whom we believe to be properly qualified to give advice. They may or may not be on the island of Rhodes but they could be elsewhere in Greece.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): The Foreign Secretary might be aware that I have had correspondence with the Home Secretary on behalf of my constituent, Mr. Jocelyn Waller, who is chairperson of the UK Bali bombings victims group. I am disappointed that the Foreign Secretary has not been able to go beyond what was said on 7 December in "Rebuilding lives: supporting victims of crime", published by the Home Office. Will the Foreign Secretary at least tell the House what progress the Government have made in considering the option for a national charitable disaster fund, and for its retrospective application to the victims of Bali and Sharm el-Sheikh?

Mr. Straw: As I have said, we are giving active consideration to that matter, and we hope to make announcements as soon as we can. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman that I cannot say any more on that at this stage.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): The Foreign Office and its career structure tend to favour the large, traditional embassies over the smaller, more far-flung posts, yet it is often in those more distant postings that the best work is done to promote British interests and to look after visitors, both personal and commercial. What systematic study is the Foreign Office carrying out to ensure that the deployment of resources and staff overseas is brought into line with the tasks that we expect of them?

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman has raised an important issue. There was a period, particularly during the cold war, when the most attractive posts were seen to be in the northern hemisphere, including those in America and the key posts in Europe, the Soviet Union and the Soviet bloc. Since I have been Foreign Secretary, post-11 September, I have been determined to shift that emphasis and to ensure not only that we honour the staff who work in very hard posts abroad—which numerically comprise the greatest number—but that they are given the best career opportunities. Yes, staff can go to the more attractive, and sometimes easier, posts but there is an expectation that, if they want a good career, they will have to serve in the harder posts as well. We are doing a great deal in that regard. For example, an exercise is now under way to reduce the staffing of the European directorates in London and of some of the western European embassies, because an awful lot of their traditional tasks are now carried out either on a capital-to-capital basis or in Brussels. We shall use those resources to train and improve the opportunities of the staff of posts elsewhere, including the Arab world.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): I warmly commend the Foreign Secretary on his full apology to the families of the victims of the tsunami in Thailand who did not receive the help from our consular services that they should have done—in stark contrast, incidentally, to what happened in Sri Lanka, the Maldives and Indonesia. He says that he hopes that lessons have been learned, but does he not understand that many of the victims' families will wonder whether that can be the case when none of those responsible for the negligence in Thailand has been disciplined or sacked?

[Mr. Andrew Mackay]

Mr. Straw: The situation in Thailand was much more complex than in those other posts. A very high level of service was provided in the Maldives, Indonesia and Sri Lanka, but the situation was very difficult in Thailand. I was there just a few days after the tsunami, and the problems did not arise because of incompetence, negligence or any culpable offence on the part of the staff concerned. In my judgment—this has also come out in some of the analyses of the events—it was due to the fact that some of the staff were exhausted, and that insufficient staff had been sent out with the rapid deployment teams. Those were organisational issues for which, ultimately, I take responsibility. I believe that the lessons have been learned. It does not follow that the only way to deal with the failure of a service is to sack people. If anyone commits a disciplinary offence, they should be—and are—disciplined. In this case, however, I know that some of the people concerned feel an intense personal responsibility for having let people down that will live with them for the rest of their careers. At the same time, many of the individual staff in Thailand who were criticised—there were not so many of them—have also received many bouquets from other members of the public for what they did. Overall, there were many more bouquets than there were brickbats. However, I accept that we let some families down, and I have unreservedly apologised. I am very sorry about that.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): The Foreign Secretary referred to people going abroad by choice. That choice is limited for some people, however, because of their employment. I remind him of the case of Jason Pope, my constituent, who was working in Angola, was sadly abducted and is believed to be deceased. Under the section on missing people, can guidance be given to embassies in countries such as Angola, where there is no effective police force, to be a little more robust and proactive in investigating such missing people, as, I believe, the US would be? Can the Department be slightly more accurate in the information that it gives with regard to presumption of death certificates? On the latter, may I ask—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. We have limited time, and I think that the hon. Gentleman has had a good bite of the cherry.

Mr. Straw: I will follow up the specific points that the hon. Gentleman raised. Our staff are robust with local authorities. We also go to great lengths to ensure the accuracy of the travel advice that we put on our website. However, following a change in policy in respect of travel advice, which was endorsed by both sides of the House, I am extremely reluctant, except in very exceptional circumstances, to say to British subjects that they should not travel to particular countries. Our responsibility is to offer advice. It is then a matter for individual travellers to make their own decisions about whether it is safe for them to travel.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that most travel insurers have specific exclusions for terrorist acts? Does not that make the case stronger for extending the current availability of compensation for UK nationals, a case made compellingly by people such as my constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Corke, who tragically lost their daughter Annalie in the Sharm el-Sheikh bombings?

Mr. Straw: I acknowledge that many insurance policies currently exclude terrorism. As I have said, discussions with our consular directorate suggest that insurers are ready and willing to extend their cover—some are doing so—and I encourage them to do so. Although it is terrible when terrorist incidents occur, the number of British citizens who are casualties of those is very much smaller than the number caught up in road accidents, for example, for which insurance is easily available. That is the responsibility of insurers. That said, we have recognised, as is made clear on page 29 of the report, that in certain circumstances of terrorist incidents and other emergencies active support ought to be put in place, at an appropriate cost to the taxpayer, for victims or their families. We are considering whether we should provide extended compensation similar to the criminal injuries compensation scheme.

Mr. Blunt: Following the concerns expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) about the UK-US extradition treaty, can the Foreign Secretary go one better than passing on his concern to the Home Secretary, perhaps by informing the American Secretary of State on her visit to Blackburn that if the United States Congress is not prepared to address this issue, the Government might be minded to bring the matter back to Parliament for us to come to our conclusion about the view of the US Congress? Will he confirm that the whole cost of the additional measures that he has presented to the House today is covered under the consular premium in the cost of passports?

Mr. Straw: On the hon. Gentleman's last question, the answer is yes. On the first question, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is in the lead on that matter, but I will go one better than waiting until Secretary Rice comes to the fine constituency of Blackburn and write to her in advance.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): I want to raise the case of my constituent, Mr Potter, who is currently in a secure prison in the US pending appeal, while his US counterpart is in a low-security prison and able to see his family regularly. It seems to me that the primary duty of the Foreign Secretary, the Prime Minister and the Government is to defend British interests abroad. Can the Foreign Secretary tell the House why the Government unilaterally signed away rights of British citizens with the extradition treaty, and what representations he has made on behalf of Mr. Potter to the US authorities?

Mr. Straw: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern about Mr. Potter. As I have explained, the general issue of principle regarding the extradition treaty is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, but I can say that Mr. Potter was last visited by British officials on 14 December, and we facilitated his wife's visit at the end of January. We were told in February that his lawyers would lodge an appeal at the beginning of March. The director of the consular department in the Foreign Office is going to see Mr. Potter's supporters, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman himself, on 30 March.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Following other questions and in the light of his welcome announcement that he will consider a compensation package, will the Foreign Secretary take account of the experience of some other people who have suffered recently? Their son, Jeremy Lakin, was killed at Sharm el-Sheikh, and they had a series of really unsatisfactory experiences with officialdom in the United Kingdom and our people in Egypt, as well as with the Egyptian authorities. Is the Foreign Secretary willing either to meet them personally or to look at the file, and to ensure that their experience is dealt with and taken into account in any final announcement that he makes in the coming months?

Mr. Straw: I shall be happy to examine the case, and I will write to the hon. Gentleman about it.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The Foreign Secretary said that he could not get people out of jail, but surely Her Majesty's Government can do their best to ensure that those who are incarcerated receive humane treatment. May I refer him to the case of Nicholas Baker, who is in Fuchu prison in Japan? Although he is not a constituent of mine, he has a number of relations in Norfolk. He has been systematically bullied by guards, deprived of food, proper clothing and bedding, and subjected to frostbite. I believed, somewhat naively, that such behaviour did not take place in modern Japan.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman is right: we have considerable responsibilities in respect of conditions in prisons. I do not know the details of that case, but I will look into them and follow them up, and I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): Along with other Members, I welcome the review. Probably hundreds, if not thousands, of my constituents are abroad at any one time, especially on a Tuesday such as this. However, my question concerns an event that will take place in about 10 weeks' or three months' time: the World cup. Many thousands of English fans will travel to Germany. Is the Foreign Secretary satisfied with the level of consular assistance that he has laid on for an event that will take place very soon?

Mr. Straw: Yes, I am satisfied with the level of consular assistance that will be available. We have built on a good deal of experience in respect of British fans abroad, not least following the riots of English fans in Charleroi in 2000 when I was Home Secretary. After those riots the House agreed on swift changes in the law, so that we could apply banning orders on known hooligans going abroad.

I believe that about 80 British police officers will be deployed, along with many consular officials, and we are already providing a great deal of consular advice on the website and through the Football Association's England supporters club. I think that we shall be providing the maximum help, and that we shall be seen to be doing so. However, if there is disorder involving English fans, or others from the United Kingdom, the responsibility for that disorder is not a matter for the United Kingdom Government. Responsibility will lie with those individuals, who ought to be well-behaved abroad as they ought to be in this country.

Point of Order

4.18 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), said in respect of NHS operations

"no one waits more than six months". —[Official Report, 20 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 120.]

Yet on 13 March, in reply to a parliamentary question, the same Minister stated that 74 people were waiting more than six months for their operations. Has the Minister of State given any indication that she will come to the House to make it clear which statement is correct?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have been given no such notice, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be able to pursue the argument that is clearly involved in some other way.

Bishops (Consecration of Women)

4.19 pm

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Priests (Ordination of Women) Measure 1993 so as to remove the bar on the consecration of women as bishops; and for connected purposes.

It is not often that we get to debate such matters as the consecration of women bishops in this House; indeed, many colleagues have asked why on earth we are involved in such a decision in the first place. During my speech, I hope to explain how this Bill argues for Parliament's sending a clear signal to the General Synod about women bishops, and why it might provoke a discussion about our role in such matters in future.

First, I want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), who initially proposed this Bill. At that stage, I, along with other colleagues, was a humble sponsor of it. Unfortunately, his parliamentary role in the Department for Constitutional Affairs does not allow him to move such a measure, so I am delighted to pick up where he left off.

It is a full 13 years since we were last asked to debate the ministry of women in the Church, and I am delighted to say that the vote then was overwhelmingly in favour of allowing the Church to ordain women priests. I hope that the House will be overwhelmingly in favour of women bishops today. However, 13 years ago we agreed to a compromise that left open the question of women bishops.

As St. Paul said, in Christ there is neither Jew nor Gentile,

"neither bond nor free . . . neither male nor female: for all . . . are one in Christ Jesus."

Well, not everyone agrees, of course. A former Bishop of London, Graham Leonard, once said that a woman was no more ordainable than a potato. I am not sure where he learned his interpersonal skills, but his theology seems horribly awry, too. Indeed, since studying this matter further for today, I have been overwhelmed by the number of spurious arguments against women bishops and priests masquerading as theology. I prefer the words of the Roman Catholic Cardinal Martini, who, when asked whether the Catholic Church would ever ordain women, said, with the wink of an eye, "Not in this millennium." That, of course, was in 1999.

Despite the few who have campaigned vociferously against women's ministry, the truth is that the vast majority of ordinary members of the Church of England—and, for that matter, of the nation that it serves—agree that there should be no impediment to women in the Church. The Church's compromise Measures in 1993 allowed parishes to declare themselves women priest-free zones, yet fewer than one in 10 have done so. It is not just in Dibley that women priests are burying the dead, baptising the new-born, celebrating communion, counselling the sick and supporting the dying. In every one of our constituencies there are women clergy, many of whom are the most able of their generation.

Half of those in training for ordination in each of the last three years have been women. Yet a full 13 years after they were allowed to enter the priesthood, women—who can be curates, vicars, rectors, chaplains and deans, and even rural deans and archdeacons—are still barred from being bishops. That is simply wrong. How can the Church preach equality when it institutionalises discrimination? Can anybody imagine the Church's refusing to have black or disabled bishops? Some 14 other provinces of the Anglican communion already allow women bishops, including Scotland. The Bench of Bishops supports the consecration of women, as do both Archbishops. Indeed, the Archbishop of Canterbury mentioned only last night that Sudan already has women bishops. However, the earliest date that the Church is contemplating change is 2012. We can build for an Olympics in that time, yet the Church cannot move forward on this simple issue.

Of course, there are Members who feel that it is none of our business whom the Church of England does or does not consecrate. Understandably, perhaps, they argue that the Church should govern itself. They probably also think that parliamentary questions to my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell) on behalf of the Church Commissioners is a quaint and irritating anachronism. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) has found it useful to quiz the commissioners on their outrageous sale to the highest bidder of the Octavia hill estate in her constituency. But I accept that there is an argument that Parliament should not be able to tell the Church what to do on this issue; Indeed, I agree. We should not force the Church to consecrate women bishops; nor should we be able to do so through this Bill.

However, while the relationship between Church and state remains as it is, we should use the mechanism before us to make our views known in full. We should be able to express our support for the role of women in every field of British life—to express our view, in the broadest terms, that women and men are equal, albeit different. We should be able to give voice to the many men and women in the Church who have been clamouring for this development for decades, and to declare our direct and personal support for the many women clergy in the Church. Many women clergy have called my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda in tears of gratitude. They believe that the Church is dragging its heels and listening far too attentively to its ultra-conservative wing, rather than to the mainstream. That certainly smacks of the ultra-conservative tail wagging the mainstream dog.

So why are we in Parliament involved? From the outset, I want to make it clear that I am fully signed up to the principle of disestablishment between Church and state, but at present we are part of the decision-making process and, at some stage, will have to consider and vote on this issue. The problem for me is that the Church recently decided that the earliest date for that vote would be 2012. It is highly likely that those opposed to women bishops will use every tactic to fudge and delay any decision from Synod and that they will plead with hon. Members to block any such proposal. This Bill is a useful device for sending the clear message to Synod that we are here and that we have been waiting for further instruction since 1993. If the House approves the Bill, it will demonstrate that we are willing to consecrate women bishops as soon as we can.

In a nutshell, that is all that I am asking for today—the clearest possible sign from Parliament that this end of the legislative food chain is ready to act. All we need is the chance to do so.

Church of England Measures are the instruments by which changes are made to the governance and organisation of the Church. Once a Measure has been approved by the General Synod, the Ecclesiastical Committee—a Committee of both Houses of Parliament—considers whether it is expedient. If a Measure is considered expedient, both Houses are required to approve it before it can receive Royal Assent.

Generally, motions to present any Measure for Royal Assent are debated in each House as soon as the Ecclesiastical Committee report is laid. Neither the motion itself nor the report can be amended, which means that the House of Commons cannot amend Measures as it can other Bills.

There have been times in the past when this House has rejected such Measures. It happened with the Prayer Book Measure in 1927—which I hope that no one present today can remember—and as recently as 1989, when we rejected the Clergy (Ordination) Measure. The House may not be aware that, since 1992, we have passed 17 Church of England Measures. We rarely invoke the right to reject a Measure although, if a number of hon. Members feel strongly about its substance, a Measure will have no automatic right to proceed unhindered.

Other hon. Members before me have rightly made the point that, although the House naturally does not wish unduly to interfere in the Church's self-governance, its agreement cannot be taken for granted. It has been said that the House > "is not here simply to rubber-stamp anything the General Synod may lay before it".

There was much debate on the 1993 Measure and Bill for the ordination of women. However, the Ecclesiastical Committee simply summarised the arguments on both sides and, unfortunately, seems to have given them equal weight. As hon. Members will know, there are nearly always two sides to most arguments, but muddle and compromise are not always the best option, as they prolong the agony and do not tackle the issue adequately. Compromise is good sometimes, but not always.

The 1993 legislation legalised a muddled compromise to please a vociferous minority. The House of Bishops working party has recognised that that compromise is a continuing problem and has restarted the debate, but it is still at a preliminary stage only. This Bill represents a great opportunity to send the House of Bishops a message while its deliberations continue. That message is: we in this House are ready to change. As soon as the working party gets the Measure to the Ecclesiastical Committee, and that Committee produces its report, we are ready to endorse it for Royal Assent.

That is not my view alone, as it shared by senior bishops. For example, one senior cleric wrote:

> "Although the House of Commons may not pre-empt decisions of the General Synod of the Church of England, the success of this Bill would be an important indicator of the support for the change as the Church's own decision making proceeds."

[Mr. Andy Reed]

Another bishop has written:

"It is an excellent idea to have this particular debate, which seems to be a useful way of testing opinion in Westminster", and the Bishop of Worcester has said:

"The fact is that those opposed will certainly take their fight to the Ecclesiastical Committee if they don't like the Measure that comes from General Synod, and it is therefore very important that the Commons should have indicated its view for the Committee's guidance".

Some have even argued that this Bill could trigger "a church-state crisis", as one media headline put it. I had not realised that I could achieve so much in 10 minutes but, if that is one of the outcomes, it will be a useful contribution to the debate. The truth is that the House will not be legislating this afternoon, but it has an opportunity to send a simple message and declare its support for women's ministry at every level of the Church.

I hope that all hon. Members—regardless of the state of their souls or, for that matter, of whether they believe that they have one—will seize that opportunity, vote in favour of the Bill and put and end to the stained-glass ceiling for women in the Church.

4.29 pm

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Last week, I received a letter from the Bishop of Fulham, who is chairman of the very respected Anglican organisation, Forward in Faith. I am not a member, but I respect his point of view and those of his members. He wrote:

"On behalf of my several thousand members—bishops, priests, lay women and lay men—all of whom find themselves unable for purely theological reasons to consent to the ordination of women, I write to ask you to find the time to be present in the Chamber and vote 'no' to" what he then thought was the Bill of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). He continues:

"I am certain that I do not need to point out that his initiative in this matter is contrary to the long-standing constitutional convention that Parliament does not initiate legislation on such matters. Further, as you will know, the Church, through its democratically elected General Synod, is already engaged in a careful consultation process which seeks to ensure that all views on this important issue are heard and respected."

I ask the House to take the bishop's remarks seriously and to recognise that, although a large majority in the Church of England are in favour of what the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) proposes, an honourable and significant minority take a different view. I was on the General Synod until last year. My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) now sits on it. He and I take different views on this issue, but I respect him very much and I hope that the respect is reciprocated.

I do not want to make a great issue of this. If the Church of England does move to consecrate women as bishops, I will probably be one of those who feel obliged to go elsewhere. We should remember that both the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church, which contain far the greatest majority of Christians in the world, take a different line on this—[Interruption.] Perhaps they will change in the fullness of time—I do not know. Nor do I say that I am right. I may be wrong—I do not know. I do not wish to divide the House. It is premature to have brought the measure forward. Indeed, the hon. Member for Rhondda, in a kind and courteous letter that he wrote to me last week, admitted as much, in that it probably pre-empts Synod. We should leave Synod to decide whether it wishes to bring a Measure and then we will have ample and proper opportunity to debate it.

All that I would say to those present and particularly to women Members is that, as far as the Bishop of Fulham and his colleagues are concerned, this is not a matter of equality. It may be perceived as such by many, but this is a theological matter. He may be wrong. I may be wrong. It is just conceivable that the hon. Member for Loughborough may be wrong and I am glad that he acknowledges that. I hope that, in that spirit, we can move on to other business without dividing the House.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Andy Reed, Robert Key, Mr. Tim Boswell, Simon Hughes, John Bercow, Mrs. Sharon Hodgson, Julie Morgan, Bob Russell, Susan Kramer, Stephen Hammond, Mrs. Ann Cryer and Barbara Keeley.

BISHOPS (CONSECRATION OF WOMEN)

Mr. Andy Reed accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Priests (Ordination of Women) Measure 1993 so as to remove the bar on the consecration of women as bishops; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 20 October, and to be printed [Bill 151].

Armed Forces Bill [Money]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

4.34 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I beg to move,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Armed Forces Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State in connection with the establishment of a body whose primary function is to investigate matters relating to the mental or physical wellbeing of members of the armed forces or the operation of that body.

The purpose of bringing forward the money resolution at this stage is to enable the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill to consider any amendment that might be tabled seeking to create a statutory body or an ombudsman to investigate certain complaints made by service personnel.

This is a very important subject, and one on which the Defence Committee made a recommendation in its report on the duty of care, which was published on 14 March last year. The Government are not persuaded that that is the right way forward for our armed forces, and the Bill makes no provision for it. But we are keen to have an open debate about the issue. We have therefore tabled this resolution in the spirit of constructive engagement, and to enable proper debate in the Committee. Without the money resolution, we would not be able to debate the matter fully.

The money resolution makes clear the proposed primary function of the independent ombudsman, and I think that it is drafted sufficiently widely for a full and informed debate in Committee. If it were agreed, the creation of such a body or ombudsman would give rise to additional costs from public funds. It is too early at this stage to estimate what those costs might be. None the less, we need this motion to allow a full debate. If it were agreed, the creation of such a body or ombudsman would give rise to additional costs from public funds. It is too early at this stage to estimate what those costs might be. None the less, we need this motion to allow a full debate in Committee, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for proposing the motion. What he has said about the enabling nature of the motion is sensible, and very much in the spirit of the manner in which the Bill is being considered, which could well be applied to the consideration of other Bills. After Second Reading the Bill went not straight to a Standing Committee but to a special Select Committee, which has enabled us to take evidence from a wide range of people, including those who are in favour of the establishment of the kind of grievance redress arrangements to which the Minister referred. Like him, we are not persuaded that that is the best way to proceed for our armed forces, but the motion—if passed—will enable the Committee to examine the proposition publicly and in detail, which will add further to the authority of the Committee and the professional way in which the House has approached the Bill. It is therefore right that we should debate the matter, and that the motion should have been tabled.

I would be keen to learn from the Minister whether the costs that might arise out of the arrangement have been quantified by the Department, given that he is not in favour of the establishment of an ombudsman—

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): Are you?

Mr. Howarth: I am not in favour of an ombudsman, to answer my right hon. Friend who is chuntering from a sedentary position—

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): To great benefit, too!

Mr. Howarth: It is of course of great benefit to the House, as my hon. Friend points out.

It would be helpful if the Minister would indicate whether any consideration has been given to the likely costs. As this is a money resolution, and as the Bill has implications for additional expenditure by the Department in the establishment of standing courts martial, and there is the possibility of increased litigation that might entail increased costs for the legal representation of members of the armed forces who end up in the dock, I wonder whether the Minister can give us any estimate today of the likely increases in the defence budget that might arise. That would be helpful, but if he cannot give us that information today, we quite understand that a letter may follow, as has been his custom on other occasions.

We welcome the fact that the motion will facilitate further debate, and I look forward to joining the Minister in resisting a grievance procedure that would not be appropriate for Her Majesty's armed forces. I am delighted that in the spirit of co-operation between both sides of the House in areas on which we agree, I shall be able to make the Minister's task that much easier and perhaps make common cause against some of his Back Benchers, which may be developing into a bit of a habit—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman and others that at this stage we are debating only the costs of the proposal rather than its merits.

Mr. Howarth: Indeed, Madam Deputy Speaker. It was for the further elucidation of the House that I was seeking an undertaking from the Minister that he will provide us with some indication of what those costs might be. However, I have nothing further to add to the questions I have posed.

4.41 pm

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): I welcome both the motion and the words of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence about the importance of the issue to which it relates.

The motion refers to "the establishment of a body whose primary function is to investigate matters relating to the mental or physical wellbeing of members of the armed forces or the operation of that body".

[Mrs. Joan Humble]

The well-being of members of our armed forces is absolutely vital. They undertake a hugely important task in countries across the world, and we need to ensure that their well-being is properly safeguarded.

The Armed Forces Bill, to which the motion relates, will give us all a valuable opportunity to address the vital issue of accountability and to ensure that when, sadly, deaths occur in the armed forces, they can be properly investigated. The Deepcut and Beyond families group will be looking for answers about the deaths of their children, and I hope that the money resolution will result in the setting up of an independent scrutiny body. I hear the Minister's remarks about his views on the possibility of an ombudsman, but I hope that he will listen to the voices of parents and families and take them into account.

John Bercow: The hon. Lady's speech follows that of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), who was sounding dangerously like a consensus politician a moment ago. The hon. Lady is obviously sympathetic to the establishment of an independent body. Has she any idea, in ball-park terms, of the capital and running costs that might be envisaged?

Mrs. Humble: There are such bodies in other countries. Canada has an independent ombudsman, and Germany and Australia are looking into the idea. There would be opportunities for the Ministry of Defence to look at the expenses in other countries. The important thing is to get this right. We have an opportunity once every five years to consider the armed forces and, in this Bill, issues relating to the operation of courts martial and inquiries. Our armed forces need the best possible focus for such things.

On the sad occasions when something goes wrong, that needs proper investigation. I welcome the money resolution, and the fact that members of the Select Committee on Defence will have the opportunity to examine a vital issue in more detail. When it comes back to the Floor of the House, other Members, too, can engage in that important debate.

4.44 pm

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): This is a very narrow debate. I welcome the money resolution, as it will enable the Committee to use evidence from other countries to find out how such a proposal could be implemented in this country if that was the will of Parliament. However, it would be inappropriate for any member of the Committee to prejudge and pass personal comment before we have heard the evidence. Having served on the Committee, I am aware how important it is to maintain the ethos and the culture of the three armed forces alongside the need to harmonise the disciplinary procedures, but the money resolution will enable the Committee to widen the debate to find out whether other measures could assist Her Majesty's armed forces with those procedures. If the evidence that we find suggests that that is the way forward, so be it—but equally, if the evidence states that it would not be beneficial, we should not proceed. It would be inappropriate for any member of the Committee to pass judgment before the evidence has been heard.

4.45 pm

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I too welcome the money resolution, which will give the Committee the opportunity to discuss the very important issue that has just been highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble). Having dealt with the Ministry of Defence over the past five years as a member of the Defence Committee, I find what the Minister refers to as constructive engagement rather strange; usually we just get a "No" from the MOD—so I thank him for proposing the money resolution.

I am rather saddened by the comments of the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), who clearly seems to have prejudged any debate that might take place in Committee. I thought that these days, he was a new Conservative, looking for consensus on issues about which people are clearly concerned in the wider community.

Any such ombudsman or commission needs a narrow remit. It need not be a large organisation that will cost millions of pounds. We must remember that this is not the first time that such a recommendation has been made. The Defence Committee called for something similar in its report on the duty of care during the last Parliament. The independent review of armed forces manpower and career remuneration—the Bett report—recommended extending the terms of reference of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration to allow the ombudsman to deal with complaints from service personnel about administration issues. That is important, and I hope that hon. Members will not say that such a proposal threatens the armed forces. Frankly, I think that it will help them to try to repair the damage to their reputation that has clearly been inflicted by some of the press coverage over the past few years.

Mr. Touhig: With permission, I should like to comment on the remarks that have been made today. I have already said that this is an unusual procedure. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) asks how much the procedures that the money resolution will allow the Committee to consider would cost. We have not calculated any of the costs at this time, but as a guide it might be helpful to know that, although on a rather larger scale, the annual operating cost of the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland is about £70 million.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of the consensual way in which we have approached the Bill in Committee. I commend all members of the Committee for their work. He also mentioned that he might get another letter from me. When the Bill is finished with, my goodness me, I do not know what I will do—but I will not be writing any more letters to the hon. Gentleman. It will be gap in my life—and, no doubt, a gap in his—but I am sure that we will find other things on which to have exchanges.

Of course, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) says, the Bill addresses issues of accountability, but I am not tempted down the road that she suggests at the moment, because that is a matter for the Committee to debate. However, I am glad that she welcomes the provision that the money resolution will allow, and I share the view of the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) that we must await the debate in Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), too, welcomed the money resolution. I make it clear to him that, as I said in my opening remarks, the Government are not persuaded of the need for an ombudsman or anything similar, but we are convinced of the need for a debate, and the money resolution will allow us to have that debate.

John Bercow: A number of references have been made to the special Committee, and within the space of a few minutes it has already become clear that in the Chamber are senior, important, very respected, influential and busy people who probably have many commitments and full diaries, who are sitting on that important Committee. I confess that I am not one of them; I was not asked. However, I am uncomfortable about the idea of a cosy private correspondence between the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), so I simply ask the Minister whether he will allow other Members to be party to those exchanges. Can we have a copy of all such correspondence between him and my hon. Friend placed in the Library?

Mr. Touhig: We would need to extend the Library. However, I will ensure that my correspondence with the hon. Member for Aldershot is copied to members of the Committee, and I am sure that it can be made available to anyone else who needs it.

The Government are responding to a formal request from the Chairman of the Select Committee to which the Armed Forces Bill has been committed to facilitate deliberations on one aspect of the Bill—the redress of complaints process. We are happy to do that, because we think that it is an important Bill for our armed forces and we are keen to have the debate on this issue. The Select Committee is appointed solely for the task of examining the Bill, and this approach has been used for considering successive Armed Forces Bills since 1955. We are engaged in that process now, and I trust the House will feel that there is merit in the resolution. I again commend it to the House, so that we can have the debate in Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. May I seek your guidance on how I may make a correction to Hansard even though is not in my speech? I understand that Members have an obligation to check their own speeches. At column 48 yesterday, in response to an intervention, the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard) made light of my role as a bomb disposal officer and suggested that I had an interest in kinetics. However, Hansard reports this as though I have an interest in Qinetiq, the defence procurement company. I want to make it clear that I do not.

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. My intention was to make a humorous remark because the hon. Gentleman has family and business interests in fireworks companies. The lesson, I suppose, is that humour is explosive and can backfire. I have asked Hansard to make the correction; we discussed it this morning. I apologise to the House and to the hon. Gentleman for any unintentional consequences or inconvenience.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It sounds as though the correction will be made. I should inform hon. Members that they can always write to the editor of Hansard to make sure that such corrections are made.

Orders of the Day

Identity Cards Bill

Consideration of Lords message [20 March]

Lords reasons: 22G and 22H

4.53 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That this House does not insist on its Amendments 22E and 22F but disagrees with the Lords in their Amendments 22G and 22H.

I should say, first, that I am very pleased that their lordships have now dropped their outright opposition to the designation power in the Bill by dropping their previous amendments Nos. 16 and 22. That is very good news and an important development. However, the amendments in lieu are not a real compromise as they would simply delay the power to link the issue of identity cards to designated documents, such as passports, until 2012. That is unacceptable and it would not be right to allow the other place to delay the implementation of legislation that it dislikes until five years have passed. That is a deliberate plan for delay and destruction of the process in the Identity Cards Bill.

This is the fourth time that this issue has come back to us from the other place and I submit that this really should be the last time. Although we might not expect to phase in the introduction of identity cards to all categories of passport applicants straight away, any constraint on designation would create uncertainties in our planning and a risk of additional costs. In line with other European Union countries, we expect to start the issuing of biometric British passports, including fingerprints, by 2009.

Without the requirement for recipients of designated documents, such as biometric passports, to register on the national identity register, to be issued with an identity card and to get the protections that the national identity register offers, we would have to provide for two alternative processes with separate records for those who choose to register and those who choose not to register. Such a purely artificial deadline would create real problems for the phasing of the scheme, which would be bound to have an impact on costs. The real intention behind the amendments is to make the scheme unworkable by fuelling uncertainty about its implementation.

We are also likely to start issuing biometric residence permits to foreign nationals who are temporarily resident here at about the same time—in 2008 or 2009. Again, without the requirement for designation and registration on the national identity register, foreign nationals could opt out of the scheme and we would be forced to maintain separate records for those who opted in and those who opted out of the register. The plans for the ID cards process are predicated on the introduction of a single, seamless process for issuing passports and identity cards as a single package.

Parliament has spent many hours debating the Bill. Leaving aside the discussion on the draft Bill and the substantial debate on the earlier Bill that was introduced before the election, we spent some 39 hours discussing this Bill on the Floor of the House and in Committee before passing it to the other place in October. The Committee stage involved 11 sittings over seven days. The other place scrutinised the Bill over all its stages for a total of 61 hours, including six days in Committee and three days on Report. Since then, a further 15 hours of parliamentary time have been taken up as each House has considered the other's amendments and reasons. I suggest that it would be inappropriate, and a waste of parliamentary time, for the Opposition in the other place to try to force the Government to use the Parliament Act. Moreover, to suggest that we should wait six years before we are able to implement the Bill is not a compromise in any respect.

I welcomed the helpful intervention that was made during yesterday's debate in the other place by Lord Armstrong of Ilminster. He suggested that it might be a compromise between the positions of the Government and the Opposition if the Bill provided for an opt-out, rather than an opt-in, for people applying for a designated document such as a passport. I understand the reasoning behind Lord Armstrong's proposal and am very grateful to him for his efforts to help to resolve the impasse. However, I have to say that while I agree that an opt-out might well make more sense than an opt-in, the reality would be the same. We would still be introducing a large degree of uncertainty into the plans for rolling out identity cards linked to passports.

Perhaps I can also emphasise the fact that, as I have already made clear in debates in the House, anyone who feels strongly enough about the linkage not to want to be issued with an ID card in the initial phase will be free to surrender their existing passport and apply for a new passport before the designation order takes effect. Although I doubt whether many people would want to avoid the opportunity of obtaining an ID card when renewing their passport, the facility will be available. I hope that Lord Armstrong will consider those points before deciding whether to table further amendments in another place.

In fact, I believe that the moment for such a suggestion has passed because it appears that the Opposition have moved beyond their outright resistance to the designation powers in the Bill—the latest Lords amendments accept the principle of designation. The argument now is simply about whether the powers should be available straight away, or whether an artificial delay should be imposed.

I understand the position of the Liberal Democrats. Indeed, the Liberal Democrat spokesman in the other place, Lord Phillips of Sudbury, has at least been consistent in opposing the Bill because of his party's avowed dislike of identity cards in principle.

The position of the Conservative Opposition, both here and in the other place, is more complicated. When the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was leading his party, he said in an article in The Daily Telegraph on 20 December 2004, which was less than six months before the general election:

"We must protect our citizens in every way we can and in my judgement that includes ID cards".

On Second Reading of the original Bill on 20 December 2004—again, less than six months before the general election was called—the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) said that "it is incumbent on all of us to examine carefully any measures which might enhance the nation's security. Identity cards introduced properly and effectively may help to do that."—[Official Report, 20 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 1953.]

The Conservative Opposition have since flip-flopped this way and that on identity cards. They have voted for identity cards, abstained and voted against them. They decided not to mention identity cards at all in their election manifesto. However, it now appears—I welcome this—that they accept the principle of linking the issue of identity cards to designated documents such as passports.

On 18 March, The Times reported Conservative party sources as saying that they wanted the delay added to the designation powers, so that if the Conservatives were to win the next election they would have time to repeal the legislation. That report may have been inaccurate, and I am sure that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) will have something to say about that.

I note with interest that yesterday the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. Lord Strathclyde, was not prepared to commit his party to such a stance. In response to an intervention by my noble Friend Baroness Scotland, he said:

"She knows of our opposition to this legislation and to the whole principle of ID cards. What our position will be at the next election, I cannot tell."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 20 March 2006; Vol. 680, c. 38.]

That sums up the problem. Lord Strathclyde was not prepared to commit his party to such a stance and refused to confirm whether his party will be committed to reversing the ID card provisions at the next election.

As the Conservative party seeks to use its entrenched vote in the Lords to frustrate the will of the elected House, I urge it to think again given the deep inconsistencies in its position throughout the whole debate.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Notwithstanding the advice from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), a number of my hon. Friends and I have been very consistent in opposing the introduction of identity cards. We voted against the original Second Reading on 20 December 2004 and on each and every subsequent occasion. Our position is explicit, clear and unmistakable, and it will not change.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that that has been his position and that of a number of Conservative Members. However, it has not been the position adopted by Conservative Front Benchers, which is what I was pointing out. The country judges the position of Conservative Front Benchers in elections and at other times, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has confirmed that while some Conservative Members have been consistent, Conservative Front Benchers have displayed no consistency whatsoever.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does the Home Secretary agree that it was apparent on Second Reading that the policy advocated by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was geared to the question of compulsion? When my right hon. and learned Friend was Home Secretary, he adopted a policy on a voluntary scheme, so our current policy is entirely consistent with the views that he originally adopted.

Mr. Clarke: I will not go through what the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe might or might not have done when he was Home Secretary, but I will quote what he said on 20 December 2004 as Leader of the Opposition:

"We must protect our citizens in every way we can and in my judgement that includes ID cards".

He said that less than six months before the general election.

Of course the Government will listen and reflect on what is said, but I must repeat that we cannot accept Lords amendments Nos. 22G and 22H, which would undermine the basis of the planned identity cards scheme just as much as the earlier Lords amendments that this House rejected.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): May I begin by apologising on behalf of the shadow Home Secretary, who cannot be here because of a meeting of the shadow Cabinet? No doubt he will be here as soon as he can.

May I clear up three little points that the Home Secretary endeavoured to make at the end of his remarks? He said that we have had quite enough debate about the issue for now—there were 39 hours of discussion in the Commons before the Identity Cards Bill went to the Lords—but he did not condescend to tell us that the debates in Committee on designation and compulsion by stealth were time-limited. The Government imposed knives in Committee, and they have applied the rules of the House, which are in their gift, to impose time limits on these debates, too.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): As the hon. and learned Gentleman will remember, we both served on that Committee. The Opposition did not, in fact, use a great deal of the time available. Will he comment on that?

Mr. Garnier: I will not do so, save to say that I wholly disagree with the hon. Gentleman.

The Home Secretary said that the argument was all about designation, and that we had exhausted that debate, bringing matters to a necessary conclusion. I hesitate to say that he has done so deliberately, but he has confused a debate about designated documents per se with one about compulsion by stealth. The kernel of the debate, which he does not want to address, is whether it is appropriate for the Government to stand at the general election on a manifesto that says one thing, then to seek to railroad a measure through the House—and, by threats and others means, to do so in the other place, too—thus avoiding the central issue of compulsion by stealth.

[Mr. Garnier]

The Government accept that there should be express compulsion by primary legislation for the 20 per cent. of the public who do not hold a passport, but they find it extremely difficult to get their heads around the fact—and it is only logical that they should do so if there is to be any consistency in the application of their thinking—that there should be a plain and clear statement of their intention to introduce compulsion through designated documents either by a voluntary arrangement, which they advocated at the general election, or by another piece of primary legislation. Of course, they do not have the intellectual or the political courage, let alone the self-confidence, to advance that argument, because they know that it would not attract public support, still less support from anyone else.

The Home Secretary's final and most desperate throw was to rely on the remarks of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who had supported identity cards. Again, that allows the Government to fall into a trap of their own making. They would like us to forget that the Bill is not primarily about identity cards but about the national identity register. If they were intellectually honest and confident about their policy they would have called the Identity Cards Bill the national identity register Bill. People would therefore understand that they wish to compel them, either through primary legislation, which we have yet to see, for the 20 per cent., or by stealth via designated documents, to supply information to a vast Government computer, which will be a huge bucket into which other Government agencies and, indeed, private companies can dip. We cannot audit the register's activities and trawls, as that is prohibited by the Bill. It therefore does the Home Secretary little credit to seek to rely on my right hon. and learned Friend.

When the current Prime Minister was Leader of the Opposition shortly before the 1997 election—we remember that, but perhaps the Home Secretary does not—he clearly opposed identity cards, which he thought were a waste of money and an invasion of civil liberties. He did not think that the Labour party could possibly countenance them under his leadership. I cannot imagine what has happened to him since, but as public confidence in what the Labour party says and does is at an all-time low, it behoves the Government, having been elected on a manifesto, to adhere to their promises.

John Bercow: I am extremely grateful to my hon. and learned Friend, who is presenting his case in the characteristically understated fashion for which he is renowned and respected throughout the House. Would he care to remind the House that when the current Prime Minister was Leader of the Opposition he specifically said that he rejected the idea of compulsory ID cards, which he dismissed as something demanded by the Tory right?

Mr. Garnier rose—

John Bercow: That was then—this is now.

Mr. Cash: This is the Tory left.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. May we have one debate across the Floor of the House?

Mr. Garnier: Let me assist you, Madam Deputy Speaker, by saying that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) and I are wholly at one in our appreciation of the Prime Minister's skills. They ought to be trumpeted up and down the country. He is a master at saying one thing and meaning another.

On the last occasion when we debated the matter in the House, there was a rather unfortunate intervention from the hon. Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove), who laid claim to having written the relevant passage of the Labour party manifesto. She was rather proud of it at the time, but perhaps she did not realise what she was doing. The Home Secretary may not have been keen that she should continue to take part in these debates—I do not see her in the Chamber today.

Let me remind the House—it is well worth doing so as frequently as we can—precisely what the Labour party said in its manifesto. It stated that it "will introduce ID cards, including biometric data like fingerprints, backed up by a national register and rolling out initially on a voluntary basis as people renew their passports."

It does not take much knowledge of the English language and its syntax to realise that the expression "on a voluntary basis" governs the phrase "will introduce ID cards".

I shall explain the position in simple language to those on the Government Front Bench. They promised the British public at the last election that they would introduce ID cards on a voluntary basis as people renewed their passports. What they now propose, for which the other place is holding the Government to account, is compulsory registration on the national identity register, incidentally to get an identity card, by stealth—by some underhand secret method. [Interruption.]

I know that manifestos are a matter of great amusement to the Government, but if the Government had intended that the public should understand that the policy on which they wanted to be re-elected was, "We will introduce a compulsory system whereby, when you renew your passport or some other designated document, the list of which is yet to be defined, you will be registered on the national identity register", they would have said it.

I hope the hon. Member for South Swindon, who is not present, will forgive me, but it seems to me that that section of the Labour party manifesto was written by a fool or a knave—a knave if it was intended to mislead or confuse, or a fool if it resulted from a failure to understand the ordinary meaning of those simple English words. I do not mind which it is, but either way the British public elected the Government under a false prospectus.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Earlier the hon. and learned Gentleman said that he was at one with the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow). Yesterday in the House that hon. Gentleman reaffirmed his commitment to a totally elected second chamber. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman have any concerns that an unelected and unaccountable House should continue to pressurise this House as much as it has done?

Mr. Garnier: I might do, if the other place in its current constitutional get-up was not a creation of the Government and the Prime Minister, but since it is a creation of the Government and the Prime Minister, and since its current state is entirely supported by people such as the hon. Gentleman, who leapt through the Division Lobby with great alacrity to see the House of Lords turn into a creation of—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. and learned Gentleman of the amendments under discussion? Perhaps he will confine his remarks to the amendments, not manifestos.

Mr. Garnier: Of course, Madam Deputy Speaker, I respect everything that you say and the admonition that you give me. I may have used a word that the Home Secretary does not wish to hear or understand, but that is not the point. He will have to come to terms with the fact that we have a bicameral constitutional arrangement. It is entirely proper for the other place to present these amendments to this House, and all the more proper given that the other place is a creation of this Government. Having set up this new House of Lords, it is simply not good enough for them to complain when it sends back legislation in a form that they do not like. They should have thought about that before they mucked around with it.

5.15 pm

On amendments Nos. 22G and 22H, which Ministers may or may not have read, it is important to point out that when we last debated this the Home Secretary was chuntering to the effect that the majority of Cross Benchers did not support the majority of 36 in favour of those amendments. Well, I have news for him. That majority contained within it a majority of Cross Benchers, so he has shot his own fox, if I may use an allusion that may be of interest to him.

The House of Lords has presented to this House two sets of amendments that would delay the onset of compulsion until after 31 December 2011. That entirely complies with the Labour party's manifesto on which it was elected at the last election. It would preserve precisely what that manifesto required—the rolling out of ID cards on a voluntary basis—by allowing members of the public who so wish to enrol their details on to the national identity register in order to receive an identity card prior to that time. The House of Lords is doing no more than what the Labour party promised the public that it was about at that time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already indicated to the hon. and learned Gentleman that there has been sufficient discussion of party manifestos. I hope that hon. Members will now address their remarks to the amendments before the House.

Mr. Garnier: If I may say so, Madam Deputy Speaker, it is extremely difficult, given that these amendments are about whether compulsion by stealth should be introduced with this Bill or at a later stage, not to place that in the context upon which the Government rely, as they did on the previous occasion and in the other House—namely, their manifesto.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I agree. I think that I have allowed reference to that background. I would now like us to discuss the amendments before the House.

Mr. Garnier: Well, there we are.

The amendments would delay—properly, because they are in line with the Government's policy as advertised—compulsion by stealth, or by express primary legislation, until after 31 December 2011. No Labour Member who has any understanding of the English language, or of the meaning of the words "promise" or "voluntary", can possibly complain about what the other place has introduced into the Bill.

Mr. Cash: I do not know whether my hon. and learned Friend is going to come to this, but does he think that the Home Secretary reached a point where he would be so dismissive of the arguments that have come from the other House that it might be appropriate for that House to insist on the Parliament Act?

Mr. Garnier: I shall leave that to the other place. I am arguing in support of the other place's amendments—22G and 22H. Whether we get to a stage when the Parliament Act has to be employed is largely a matter for the majority in this House, although it is technically a matter for the Speaker. The Parliament Act is sometimes operated when the Government decide that they cannot have their way by any other means, as happened before the previous general election.

The Government have presented the argument here and in the other place that, if we are to have a bifurcated system—a voluntary and a compulsory system—which the Labour party advocated at the election, we would have to expend much more money. The Home Secretary said that it would have implications for procurement. I am not sure that that is a good reason for overturning the relationship between the citizen and the state. I do not believe that the age-old system that allows us, the citizens, to walk the streets without being compelled to do something at the state's behest should be overturned or trumped by claiming that it would create all sorts of procurement implications. It may well create implications for the Government's IT procurement system—we know the history of IT procurement for Home Office projects and others. It is therefore unsurprising that they are worried about that. However, that is not an argument for overturning the constitutional proprieties.

The Government might have a better case if they condescended to tell us what they believed the costs of the exercise would be. Their claim about the additional costs that the amendments would impose on the taxpayer would be more understandable if they condescended to tell us what they are. However, all they do is ritualistically repeat their abuse of the House of Lords or anyone—at the London School of Economics, on the Conservative Benches, on the Liberal Democrat Benches or even on the Labour Benches—who dares to contradict the assertions that they make without evidence. That is no way to run a Government or conduct an argument in favour of overturning the amendments.

No evidence exists to show that a delay in compulsion would necessarily be more costly than the proposals for immediate compulsion. A series of less expensive, smaller scale trials and pilots would cost far less than is currently projected in the early phases of development and would inform refinements to the specification, which will help to achieve best value in the longer term.

It is also clear that, if the focus of the scheme's planning and development shifted towards developing and selling the benefits of the scheme as a tool for the citizen, voluntary take-up could substantially eclipse that by compulsion. If compulsion by stealth is so good and so popular, why do not the Government have the self-confidence to try voluntary take-up? If the public are sufficiently attracted and follow the arguments on cost, they will flock into the gulags and processing places so that their information can be put on the national identity register.

John Bercow: Irrespective of the number of people who come forward—in the first instance and for some time—to renew their passports, what is my hon. and learned Friend's assessment of the costs that the Government will incur as a result of proceeding with a plan for a massive new set of high street locations under the auspices of the great empire builder, Mr. Bernard Herdan, at which the transactions will take place? The sums of money will be huge. I do not know whether the Home Secretary realises it or whether he has been hoodwinked, but it will cost big time.

Mr. Garnier: There is no question about it—it will cost a lot of money. The overall costs of the scheme range from, according to the Government's figures, something towards the top end of £8 billion, to the LSE's figures of between £19 billion to £22 billion. I have asked written parliamentary questions about the high street readers, which will be based in Department for Work and Pensions offices and those of other agencies, perhaps in hospitals and so on. I cannot guarantee to be accurate but, from memory, each individual reader machine will cost approximately £3,000. One can multiply that to get the total figure.

Mr. Charles Clarke: May I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw the word "gulag"? To suggest that the identification process will be equivalent to a concentration camp or gulag is an abuse of language, and he has been very careful to attack us for the abuse of language in various ways. Will he now take the opportunity to withdraw the word?

Mr. Garnier: I had not appreciated that the Home Secretary was such a sensitive flower. I used the word "gulag" as shorthand for the processing process and for the construction of centres to which members of the public will have to come to have their details taken before they are submitted into this Government bucket, but if it was too aggressive an expression, of course I withdraw it. I trust that the Home Secretary will now be able to concentrate on the poverty of his own arguments rather than worrying about the language that I have used.

A delay in the implementation of compulsion will provide more scope to build a system that is technologically feasible and that has the utility to justify its costs. We are asking for intellectual integrity, and for a cohesive policy that will stand up to public examination. The other place has given the proposals that examination, as should this House. The Government do not deserve a blank cheque or a free pass. It is incumbent on us, as Members of Parliament representing constituents of all political parties and of none, not simply to roll over and grovel when the Government say that we must have this, that or the other. It is our job to examine everything that the Government do—allegedly in our name—and if we disapprove of it, to say so and, more importantly, to vote against it. I urge the House to support the Lords in their amendments Nos. 22G and 22H.

Dr. Palmer: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. In his earlier remarks, the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) said that he completely disagreed with the assertion that the Opposition had not taken all the time available to the Committee. I wonder whether you would now like to give him the opportunity to avoid misleading the House on that. I have the relevant copy of Hansard here, in which your colleague, the Chairman of the Committee, says, perhaps a little sarcastically, that

"for reasons I cannot even begin to contemplate, the Committee wants to complete its proceedings in this sitting."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 21 July 2005; c. 423.]

That is, one sitting earlier than necessary.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is a point for debate, rather than a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Garnier: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Had I thought that the hon. Gentleman's intervention was worthy of any form of sensible reply, I would have given it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have already dealt with that point of order. May I remind hon. Members of the assertion in "Erskine May" that "good temper and moderation" should be the hallmark of our debates? Perhaps we should all remember that.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I shall certainly try to remember that, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I am perhaps not the best person to persuade the Home Secretary to look at this matter again. I have opposed identity cards from the start, and I am sure that he is not going to take much notice of what I am going to say now. However, we shall reach agreement on one point. It is nonsense to say that if the scheme comes into operation there will be gulags and concentration camps. Our European partners have identity cards, and they are not police states. We are very pleased that they are fellow democracies. So let us continue to debate this subject without exaggeration.

By and large, I believe that the views of this Chamber should always prevail over those of the House of Lords. I hold that view even more strongly when the House of Lords votes down a measure that I happen to support. But on a general constitutional level, I do not believe that it would be wrong to continue to adhere to that principle, although there must be exceptions. Although this is a constitutional issue, and although I feel as strongly as their lordships in the majority, I have abstained on previous occasions after voting against the Bill on Second Reading. I shall continue to follow that line; I shall abstain when we vote on this proposition later.

On the substance of the matter, however—and without going into the issue of election manifestos—I am worried that, if the Government have their way, we shall have a scheme in which anyone who renews their passport after a certain date will automatically have their name entered on the national identity register. That is what I object to. Many law-abiding people are opposed to identity cards and having their names on the national identity register. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will not disagree that there are people—although we might disagree about the numbers—who have such strong views and who see no reason why they should renew their passport before the due time.

5.30 pm

Those are the sort of people who, if there is primary legislation in due course in which Parliament decides that there should be a compulsory scheme, would accept the law. They have no desire to be fined, not to pay those fines, to go to prison and be a martyr. However much they object, they accept that Parliament is the decisive policy maker. What they disagree to, which is the reason that I cannot support the Government, is that it is intended that people will automatically go on the identity register once they renew their passport, without Parliament deciding that there should be a compulsory scheme. That is the reason for a lot of disquiet.

I hope—I doubt it, but I am ever optimistic—that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will be willing to seek a compromise rather than stand absolutely firm as he has done today. If the Government's position is upheld tonight and they have a majority, as I have no doubt that they will, the Lords might give way following that decision. They have done so on other issues, and they might do so on this one. If they do not, however, I hope, as I have already mentioned, that the Home Secretary will be willing to see what compromise can be reached. It would be totally inappropriate for the Parliament Act to be invoked on this measure.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): All right hon. and hon. Members on the Labour Benches agree with the general proposition that we expect the elected House of Commons to have primacy in general terms. The fact is, however, that the other place is giving us the opportunity to reconsider this fundamental issue carefully. There are important issues in relation to the passport matter, and I think that the French are having a little difficulty. I would have thought that that was a strong case for getting the biometrics and the passport operating properly before we move on.

Mr. Winnick: I understand that, and I hope that my right hon. Friend also understands the principle involved and the concerns expressed on several occasions.

To conclude, if the Lords refuse to give way, there should be fresh consideration by the Government, and the Parliament Act should not be used.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): The Home Secretary has rejected amendments Nos. 22G and 22H from the other place, claiming, if I understand correctly, that they are not serious compromises. I wonder why that is, because any cool and objective assessment of the amendments would suggest that they are very serious compromises indeed. Let me highlight three reasons for that.

First, the amendments are a major concession of principle from those who objected to identity cards and their compulsory introduction, because opponents accept for the first time that they will become compulsory, but according to a deferred timetable. That has been a painful and difficult decision for those who have a long track record of opposing the Bill out of principle. The Home Secretary's dismissal of the seriousness of that concession does not do justice to their deliberations.

Secondly, it is simply implausible to suggest that the amendments would cause huge practical problems. All that they suggest is a deferral from 2009, which would be the first full year of operation of the ID card scheme, to the end of 2011, 18 to 24 months later. Nothing that we have heard today suggests that that shift of a few months poses enormous complexities and practical problems for the Government.

Thirdly, I should have thought that, from the Government's point of view, these compromise amendments would be a good deal better than some of the other compromise amendments that are doing the rounds. During the debate in the other place, Lord Armstrong referred explicitly to the possibility that, when the Bill returned there, he would table amendments inserting a complete opt-out for those who do not want to subscribe to the identity card scheme at all. That would blow a hole in the Bill that would surely be much more serious for the Government than these measured amendments. They represent a major compromise, undertaken in a spirit of careful deliberation over where the two sides may meet on this difficult issue. They are practical, they will not lead to insuperable obstacles, and they are certainly better than the alternatives that may now be debated in the other place.

The Home Secretary said that the amendments would introduce uncertainty, delay and extra costs. I do not see what is uncertain about a date, 31 December 2011. That seems to me very certain and very precise. The date is a little further away than what is envisaged in the much vaguer timetable that the Government appear to have in mind, but there is nothing uncertain about it. Yes, it involves a delay, but a modest delay that has been mooted with the aim of securing a reasonable compromise. As for the costs, it is impossible to test the assertion that the amendments would lead to extra costs, because the scheme has not been properly costed by the Government and we have not yet been given a detailed account of what the costs would cover. The costs that have been floated have been summarily rejected and called into question by independent analysts, not least in the London School of Economics, which recently suggested that in its first 10 years of operation the scheme would run up a whopping £1.8 billion deficit.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The Government's record on major IT projects is currently pretty dreadful. The longer the scheme is put off, the better the Government may become at such projects. The delay may therefore result in considerable savings.

Mr. Clegg: Given the almost draconian enormity of the scheme, I should have thought that the Government would leap at the chance of having a bit more time in which to work out the practicalities and the costs, given that they are shamefully vague about both at present. The hon. Gentleman has made a good point, which merely reinforces my feeling that the amendments, as well as representing a serious political compromise, offer a practical way forward.

Mr. Love: Does the hon. Gentleman see any contradiction between his party's position in respect of a democratically elected second Chamber and the fact that these so-called compromise amendments result from the fourth opportunity that the House of Lords has taken to ask the House of Commons to change its mind?

Mr. Clegg: The other place is entirely within its rights in rejecting an attempt by the Government to impose compulsion by stealth in the name of voluntarism. The nub of the problem is that every Member of both Houses is being asked to indulge in doublespeak whereby "voluntary" mutates into "compulsory". Surely they are within their rights in saying that that will not happen in their name.

The final merit and virtue of the amendments is that they would allow the electorate to have another look at the issue, and to judge whether the Government have been straightforward in their acrobatics. As I have said, the commitment in Labour's last manifesto to a voluntary introduction of identity cards has miraculously re-emerged as an introduction of identity cards by compulsion. If the Government accepted the amendments, at least the voters would be able to decide what is voluntary and what is compulsory. I hope that common sense would prevail when they read the extraordinarily ambiguous doublespeak in that manifesto.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I speak as one who has been implacably opposed to identity cards throughout his political life. Is not the great benefit of these proposals that if the Government insisted that they wanted to introduce the cards, they would have to go to the country with an absolutely clear proposition, given the trouble that they have got into in the past year? Meanwhile, the rest of us could go to the country with an entirely different proposition. It could become a real issue, with the public realising that there was a real choice, and—I would hope—it could provide another very good reason for the public to reject an increasingly authoritarian Government.

Mr. Clegg: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. Giving voters the opportunity to make up their own minds at the next general election is a more democratic and accountable way of resolving this issue than resorting to the semantics to which this Government have subjected us for so long.

The Home Secretary is insisting on rejecting amendments that, as I have tried to explain, are serious in their political intent, and which are real, practical compromises that are better than any of the alternatives. In the absence of any clear justification for such rejection, I join those who urge Members in all parts of the House to support Lords amendments Nos. 22G and 22H.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): When the Conservatives cry "Freedom!", it usually means one of two things: either the French are about to invade us, or the Conservatives cannot rely on their arguments, which are usually quite weak on such issues. Having listened to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), I believe that today is a case of the latter. He and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) have made a great deal of what was said in the Labour party manifesto. I do not intend to go too far down that road, but it seems that the Lords' justification for continuing to delay this process is that the manifesto in some way contradicts the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Harborough quoted the words that he thinks are ambiguous, and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam accused us, in relying on those words, of indulging in semantics. The quotation that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough gave—it was an accurate one—is that the scheme will be introduced

"on a voluntary basis as people renew their passports."

Simon Hughes: On a "voluntary" basis.

Mr. Howarth: Yes, as people renew their passports. As I said when we debated this issue just over a week ago, the voluntary principle is based on the idea that people voluntarily take out a passport. [Interruption.] There is no compulsion. [Interruption.] I accept that there may well be very good reasons why people need to have a passport, but the process itself—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) wish to make an intervention.

Mr. Garnier: No, Madam.

Mr. Howarth: If the hon. and learned Gentleman did wish to make an intervention, I would gladly accept it, but he obviously does not have a point to make.

Mr. Garnier: It is an old filth's trick to quote selectively. The right hon. Gentleman has accepted that my quotation was accurate. If he reads the whole of the passage that I referred to, it is quite clear that the voluntary roll-out refers to the introduction of the ID card scheme. Nobody in their right mind could possibly argue the case that he is arguing; he really ought to apply his mind to the whole of the phrase used.

Mr. Howarth: I have read the whole of that section of the manifesto; in fact, I took the trouble to read it before the general election, and I would have supported a compulsory scheme in any event. The hon. and learned Gentleman has repeatedly selectively quoted from the manifesto, purely to justify the ongoing ping-pong with another place over that passage's precise meaning. There is no justification for his continuing to do so, and still less for an unelected House's continuing to do so.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: No; if I conclude my remarks, somebody else might be able to speak; indeed, the hon. Gentleman might be able to.

The second game of semantics that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough engaged in today involved quoting my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when he was shadow Home Secretary in the 1990s, saying that he was opposed to the introduction of an identity cards Bill. The implication is that my right hon. Friend changed his mind on this issue when he came into government. That is partly true, but it was not true between 1997 and 1999, when I was a junior Home Office Minister. I have good reason to know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was still opposed to the introduction of identity cards during that period. Opposition Members must ask themselves what has happened in the meantime to make him and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary believe that the time is now right for their introduction.

The world has changed enormously since that time. We have seen huge changes in mass migration around the world, and the rise of Islamist terrorism. The events of 9/11 constituted the worst example of that terrorism, and last summer's London bombings the most recent. That is why people feel that the time is right to introduce identity cards.

It stretches the imagination too far to claim that my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Home Secretary want to introduce identity cards for a reason entirely different from what has been claimed. The world has changed and, for my part, I would support the introduction of compulsory identity cards. However, the proposals in the Bill will at least give us an opportunity to challenge people to prove that they are who they say that they are.

5.45 pm

Mr. Cash: In respect of the process of discussion involving the Lords and the Commons, I have observed that, although we in this House sometimes get cut out on the pong, we occasionally get an opportunity to speak on the ping.

I want to put it on record that I object strongly to the compulsory aspect of the Bill. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), I voted on Second Reading in the absolute certainty that that was the wrong way to go. This is a constitutional issue of the first order, and I believe that the Government, if they are intransigent on the matter, must use the Parliament Acts to get their proposals through.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) said that the electorate should decide this matter, and that that the Lords will not insist on the amendment proposing that the introduction of identity cards should be held over until 31 December 2011. If he is right—and we on the Back Benches are not privy to those discussions—the effect will be to allow the voluntary arrangements to go through.

Mr. Clegg: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. The amendments are crystal clear, and would defer the power to identify designated documents until 31 December 2011—in other words, until after the next general election.

Mr. Cash: I still have grave reservations about the infringement of the principle involved.

The Bill will mean that some people will be affected by the compulsory arrangements, while others will be covered by the framework of the provisions that the hon. Gentleman has just described. I belong to yet another group of people, as I have just applied for a new passport and driving licence to replace documents that were stolen. It appears that I would be outside the arrangements, either way. The provisions in the Bill deal with terrorism and other very important matters, so it is invidious that certain elements of the population will be covered by the proposed arrangements, and that others will not.

I end by saying that, for me, the bottom line is that the Government's proposals amount to an unsatisfactory and hybrid compulsory arrangement that we ought to reject. In the House of Lords, the question of the Salisbury convention was disposed of by Baroness Anelay, and the Home Secretary did not mention it again today. A principle of huge constitutional importance lies at the heart of the Bill. I shall be voting against the proposals, as I believe that they should be resisted at all costs.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): I think that Members on both sides of the House agree that it is not satisfactory continually to be debating this matter. This is the third time in the course of the past week. The Home Secretary must accept that there is a strong feeling on both sides of the House and both sides of the argument that this is, essentially, a surrogate compulsory Bill and we need to clarify that. Those of us who believe that the scheme should be voluntary should have the chance to put their case and the Home Secretary, who I think in his heart believes in a universal, compulsory card, should clarify that.

We have to find a compromise. Over the past week, the other place has come up with different suggestions. With amendments Nos. 22G and 22H, it has provided yet another one. I do not think that this suggestion—I am talking about the delay—is one of their better ones, but it is an attempt to find a compromise. As the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) said, it has some merits. It would allow a little more time to assess how the scheme is proceeding and it would give the public the opportunity to consider the matter again. As democrats, how can we resist either of those things? I would prefer Lord Armstrong's suggestion of an opt-out clause, but there are other compromises, as well.

In the case of all those compromises, we have not yet had any movement from the Government. If they want to resolve the matter, as they should and as they must, they must make some gesture. The idea of negotiations across the two Houses and across the Chamber requires both sides to show some flexibility. The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) is murmuring on the Front Bench.

Mr. Charles Clarke: The fact is that the Government have made a large number of compromises, not least, for example, in relation to having full-scale primary legislation before going compulsory. A whole string of them relate to cost. We have been compromising all the way.

Mark Fisher: Not in the past week. The Home Secretary is understandably complaining that the other place and those of us who support it in its amendments are being perverse and stubborn, but, in the past week, the Government's position has not moved.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Is it not at least arguable in constitutional terms that the other place is preserving the principle of the Salisbury convention by holding the Government to the manifesto promise that the ID card would be voluntary?

Mark Fisher: There are all sorts of variations on who is being more flexible. The truth is that there is a difference of opinion between having a low-tech, low-cost voluntary card and a high-tech, high-cost compulsory card that is rooted in the register. The House and the public ought to have the chance to resolve that. This way of trying to nudge up to and sidle round a compromise is not satisfactory. Let us get to the nub of the question. If the Home Secretary will not enable us to do that, he must come up with some movement himself. I will certainly vote against the motion again tonight and I hope that the other place votes accordingly and that we will return to the matter later this week. I hope that, by that stage, the Home Secretary will have had second thoughts and found some measure of flexibility in his position.

It being one hour after commencement of proceedings, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Order [13 February].

The House proceeded to a Division.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I ask the Serjeant at Arms to investigate the delay in the Aye Lobby.

The House having divided: Ayes 284, Noes 241.

London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 20

REGULATIONS: SUPPLEMENTAL

Lords amendment: No. 1.

6.15 pm

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 10.

Mr. Caborn: I shall be advising the House to accept all the amendments made in the other place. They were all tabled by the Government, following some high-quality debate and strongly made points on both sides of the House.

The Bill has benefited from broad cross-party support throughout its passage. We improved the Bill in this House and can improve it further today by accepting the amendments made in the other place. I genuinely thank Opposition parties for their broad support and I thank Members for their positive engagement with the Bill, which has helped to prepare it for Royal Assent just nine months after Jacques Rogge, the president of the International Olympic Committee, opened that envelope—with some difficulty—in Singapore last July and said that wonderful word "London".

Since then, we have been getting on with the preparatory work. We have started the Olympic park, and key personnel are already in place in both the London Organising Committee for the Olympic Games and the Olympic Delivery Authority. I am delighted that this important Bill has progressed so swiftly.

Amendments Nos. 1 to 10 all relate to the people whom the Secretary of State must consult when making regulations under clause 19, which will control advertising in the vicinity of games venues, and under clause 26, which will control street trading in the vicinity of venues.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the success of the Commonwealth games means that it is even more important that we get those provisions right, because there will obviously be much more media and advertising interest in making the Olympics a success? Will he congratulate all those who have won medals so far, especially Loughborough, which seems to be fifth in the medal table?

Mr. Caborn: I could not agree more—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) tells me that Welsh swimmers are doing incredibly well, too. I realise that I am digressing, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I am sure that you, like me, welcome the fantastic performance of our team in Melbourne and hope that it continues until the end of the week. It is nice to see headlines in the Australian press that we whacked the Australians in the swimming pool as well.

As Members will recall, this House debated advertising and it was debated again at length in the other place. The debate focused on whether we should put a requirement on the face of the Bill for the Secretary of State to consult the advertising industry and anyone else likely to be affected directly by the regulations under clauses 19 and 26. Members will remember that I gave unequivocal assurances that the advertising industry would be consulted. Those assurances were echoed in the other place. However, Members will be aware that we have been very much in listening mode during the Bill's passage and, as a result, I am pleased that the Government brought forward an amendment in the other place, which addresses the concerns of Members and the industry, and gives a statutory basis to the commitments that I have already given.

I draw Members' attention to the fact that the amendments address the comments made by the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee in its report on the Bill of 15 December. The Committee commented on the need for organisations representing those affected by either the advertising or street trading regulations to be consulted. The amendments mean that representatives will be consulted where interested persons are affected by the regulations.

I shall deal briefly with the detail of the amendments. Amendment No. 3 ensures that the advertising industry, and anyone else who may be affected by the regulations that will control advertising in the vicinity of games venues, will be consulted as the regulations are being drawn up. Amendment No. 8 ensures that those likely to be affected by regulations under clause 26, controlling street trading in the vicinity of venues, will similarly be consulted.

The remaining amendments in the group make minor and consequential changes, and I commend them to the House.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I, for one, am extremely encouraged that we are all here. On Third Reading, I said that, although the Bill is not lengthy in parliamentary terms, it is, in fact, quite complex—setting up a de facto regional development agency in the Olympic delivery authority in its first half and establishing the ground rules of the marketing of the commercial media rights in the second. The Minister agreed about that then and looked at me, possibly a little ruefully, over the Dispatch Box. Indeed, subsequent events have proved that right. Given the fact that these are difficult and technical issues, I am delighted that they have been ironed out during the parliamentary process and that the Bill is back with us tonight.

The time interval between winning the bid on 6 July and the first publication of the Bill on 14 July was extraordinarily short, even allowing for the fact that much of the preparatory work had obviously been done. Given the Bill's technical nature, which I have already acknowledged, it is a very considerable achievement on behalf of all those responsible for drafting the Bill—LOCOG, the British Olympic Association and, of course, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport—that the list of amendments is so short. May I therefore genuinely ask the Minister—I mean this absolutely seriously—to pass on my thanks to all those who were involved?

In the other place, my noble Friend Lord Glentoran said:

> "If democracy in this country could run on the sorts of lines that we have debated in this particular Bill, this country would be a better place".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 March 2006; Vol. 679, c. 1210.]

Fabulous, is it not? I wholly agree. The process of parliamentary scrutiny has genuinely made this a better Bill. I am told that the Sydney games needed four Bills, and I suspect that, as the games progress, a number of other issues will benefit from parliamentary scrutiny. I hope therefore that the Government will be encouraged by their experience with the Bill and that, as a result, they will involve Parliament closely, as the process develops. That is crucial to maintain the cross-party consensus that has characterised both the bid and the Bill.

All four groups of amendments before us tonight were introduced as a result of concerns first raised in Committee and subsequently by our Front-Bench spokesman in the other place, and I should like to record my thanks to Lord Glentoran for the part that he played. Unsurprisingly, all four groups of amendments therefore enjoy my support.

This the first group of amendments mandates the Secretary of State to consult the relevant industry bodies before regulations on advertising and street trading are drawn up. The Minister agreed to that principle in Committee, but it will now be given statutory force. Clearly, it is eminently sensible to involve the industry closely at every stage and for that requirement to have statutory force, and we all want consultation, rather than prescription, to characterise the delivery of the games. This group of amendments, therefore, has our full support.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I am delighted that the Minister introduced this string of amendments and, quite rightly, used it as an opportunity to praise all our athletes for their successes in the Commonwealth games. Reference has already been made to the rivalry between Bath and Loughborough. Of course, the Minister will be well aware of where our swimmers were, in the main, trained—and it was not Loughborough.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab) rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's intervention will relate to the amendments.

Chris Bryant: I am very grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for your advice. I was going to say that, when considering the advertising of the Olympics in 2012, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear in mind that not just English images should be used. David Davies—not the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), nor the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies)—won by nearly a full length, and he was not trained anywhere near Bath or Loughborough.

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that, on the important matter of advertising, we do not want people to use ambush marketing on the pretence that someone came from their area when that was not true. Of course, he rightly reminds us that the success in the Commonwealth games to date has come from all the home countries, and we should rightly applaud all those who are involved.

The Minister rightly made the point in introducing this string of amendments that the Bill has received a great deal of cross-party support. These proceedings are rather like the marathon runner who can find the extra energy to sprint at the end of a long race: we have the opportunity to make some important improvements during the Bill's final stages, as a result of the cross-party consensus.

The Minister is well aware of the history; it has been referred to already. Much of what we are debating now is based on ideas that were first suggested by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) and myself in Committee, when the Minister was not prepared to accept an addition to the list of consultees in the Bill, particularly in relation to the advertising industry, notwithstanding the fact that the proposal was modelled on the Gambling Act 2005, which the very same Minister had taken through the House only a few months earlier. None the less, he was not prepared to accept that proposal. The Bill then went to another place for debate, and we were all eventually delighted that the Government were willing to accept that the advertising industry should become a statutory consultee.

Although I clearly welcome these amendments, because they are based on proposals that originally came from Liberal Democrat and other Opposition Members, I want to raise an issue with the Minister nevertheless. We are considering the important issue of ambush advertising and marketing, and it is crucial for the House to accept that such things can happen and that we must guard against them for obvious reasons, to protect the Olympic symbol from its unwanted use in advertising.

We therefore accept not only the need to take rapid action, as people propose novel ideas for ambush marketing, but the need for rapid consultation. That is all accepted, so it is important to take account of the fact that, only yesterday, the Joint Committee on Human Rights commented on that aspect of the Bill in its seventh report on legislative scrutiny. On page 6 of that report, on the procedures that might be adopted, it said:

"Ordinarily this would be the occasion for adverse comment from our Committee".

It went on to point out that it would not make such adverse comments, because of the special circumstances of the Olympic and Paralympic games. However, it made a strongly worded recommendation. It said:

"We consider it, however, all the more important that the explanatory memorandum which accompanies the regulations when they are made provides a detailed explanation as to why in the Secretary of State's view the restrictions on advertising are compatible with the rights identified above".

The Committee was obviously referring to human rights.

It is crucial that the Minister use this opportunity to give absolute assurances that the regulations, when published, take account of the Joint Committee's recommendations. With that said, I, like the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent, am delighted to accept these Lords amendments.

OLYMPIC SYMBOL PROTECTION

Lords amendment: No. 11.

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move, That the House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 12, 13 and 18 to 20.

Mr. Caborn: The thanks that the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) gave to my staff and all those who worked on the Bill will be passed on. They have done an excellent job not just on the Bill, but in keeping Opposition Members informed and, indeed, in considering and acting on many of their comments, and rightly so. Those thanks will be conveyed to all those concerned.

We will consider the Joint Committee recommendations that were referred to by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and incorporate them in the explanatory memorandum. That should be available when the Bill receives Royal Assent, which, I hope, will be early in April or even towards the end of this month.

6.30 pm

This group of amendments gives greater clarity as to how the London Olympics Association right affects publishers and broadcasters. The Bill had always provided for exemptions from the London Olympics Association right for people who broadcast reports or published information about the 2012 games. These amendments provide greater clarity and certainty for publishers and broadcasters that their activities will not be adversely affected by the new association right.

Our intention throughout has been to ensure the absolute freedom of the press to report about, or indeed comment on, the Olympic games and the Paralympic games. The amendments provide important clarification of that position, but in creating an "editorial or journalistic" exemption, we needed to ensure that we did not unwittingly create a situation that advertisers and those who seek to ambush the games could exploit. That is why the journalistic exemptions in the original draft of the Bill contained the phrase "necessary incident". That phrase caused the publishers and broadcasting industries considerable concern, and I am happy that we were able in the other place to table amendments that addressed that concern.

We have found a form of words that provide comfort to the publishers and broadcasting industries that their activities will not be unfairly affected by the Bill, but that also ensure that advertising material that is published at the same time as, or in connection with, a report or information about the games will not have an "editorial" exemption behind which to hide.

I think that both sides of the House have always been in agreement about what this provision should achieve—ensuring the freedom of the press in relation to the 2012 games. I think these amendments achieve that without creating a loophole that advertisers who seek to ambush the games could exploit. While the issue came up in debate on the provisions in schedule 4, it applies equally to the Olympics association right as well. That is why we have made identical changes to schedule 3, which amends the original Olympic symbol legislation.

I hope that hon. Members agree that these changes improve the Bill and that they will be prepared to accept the amendments that their lordships have made.

Hugh Robertson: As the Minister has said, this group of amendments addresses concerns raised by the broadcasting and newspaper industries and taken up by both Opposition parties both here and in the other place. On Report in this House, the issue was raised at a fairly late hour so I am delighted that it has now been properly addressed.

There was a justifiable concern that wholly legitimate and acceptable broadcasting and journalistic activity could—I say only "could"—be caught by the advertising regulations, and there was particular concern about the term "necessary incident". This group of amendments addresses that concern, exempts publishing and broadcasting reports and information about the 2012 games from infringing the London Olympics Association right and gives the exemption statutory force on the face of the Bill. As you might expect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, this group of amendments therefore has my wholehearted support.

Mr. Don Foster: There is no doubt that this is a welcome group of amendments. As the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) and the Minister have said, there was from the beginning concern from the newspapers and broadcasters about the original provision. It is worth recalling what the Newspaper Society said in its letter to members of the Standing Committee. It stated:

"For a statutory body to have any role in determining the content of a newspaper's editorial material would be without precedent and would represent an utterly unacceptable incursion into the freedom of the press, and a breach of the Human Rights Act 1998 as being contrary to Article 10 of the Convention."

Similar concerns were expressed by many other bodies.

As a result, I tabled a number of amendments in Committee initially to expand the safeguards to cover criticism and review in addition to reporting. That was considered inadequate. At a later stage, I proposed that the provision include "any editorial usage" without limitation. That, too, was rejected by the Minister. In another place, my noble Friend Lord Clement-Jones, who is the Front-Bench spokesman for the Liberal Democrats, proposed an amendment that would have deleted the words "as a necessary incident of" and inserted the phrase "in the course of". Sadly, that too was rejected. However, I am delighted that we now have a Government amendment that deletes the words "as a necessary incident of" and inserts not the phrase "in the course of", but merely the word "in". That is clearly briefer, but makes exactly the same point. It is very similar to the amendment tabled by my noble Friend Lord Clement-Jones, so it is hardly surprising that we fully support it.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): I briefly wish to take the opportunity to add my support to the amendments. We all recognise that, although some people will get to watch the Olympics live, most people even in my constituency of Putney, which is close to where some of the events will take place, will watch the games on television in the same way that we now watch Wimbledon on television. To be able to iron out the concern described is a real achievement. I am very pleased that we have been able to do it.

Lords amendments Nos. 12 and 13 agreed to.

Schedule 4

LONDON OLYMPICS ASSOCIATION RIGHT

Lords amendment: No. 14.

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 15 and 16.

Mr. Caborn: This group of amendments relates to the status of the words and phrases listed in schedule 4. In debate, both here and in the other place, considerable concern was expressed about the "evidential burden" that we had created in relation to schedule 4. The evidential burden would have meant that the use in combination of the words and phrases listed in paragraph 3 of the schedule would, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, have been treated as constituting an association with the London Olympics. Although the burden was a light one, by which a defendant had to produce any evidence that an association had not been made, to shift the burden back to LOCOG to prove its case, we have listened to what has been said during the Bill's passage and have taken the opportunity to amend it by removing the evidential presumption.

We still feel that the list of words and phrases in schedule 4 is important in helping the public to understand what sort of activity may create an association with the London games, but we appreciate the concerns that have been expressed about the position in which we would have been putting advertisers and businesses by virtue of an evidential presumption.

The amendments will remove the evidential presumption attached to the use of the words and phrases listed in paragraph 3. Instead, we have suggested that when considering whether the London Olympics Association right has been breached, the courts would be able to consider, in particular, whether the defendant had used a combination of the words and phrases listed in schedule 4.

I hope that hon. Members will be able to support this approach. It removes the evidential presumption about which both Houses had expressed concerns, but retains in the Bill the list of words and phrases that provides greater clarity for the public about what the association right is about, and allows the court to take into account the use of those words and phrases when deciding whether someone has infringed the association right. I hope that the House will accept the amendments.

Hugh Robertson: The amendment addresses the use of presumption, in that a person is "presumed" to have infringed the London Olympics Association right by using any of the words listed in the Bill. It has become known, slightly unfortunately, as the reversal of the presumption of innocence, and it was one of the most controversial aspects of the original Bill.

As the Minister has said, we debated the issue at length both in Committee and on Report, and I warned him on Third Reading that I thought that it would cause problems in the other place.In Committee we discussed the defences that were available in the original Bill and the fact that the approach was consistent with Sheldrake v. DPP and the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. However, concerns remained, focused mainly on two areas: first, the fact that it is a basic principle of English law that one is innocent until proven guilty, and the regulation at least seemed to contravene that principle; and secondly, the fact that the Bill seemed to weight the dice firmly in favour of LOCOG.

We all accept that the marketing of major international sports events is now in a new era, and organisers demand exclusivity to derive the most commercially advantageous sponsorship deals. As a quid pro quo, we all accept that some of the money finds its way back to the grass-roots development of sport. I wholly agree with that principle. However, it is important to strike a balance so that the enforcement of the measures is not unduly heavy-handed.

The amendments represent a good compromise. LOCOG gets the exclusivity that it requires and the security of knowing that the regulations will take effect on Royal Assent, while on the other side of the fence, the industry gets some measure of protection from over-zealous enforcement. I therefore have no hesitation in agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. Don Foster: I, too, am delighted to say that we will support the amendments. This matter caused great concern during the passage of the Bill. I said in Committee that at the very least the presumption of liability, if not of guilt,

"goes against what everyone in this country and certainly our courts holds dear: the principle of innocence until proven guilty."

When the matter was first raised, the Minister said:

"it is appropriate, and indeed proportionate, that the burden of proof falls on the defendant in this case."

We argued strongly that the Government's view was incorrect, but the Minister tried to justify it by saying:

"we are not going after the little granny who owns the sweet shop at the bottom of the road, in order to haul her before the courts. That would be crazy."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 18 October 2005; c. 94–97.]

However, as the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) has rightly pointed out, it is crucial that we realise that we will be dealing not only with the little granny, but with local sports clubs and community bodies, which need protection.

I was genuinely delighted that although the Government failed to accept amendments tabled in this place, progress was made when the Bill got to another place and was in the hands of my noble Friend Lord Clement-Jones. I noted with interest that Lord Davies of Oldham described himself as quailing in the face of Lord Clement-Jones on the matter. It was good to note that after Lord Davies had listened to my noble Friend's argument, he was willing to accept it and move an amendment with wording similar to that tabled by my noble Friend.

I am sure that the amendments will be accepted today, but I hope that the Minister will give thought on another occasion to the outstanding question of LOCOG's status in respect of freedom of information legislation. He will be aware that LOCOG is exempt from such legislation because it is a private body. I accept entirely that confidential business matters need to be protected, but that legislation already protects them. Although LOCOG will not be covered by freedom of information legislation, I hope that it will operate as if it was covered by that legislation, because it is important that there be absolute transparency whenever it acts and makes decisions, especially on the matter that the amendments address. Let me end as I began, by saying that I am delighted that we are considering amendments to the most controversial bit of the Bill and that we have found a satisfactory situation to the problem.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I add my congratulations on the way in which this issue has been dealt with, which demonstrates that there has been cross-party support for getting the wording right throughout the Bill's passage. Opposition Members were right to raise the matter in Committee because the Bill would have somewhat shifted the presumption on the evidence, although we also realised that there was a real need to prevent ambush marketing. The headline-grabbing words in the Bill made it difficult to escape that thought. The idea that we could ban the use of the word "summer" in a whole variety of contexts, which was suggested by paragraph 3(4)(g) of schedule 4, caused consternation outside the House—although those of us who were involved in the Bill's passage, LOCOG and others realised that we wished to prevent the use of a combination of phrases and words, such as "2012" and "the games", for commercial purposes.

I want reassurance from the Minister about a matter raised by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). Will he ensure that there is sufficient flexibility for amateur sports clubs and associations and county sports partnerships throughout the country? For example, in Leicestershire the county sports partnership and others are trying to organise 2012 fun runs from now right through to the time of the Olympics. We want an assurance that no such projects will ever be caught, because they are intended not to make a commercial profit out of the games but to encourage people to participate. They are intended to encourage mass participation in sport throughout the country by garnering enthusiasm for the 2012 Olympics.

We have made the right move by trying to reassure people outside the House that the presumption is not the wrong way round, and that the presumption of innocence exists. However, the regulations will still be sufficiently tough to address those who wish to profit from the games. We should not underestimate the fact that many people will want to ride on the back of the success of the Olympics, especially as we run up to the games in 2010 and 2011. If we allow that to happen, it might jeopardise the commercial success of the Olympics and the money that we need to generate through big sponsors to pay for the games. It is thus important that we get this aspect of the Bill right. On reflection, we now have perhaps the best possible way forward, so I congratulate all who have been involved on finding the solution.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I welcome the amendment on evidential presumption, because the matter caused a great deal of debate in Committee. However, I wish that the amendments went further, especially on the terms of infringement.

As we predicted in Committee, the list of prohibited words and expressions is starting to cause problems for several organisations. Such organisations wish to support the games and ensure that they are a success for the whole country. An organisation in my constituency called Basingstoke 2012, which was set up to promote Basingstoke as a site for an Olympic training team, has already fallen foul of the rules, and I believe that other organisations throughout the country are experiencing similar difficulties. The problems are of such an extent that my local paper, the Basingstoke Gazette, is running a competition to rename the organisation. In the meantime, the organisation is being called "Basingstoke 2011 plus one" to try to get round the problem. The situation is a little reminiscent of what we were discussing in Committee, so I hope for further reassurance from the Minister that organisations that wish to support the success of the games for the betterment of the country will not fall foul of the measures.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 15 and 16 agreed to.

Lords Amendment: No. 17.

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

I have heard the comments made by the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller), and I shall speak to LOCOG about that matter. As she knows, LOCOG will start any prosecution and take a view on such issues. We will give further consideration to freedom of information, and although the issue should not be addressed in the Bill, I have heard the point made by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster).

Like other amendments that we have debated today, Lords amendment No. 17 was introduced following debate in this House and the other place. It makes it clear that before altering the list of words and phrases in paragraph 3 of schedule 4, the Secretary of State shall consult the advertising industry, advertising regulators, LOCOG and anyone else whom she thinks appropriate. The amendment is similar to those that we have already discussed in relation to the advertising and street trading regulations, and again, we have listened to the concerns expressed by the industry and on both sides of the House. The amendment provides on the face of the Bill greater assurance for the advertising industry that it will be consulted on provisions that may affect its day-to-day business. I think it unlikely that the list of words and phrases in schedule 4 will change, but hon. Members will appreciate that if damaging ambush marketing takes place between now and 2012, the Secretary of State must retain the right to alter that list.

Mr. Don Foster: Does the Minister agree that there would be another possible reason for a change if the IOC changed the technical manuals, in which case the Secretary of State would have no choice other than to change the wording?

Mr. Caborn: That is right. The IOC could make such a change, perhaps in response to an international issue, in which case the amendment would give us the necessary flexibility. We must retain the right to make a change in order to provide greater clarity both to the courts and to the public about what sort of activity is likely to create an unauthorised association.

We should also bear in mind that the Bill provides for the Secretary of State to remove words from the list, if legitimate business is stifled as a result of the provision in schedule 4. As a result of the amendment, the Secretary of State "shall consult" persons who will be affected by changing the list of words. The amendment specifies that appropriate consultation will take place with the advertising industry, advertising regulators, LOCOG and others. I am happy to advise the House to accept the amendment, which includes some of the commitments that we have made during the Bill's passage through Parliament.

Hugh Robertson: As the Minister has said, the amendment gives statutory force to the requirement to consult the advertising industry, its regulators and LOCOG. Once again, it returns to an issue that was discussed at length in Committee and on Report in this House and in the other place. It recognises the concerns of the industry and strengthens the requirement to consult, and therefore has my full support.

As the Bill leaves this House and Parliament for Royal Assent, may I place on the record my view that it is a considerable achievement for Parliament to have got such a complicated but important Bill on to the statute book in so short a time? I have already paid tribute to civil servants for their work—I do so again now—and I also pay tribute to those at LOCOG and the British Olympic Association who have been involved with the Bill. The Bill has also been an excellent advertisement for the benefits of parliamentary scrutiny and cross-party co-operation. I hope that the Government will do everything in their power to ensure that that continues as we move towards 2012, and if they do so, they will have our wholehearted support.

Mr. Foster: Like the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), I am delighted that we have seen this final change of heart by the Government on this important issue. I am also delighted that we will now see on the face of the Bill some of the things that a number of hon. Members have requested for quite a long time.

As I said when we discussed the first group of amendments, we must accept that sometimes there will be a need for rapid change in the light of clever techniques used by advertisers. However, it is equally important that before any rapid change takes place, whether because of an incident or because of a request from the IOC, the consultation to which the amendment refers should take place. That may be difficult, because advertising is often planned a long time in advance, which involves the investment of a lot of money. I can foresee a number of difficulties, which is why I am pleased that the amendment includes not only consultation with the advertising industry but a requirement to consult those who regulate the advertising industry, which is a crucial addition.

It is worth reflecting that this is the only amendment that appears to have come almost out of nowhere. When other amendments were debated in the Lords, there was agreement that the Government accepted the principle and would come back with their own amendment. When this provision was debated in Committee in the Lords on 15 February, however, it was rejected outright, and the Government said that they were not interested in implementing it. Suddenly, lo and behold, the Government introduced the provision on Report on 16 March. None of us is sure what caused their change of heart, but whoever persuaded them—on this occasion it was not Lord Clement-Jones—they did a good job and deserve congratulation.

Like the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent and the Minister, I think that both Houses of Parliament can be inordinately proud of themselves for the way in which we have handled this Bill, which is the crucial legislation for the important 2012 Olympic and Paralympic games. All of us have been extremely well served by the Minister's staff, Department of Culture, Media and Sport civil servants and a wide range of lobbying groups. The lobbying groups have advised hon. Members on both sides of the House, which has enabled amendments to be tabled that have made the Bill much better than it was when it came before us a few months ago.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Let them take a bow.

Mr. Foster: The Minister certainly deserves to take a bow. He has worked hard on the Bill, and he has been willing to listen to the arguments and make concessions. All those involved deserve praise for what is now an excellent Bill, which will help us to deliver excellent Olympic and Paralympic games in 2012.

Managed Migration

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. McNulty.]

6.58 pm

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): I am delighted that we are discussing the important proposals on the new points-based system for managed migration, which were published the other week. In the first instance, I wanted to ensure that we had a debate—we tried to secure a debate in Westminster Hall, but that did not happen for various reasons, so I am enormously grateful that one is being held on the Floor of the House.

A proper, grown-up, substantial, mature debate on migration is long overdue in British politics in general and in this Chamber in particular. When we launched the document last week, I remembered that one of my predecessors in this role, the former hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green, had the temerity to try to get up a substantive debate on managed migration in the press. She was royally chewed up and spat out by the press and the political establishment, one and all, for having the temerity to suggest that economic migration might be a good thing rather than otherwise. I think and hope that we have come a long, long way and that the points-based system that we presented last week is part of that process. I hope, too, that we have come a long way from the situation that pertained at the general election. At the risk of boring the House, may I repeat that the Opposition should be thoroughly ashamed both of the views that they expressed and of their conduct?

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con) indicated dissent.

Mr. McNulty: I will exempt the hon. Lady, because I read her leaflets from start to finish, and they never mentioned immigration. She rightly concentrated on four of the five pledges in her inner London seat. It is not appropriate, in a general election or at other times, to publish the ignorant phrase,

"Which part of 'Send them back' don't you understand, Mr. Blair?", and expect it to be treated as a serious contribution to public policy debates on asylum or immigration. It is not clever to talk, as one leaflet did, about unlimited immigration and the "strain put on local schools by bogus asylum seekers".

It is not clever to show a little map of the world with a big arrow pointing at the immigration and nationality directorate in Croydon, along with the phrase, "Unlimited immigration—this way."

Those are not substantive contributions to the debate. Our work since the election shows that we have not run away from that debate. Public policy generally was not well served by the tone or tenor of an election campaign that conflated race, community relations and asylum and immigration in the nastiest way possible. It is not appropriate for a political candidate to say that five illegal immigrants were arrested in his local town centre and freed in the area. He went on to say that no one knew whether those people were criminals, were carrying diseases and so on. Those are serious allegations to level at fellow human beings. There was routine misinformation, in which central Government funding was conflated with other matters. Newspaper adverts up and down the country dressed up the issue, implying that there would be an impact on local council tax payers. However, they simply lied about the level of financial commitment and the cost of asylum to council tax payers. There was absolute misinformation and lies.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): I entirely agree that it is quite wrong to base any policy on abuse of the character of immigrants or would-be immigrants to this country. Does the Minister agree that it is equally wrong in an election or otherwise to abuse people who believe that it is none the less right to impose restrictions on immigration by saying that they are racist? That happened time and again up and down the country, when Labour candidates stood against us, and against me in particular.

Mr. McNulty: May I say unreservedly that I completely agree with the right hon. Gentleman? It is not racist to talk about immigration control or managed migration, but the Conservatives' national campaign suggested that we believed it was. However, that allegation was not true, either nationally or in my constituency. I deplore the actions of anyone who attacks people simply for trying to hold a debate on serious issues that matter to our country and describes them as racist. We need a substantive debate, and our five-year strategy, including the points-based system, is an important contribution. In February, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State delivered a speech in which he outlined the points-based system, the new asylum model and other aspects of policy that I have had the pleasure of trying to implement since the election. During the election campaign, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in Dover on 24 April that most people recognise the huge contribution that immigrants have made to this country. That is central to what we are trying to achieve with the points-based system.

Justine Greening: I shook my head because of my experience as a candidate last year. Many of my constituents who are seeking indefinite leave to remain have to wait for years before they receive a response and can get on with their lives in Putney. I believe that we raised a valid issue at the election, and the fact that the Government have now introduced a points-based system for immigration—and I am pleased that they have done so—surely demonstrates that we were right to do so. He might not like the tone of our arguments—he rightly pointed out that I did not adopt that tone—but does he not agree that we were right to raise the issue?

Mr. McNulty: No, I do not. That is not simply because of the tone, which was unnecessarily hectoring and verged on racist in some quarters—I accept, however, that that applied to some areas more than others—but because the substance was wrong. The hon. Lady has been an MP for 10 months, so I find it hard to accept that she has hordes of constituents who have been waiting years for indefinite leave to remain. I praise her, however, along with a few of her colleagues, for having the intelligence to resist the nasty hectoring campaign that many members of her party ran nationally. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister rightly described Conservative policy at the election as incoherent babble. He said it was a deliberate attempt to exploit people's fears—that is true, although perhaps not in Putney—and to suggest that for reasons of political correctness those in power do not care to deal with the issue.

That is almost the exact opposite of the rhetorical question posed by the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley). The Conservatives deliberately suggested that there were subliminal ideological reasons why, at the election, the Government and the Labour party did not want to do anything about immigration, which was untrammelled, uncontrolled and relentless: it was suggested that that resulted from our new Labour, ideological, Islington-based position. It is, however, utterly wrong—in fact, it is as wrong as the opposite suggestion.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I agree that it was not just a matter of tone. In my constituency, misinformation about the cost of immigration to council tax payers was circulated. It was opposed by the Church and the chief executive of the council, and it did nothing but disturb race relations. How could that have been accidental?

Mr. McNulty: I agree, but I do not wish to dwell on the matter unduly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. There has been nine minutes of dwelling on this. I appeal to the House to recognise that our debate will be better if we look forward rather than back?

Mr. McNulty: I accept your admonition, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Prime Minister went on to describe Conservative proposals to withdraw from international conventions on refugees and to process asylum seekers on an offshore fantasy island as beyond rebuke. It is important for public confidence in asylum and immigration policy that our debates should not set such a tone or make ridiculous proposals. The new asylum model has been developed in that context, and it must be set alongside the points-based system.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I accept that the Minister is painting a picture before moving on to the detail of the scheme, but may I bring him back to the subject of our debate? I congratulate him on all the work he has done to bring together 80 separate schemes, but is he satisfied that his new system will deal with the acute shortage of chefs in Indian and Bangladeshi restaurants?

Mr. McNulty: I am entirely satisfied that that is the case, but I told the sector that there are already problems with shortages. It is no good holding a fruitless debate about the impact or otherwise of the points-based system, as the sector broadly agrees that it will help, rather than hinder, recruitment. I am more than happy, however, to meet it to talk about its concerns about current shortages and training. It agrees that the points-based system will help, but we need to address the serious problems that already exist.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I welcome my hon. Friend's commitment to work with the restaurant sector on the issue, which is enormously important. Into which category will the workers in question fall under the points-based scheme? Is it the second category, under which relatively skilled people can stay after five years, or is it the third category of unskilled workers who have to go back after a year?

Mr. McNulty: The answer to my right hon. Friend, in short, is both. Once the sector has worked with the skills advisory body to establish that there is a shortage, those with skills who are performing skilled roles as chefs, under-chefs and such roles in restaurants can come in under tier 2. If it can be shown—from discussions with the sector I think that it can be—that neither the UK labour market nor the wider EU labour market can fill the gaps in the sector, those with a much lower skills base can come in through that route.

We must establish sector by sector where the cut-off point is between tier 2 and tier 3—the cut-off point in terms of skills, training, remuneration and qualifications. Between now and final implementation of the plan, we have the time and space to get discussions under way with the sector. I repeat the point made by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary when we introduced the scheme: many of the concerns expressed by the sector, not just by Indian and Bangladeshi restaurants, but by the Chinese sector as well, need resolving now, rather than waiting for the system to be implemented.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I am pleased to hear my hon. Friend's comments, but there are greater difficulties in rural localities. Some communities—cities and some larger towns—are more attractive to those who wish to come and work in that sector. It is difficult to draw them from the cities to rural areas.

Mr. McNulty: I accept that. Once the substantive shortages are clearly identified, such considerations must be factored into the process leading to the issuing of the work permit.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Can the Minister tell the House where he is now in the review of the food processing quota? The review, as I understand it, is due to be completed by June 2006. Given that the Government have said that on the whole they want to bring to an end low-skilled migration schemes from outside European economic area countries, does he accept that although that might be a good policy—Community preference as a matter of principle—he needs to allow for the possibility that there will not be a sufficient labour supply from the new accession states, and that in those circumstances the gap can properly be filled from other countries?

Mr. McNulty: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, we made it clear in the Command Paper on the points-based system what stage schemes such as the sector-based schemes, the seasonal agricultural workers scheme and those covering food processing had reached and how they would continue.

The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), that much of the purpose of the points-based system is to reduce to the five tiers the 80-odd routes that have developed higgledy-piggledy for education, work and study. He is equally right—this is very important—that if the document is written on the assumption that some 350,000 workers from the A8 countries are filling many of the low-skilled positions in the UK economy, and that there will be a collective governmental "Oops!" in 2011 when all the barriers in all the European countries are down and nationals of the A8 countries have access to all the labour markets, the entire pool of labour filling the gaps from the A8 countries will suddenly dry up because it has gone elsewhere in Europe. The system must be and is flexible enough to take account of that.

I do not know and, if I may be flippant for a moment, the Home Office, given its previous record on futurology in these matters, does not know what will happen by the time we get to the transition from 2009 to 2011 and the barriers coming down across all European labour markets. I suspect that a residual element will still come to the UK for assorted cultural and other reasons because we have allowed them to come earlier rather than later. The number will probably not be 350,000, but the points-based system must be flexible enough so that if those gaps are not filled by A8 nationals once they are able to work throughout the European Union, the next step beyond EU preference will be to look in the wider international labour market.

John Bercow: The Minister is being generous in giving way. He should not be embarrassed about, and I would not criticise him for, what I might call the statistical inexactitude of Home Office labour market predictions. There is nothing to be embarrassed about there at all. All it proves is that Governments on the whole cannot predict these things. In that context, does the Minister agree that it is therefore incredibly important to look to the skills advisory body for detailed, independent and authoritative advice, and to publish the reports of that body so that we can see the basis on which policy is made?

Mr. McNulty: That is absolutely right, and I remember the hon. Gentleman raising that point in Home Office questions. The skills advisory body will be extremely important not only across sectors, but within sectors, and will work with the sector skills councils, the skills development agency and others so that there can be confidence across industry, the economy and the public about their discussions and analysis of skills shortages. That will determine how we fill the gaps from beyond an EU-wide labour market. The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I pay tribute to the intelligence, creativity and tenacity, all of which are overdue, that my hon. Friend has brought to such a sensitive job in Government. Developing the point made by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), which suggests that we are embarking on a journey akin to driving a car by reference only to the rear view mirror, rather than to what is happening in front, what lessons does my hon. Friend draw from the projections that the hon. Member for Buckingham suggested might be more accurate from employer and other associations? Around 2000, such organisations thought that demand for IT staff would remain substantial for the foreseeable future, but all of a sudden, almost out of a clear blue sky, the market and demand collapsed. Is my hon. Friend confident and convinced that the computer and other systems that will be in place will be sufficiently quick and adaptable to pick up trends more quickly than has been the case in recent employment history?

Mr. McNulty: They will have to be, in an increasingly dynamic, fast moving and global labour market. I demur from some of my hon. Friend's assumptions. Demand for IT workers still exists, but it is no longer located just in Europe. It is international. I describe the situation in terms of circularity. We need to go beyond—this underpins the points-based system too—the notion of the classic migration routes, where people moved from one place to another because the opportunities for their personal advancement were better. There is now increasing circularity.

IT skills are a good example. Indian investors who are investing significantly in the UK tell me that they would like second and third-generation British people of Indian origin to stay in the UK to fill jobs in the IT sector. Their fear is that because they are of Indian origin, people are going off for three, four or five years to Bangalore and various other "silicon valleys" in India, where they can have a far nicer lifestyle and greater reward for their skills. Indian investors would prefer them to stay in the UK and work for them here. That sort of circularity is increasingly part of the process of immigration—it is no longer simply a case of people moving from here to there in the classic model. I go along with my hon. Friend in part, but not in substance.

Central to the points-based system is the notion that economic migration is good. I am grateful that, across the piece, people have welcomed the publication of the paper. The CBI, the TUC, the British Council, Universities UK and a host of other organisations have given a broad welcome to the direction that it sets out. It does not give every single detail of where we are going to arrive at the points-based system. It is, in part, a response to a lengthy and extensive consultation process that took place from July to November, as outlined in the back of the document. It has not only received a broad welcome but created a broad desire among all the sectors that matter to work and engage with the Home Office to take things forward.

In terms of the time line, we think that we are about 18 months away from the full introduction of the overall points-based system. Bearing in mind that it started as an idea in the February 2005 speech that outlined the five-year plan, if the system is implemented by around February 2008, the most significant change in our migration policy in 34 years will have gone from a standing start to full implementation in the best part of three years, which is not slow in anybody's terms.

Last Friday, we held two post-publication events for what we are now supposed to call the stakeholders. The morning session was for the business community. Some 700 people turned up, and it went terribly well, with lots of questions asked and another broad welcome given. In the afternoon, between 250 and 300 people from the education sector discussed where we go from here. It is important that that engagement continues, and it shall.

One of the realities underlying the scheme is that there is now a broader European Union labour market that needs to be factored into the equation. By the end of the transition period of 2009 to 2011, there will be an open labour market across 25 countries. It is important that the points-based system is seen in the context of everything else that we are doing as regards border controls, the new asylum model and so on. The system must be, and will be, robust against abuse. Only those of benefit to the UK should be admitted, and once here they should comply with their conditions of leave. Equally central to the scheme is that those who should benefit from migration, particularly employers and education institutions, should work far more readily with the Government to ensure that that is the case.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): I regret having to bring in an element of negativity, but I wonder whether my hon. Friend shares my concerns about a situation in my constituency whereby a mushroom farm that has taken on a lot of migrant workers has been deliberately squeezing out the local work force. The migrant workers are working for far lower terms and conditions of employment and for excessive hours, and the indigenous work force, who were in their hundreds, are now down to 20-odd. Surely we must do something to protect our indigenous workers and prevent the racial tensions that mount as a result of this.

Mr. McNulty: I do not know the exact details of that case, but if my hon. Friend wants to share them with me I will certainly look into it. Migration is not about bringing people in to work in substandard conditions, and migrant workers must be afforded the same sort of welfare protection as anybody else. We are rightly taking cognisance of the impact of migration inflows on local labour markets.

Although it is beyond the remit of many aspects of the work of the National Asylum Support Service and other agencies, it is important that the Home Office, with other Government Departments, starts to consider the impact—sudden impact in some cases, it is fair to say—of concentrations of east European workers in certain areas. There was a case up in Crewe where all of a sudden, as a result of the successful work of a local employment agency, some 3,000 Polish workers descended on the area almost overnight. They were taking on perfectly proper jobs, so there was nothing wrong in that sense, but it might have been helpful if the employment agency had told the council that those people were coming.

Seemingly minor changes can have a significant impact on the local infrastructure. In the case of Crewe, 3,000 Polish people turned up in a population of 60,000. Given that the Poles are Catholic, it might be useful if the schools or the local education authority had had some notion that they were coming in case 25 children pop up in the local Catholic school saying, "We'd like to come in, please", as they have a perfect right to do. We need to consider such factors. We are working with the Department of Trade and Industry and others in respect of the exploitation of migrant workers and the impact on labour markets. About a year ago, I was pleased to launch a joint statement with the TUC and the CBI about the benefits of migrant workers, part of which dealt with the impact on local labour markets and the rights, benefits and welfare conditions of migrant workers. That is a very important point.

John Bercow: I do not sniff at what the hon. Member for East Lothian (Anne Moffat) said, as I am not familiar with the particular circumstances in her constituency. However, does the Minister agree that it is important conclusively to demolish the "lump of labour" fallacy—the notion that there is a fixed amount of work to be done and that immigrants are taking away the jobs of domestic workers? The truth is that the main demand for migrant labour comes in sectors where there are long-term job vacancies and significant skills shortages that need to be filled. In other words, people are doing jobs that British workers are unable or unwilling to do. That, for the most part, is the reality of the matter.

Mr. McNulty: I fear that the hon. Gentleman, whom I agree with, by the way, will tempt me back into talking about how daft and nasty the last Conservative election manifesto was. However, I shall resist that temptation, because he makes an entirely fair point. Traditionally, economic migration has principally been about the needs of the economy in a whole range of sectors where there is no apparent demand for work, and has not been for some time, from the domestic work force, not least in agriculture, where there is a long history of inward migration. Until Portugal beat England in the European championship, I had not realised that the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in Norfolk is surrounded by significant elements of Portuguese labour who have been there for generations servicing the rural economy. Obviously the people of Norfolk knew that, because they went and smashed up their pubs after Portugal had beaten England.

The hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) makes a good point that illustrates why the points-based system does not include a quota on immigration but responds to the specific needs of specific sectors across the economy. It brings 80-odd routes down into five manageable routes that create clarity for applicants and clarity for the employers and education institutions that require those applicants. Just as importantly, it gives the wider public confidence, which was knocked off-course by the Conservatives during the general election, in an immigration system that works in a controlled and managed way that aids our economy.

Justine Greening: I sympathise with the Minister's story about the Portugal v. England shoot-out. I was similarly disappointed when I heard cheers from a room next to mine, believing that it was full of English people, only to discover that most of the people who worked at the hotel where I was staying were Portuguese. I was therefore disappointed when I learned the result.

I believe that the proposals in the points-based system are for new applicants. Some of my constituents may have had to wait for several years already. If they have skills that would fit a points-based system, can they reapply and how will that fit in with their existing applications for leave to remain?

Mr. McNulty: Unkind colleagues on the Front Bench suggested that the people cheering next door might have been Scottish, not Portuguese, if goals were scored against England. I am sure that that is not case.

I cannot answer the hon. Lady substantively without knowing the specific constituents' cases to which she refers. Broadly, we should not confuse the new scheme with general settlement. We have clearly said that, in the points-based system, tiers 1 and 2, which essentially cover highly skilled migrants and areas where significant skills shortages have been identified, are settlement routes. Tier 3 is, by definition, temporary. Tier 4 covers students and may lead to a settlement route—there are ways out of that. Tier 5 covers short-term activities, such as youth exchange and cultural exchange. Again, it is temporary. The tiers should not therefore be confused with pending applications for indefinite leave to remain—ILR.

Those with pending applications for ILR on their journey to settlement will simply complete four to five years if they apply in the normal way—if they have no criminal records and so on. If ILR follows extended leave to remain—ELR—or other elements, from asylum to settlement via refugee status, with or without temporary protection, that is outside the points-based system. We are not therefore locking up every single element of the settlement and nationality routes, including the points-based system, together. I am sorry if that is convoluted and does not answer all the hon. Lady's points but I am happy to discuss it further at another time.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): I assure the Minister that it was not Scottish people in the hotel on the evening that has been mentioned.

The Minister spoke about all the different immigration schemes working together, which most of us welcome as a sensible step forward. However, where does that leave the Scottish Executive's fresh talent initiative? Will it remain as a stand-alone recruitment scheme? It was the only thing that Scotland had to give us some sort of competitive advantage to attract skilled migrants. Am I right to assume that it will be merged into tier 1A? If not, how does the Minister expect the initiative to stand alone, and to allow Scotland, which has chronic population problems, to compete for the skilled migrants?

Mr. McNulty: That is a fair point. Much of what Scotland has achieved through the fresh talent: working in Scotland scheme and other schemes will eventually be included in the points-based system. However, in doing that, sorting out the specific demographic and other difficulties that Scotland experiences will be borne in mind because we agree with the Scottish Executive. Scotland does not need a stand-alone system outwith the points-based system, but a managed migration, points-based system that deals specifically with Scotland's current difficulties. The document explains that. It provides for regional disparity, concerns and needs. I am not being disparaging or dismissing Scotland's concerns as regional. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Scottish labour market presents specific problems and challenges. That is why we are working closely with the Scottish Executive on the fresh talent: working in Scotland scheme. It is early days; the scheme has been running for only about a year. We are actively working with the Scottish Executive to ascertain what Scottish package—if I may use that phrase—emerges to deal with Scotland's needs and work with the grain of the points-based system. The hon. Gentleman makes important points but we are tackling them with the Scottish Executive and we shall make announcements in due course.

It is important that applicants find the process simpler and that employers and education institutions know the most important routes. That is the way forward for the UK in the 21st century. Hon. Members should rest assured that we do not underestimate the challenge of implementing the new system. We are approximately 18 months from full implementation. We need the legislative building bricks in the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill and we hope that we can secure that sooner rather than later.

Some significant discussion remains to be held with a host of groups about how they fit in with the strategic framework that the Command Paper clearly sets out. That covers not least working with the Scottish Executive. I believe that the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) made what he calls music in the recent past. Tomorrow, I will have discussions with the arts and cultural sector because there are concerns about the way in which the permit system affects, for example, orchestras that visit the country for tours. At an event on Friday, I was told that the points-system had at least the potential to smash the integrity of international circus tours. I did not mean to do that, so I shall engage with that sector, too. We are beginning to get to the level of talking to each sector about how its needs can be met in the context of the document.

The new system crucially shifts the work permit and visa application to the same domain, and the same process applies to both. That makes sense. There is no danger of our underestimating the IT training, resources and other elements that are required.

The points-based system constitutes a huge and significant step forward towards the Government's aim to achieve greater public confidence in the immigration system, and ensure that the UK and the UK economy secure the migrant workers that we deserve, and that they have the welcome that they deserve in this country and continue to make a substantial contribution to it. I commend the Command Paper to the House.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): Like the Minister, I am pleased that we are holding the debate and grateful that it is in the Chamber rather than Westminster Hall because of the seriousness of the subject. I only regret that he chose to preface a serious 30-minute speech with 10 minutes of cheap and backward-looking abuse, which was worthy neither of him nor the important subject.

Conservatives want this country to have a civilised and controlled immigration system. We welcome not only genuine refugees but immigrants who bring benefits to our economy and help provide the cultural diversity of modern Britain. We want debates on immigration policy to be calm and rational.

We believe that, for immigration to be positive both for the hosts and the new entrants to the country, it must happen under a controlled system, in which everyone has confidence. People must know that our borders are secure, that the amount of illegal immigration is minimised and that those who are here but have no right to be here will be identified and then removed. When that happens, we will be able fully to enjoy the economic and cultural benefits of migration.

Those are the challenges for the Government's overall immigration policy. The specific challenge for the system that we are discussing today is whether it will be fair, transparent and beneficial not only to our economy but our society.

Let me start with the principles behind the policy. We welcome the principle of a points-based system for economic migration. Indeed, we have called for it for some time, and, in the spirit of the new politics, I welcome the Government's move towards Conservative territory on this matter. I hope that I do not sound churlish if I inquire politely why it took them so long. They have produced five immigration Bills in their nine years of office. None fully contained such proposals, not even the measure that we are still discussing after last Thursday's peculiar events caused by the Government and the Whips Office. The truth is that it has taken the Government a long time—too long—to come to the conclusion that the present system simply is not working.

In a Home Office paper of 2005, the Home Secretary said that "the system we have at present works well".

In this year's document, however, he admits that the system is not effectively targeting the migrants of most benefit to the UK, and that it is complex, subjective and bureaucratic. He is now right. The recognition of the need for a new system is an implicit recognition that the present system is failing. There are several reasons why the system needs replacing. The entry clearance officers are under impossible pressures, there are no effective controls at too many of our borders, and the sheer complexity of our system defeats many people who could benefit this country.

However, the key questions, which Ministers are trying hard to evade—and to which we received no answers in the Minister's long speech this evening—are about the effect of the new system on the number of people coming into this country. There are two basic questions. Do the Government expect the new system to lead to a rise in the number of people coming to this country? Do they want it to lead to an increase in those numbers? In 2003, the previous Home Secretary famously said that he could see "no obvious upper limit" to legal immigration. Is that still Government policy? The Home Secretary has been opaque on the subject in recent days, so I hope that the Ministers will be able, between them, to clear the matter up this evening.

That question is absolutely central to the success or failure of a points-based system. The Government talk about managing migration, but there is all the difference in the world between asking people to form an orderly queue and then letting in anyone who wants to come, and saying that there is an upper limit to the numbers, beyond which we should not go. Which of those aims is this policy designed to achieve?

Keith Vaz: Why is the numbers game important, when those who will come to this country under the new scheme will be coming in order to contribute to the economy? Why is the numbers game still so important to the Conservative party?

Damian Green: It is not a game. The hon. Gentleman has made many distinguished contributions to this debate over the years, but he should try to resist using the phrase "the numbers game". Of course numbers are important. People want a controlled immigration system and they will want to know whether we have open borders or not. Whatever individual benefits might arise from the scheme, there will also be collective issues at stake, including population growth and pressure on public services, especially in those parts of the country that already have very high levels of population growth. It is impossible to look at this issue intelligently in the round without considering the effects on all the individuals concerned and the collective pressures on public policy.

Keith Vaz rose—

Damian Green: I shall give way again in a minute.

My objection to the proposals is that the Government are being completely ambiguous on this central matter—[Interruption.] The Minister is trying to heckle me from a sedentary position. If he wishes to make clear the Government's position, he might have the chance to do so later if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Or he can do so now by making an intervention. Meanwhile, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz).

Keith Vaz: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way a second time. I am concerned about the numbers game because, when the new member states joined the European Union on 1 May 2005, the Conservatives made allegations that those coming here would not make a contribution to the British economy. Those allegations were even extended to suggest that those people would go on benefits. The fact is, however, that their presence in this country has contributed greatly to our economy, and, at the last count, fewer than 100 of them had gone on benefits.

Damian Green: The hon. Gentleman has not raised the tone of the debate with that intervention. I could not have been clearer about my party's attitude to economic migration in the course of this speech. He has listened to it, and I could not have put it more clearly. We welcome people who will bring economic benefits to the country and who will themselves benefit from being here. Of course we also welcome genuine refugees, and we welcome the cultural diversity of modern Britain. I cannot put it more clearly than that.

I would now like some clarity from the Government on the purpose of this policy—[Interruption.] The Ministers are sitting there chuntering on the Front Bench, but the House will observe—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham) rose—

Damian Green: Ah, excellent!

Andy Burnham: I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman flannelling away. Picking up on what he has been saying, I understand that he is still in favour of a quota. Will he make it clear whether that is the case?

Damian Green: I am in favour of a controlled immigration system. Is the Minister in favour of uncontrolled numbers? Is it still the case that he can see "no obvious upper limit" to legal immigration? Will the Minister answer those questions?

Andy Burnham: The purpose of the system that my hon. Friend the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality has just outlined is that people should be allowed in if they can contribute to the economy, if there is a shortage and a need for people to come. That is the logic of the system. The hon. Gentleman has been outlining the argument for a quota. Is he in favour of a quota or not?

Damian Green: I am in favour of controls. I note that the Minister is not going to answer my questions—[Interruption.] Well, we are debating Government policy, and I think that it is significant that the Government will not explain the effect of that policy.

The important problem with the Government's lack of candour is not for the Government. They have long ago lost any reputation that they had for straight dealing. The real problem is for the essential confidence in our immigration controls, which we need if we are to have the calm and rational debate that we all want. If no one knows what the Government's underlying purpose is, suspicions about hidden agendas will proliferate. The solution lies in the Ministers' hands, but so far, over the past few minutes, they have failed to offer a solution to the problem that is facing them.

For instance, the document before us makes the point that only successful professionals, those in tiers 1 and 2, will be allowed to settle permanently in this country. The Conservatives have no problem with that part of the policy. But does it mean that the Government do somewhere have a target number for immigrants who will be allowed not only to work here but to settle here? There are respectable arguments for having such a target, and I am sure that everyone involved in the debate would be fascinated to know whether the Government shared them. The logic of their command paper is that that is where they are going.

There is clearly a distinction between a free-market approach to the movement of labour, which is common to the main parties—or, at least, common to the Conservatives and those on the Government Front Bench—and a policy that is indifferent to the rate of growth of the population of this country. That is why I emphasise the importance of the different rules on settlement rights between the different tiers. That is hugely important and central to any debate on this issue, yet the Government are trying not to have that debate.

I would like to move on to some of the details thrown up by the system. The first is the abolition of the right of appeal. The Government have been heavily lobbied on this matter, and I would like the Minister to deal with the points raised by the Immigration Law Practitioners' Association about the proposed administrative review that will replace the right of appeal. The association describes it as "a manifestly inadequate substitute for a right of appeal against a wrong decision. We have been unable to identify ways in which such a review would differ from the internal reviews that are supposed to happen now, according to the guidance for Entry Clearance Officers".

Most pertinently, the association quotes from a Department for Constitutional Affairs White Paper "Transforming Public Services: Complaints, Redress and Tribunals". The White Paper asks what an individual can do if they wish to complain. It goes on:

"The first and most direct remedy is to dispute decisions directly with departments and agencies. But in a democracy ruled by law, and under a government committed to high quality and responsive public services, simply appealing to a department's sense of fairness is not, and never has been, enough. There has to be redress beyond the department".

That is an interesting view from the Department for Constitutional Affairs, and one that appears to have been manifestly rejected by the Home Office in its proposals for administrative review. I hope that the Minister will be able to explain that apparent incoherence between the different Departments.

Even those of us who are sympathetic to attempts to avoid delays in the system—the point has already been made that the delays often cause intolerable problems for the individuals involved—need to be reassured that the system will be fair. According the DCA's White Paper, it clearly will not be. This concern links with another area of ambiguity, namely the time scale for the introduction of the new system. We have been told that the new system will be rolled out tier by tier, starting with tier 1, which seems perfectly sensible, but it would be reassuring to know the time scale for the later tiers. I understand that it is possible that even tier 2 will not be introduced until 2008. Given that it looks as though it will be many years before the full system is introduced, when will the current appeals be abolished? Will that happen gradually, along with the introduction of each tier?

Mr. McNulty: It is not the case that the system will take many years to be introduced. I have said that we will try to get the whole thing done over the next 18 months to two years. The hon. Gentleman will understand that we will need to consult on other elements such as fees and cost structures, as well as on the introduction of tiers. By the time that we rise for the summer, I hope that people will have a far clearer idea of all the assorted time lines involved.

Damian Green: I am grateful for that burst of clarity from the Government Front Bench, which is a rare treat.

While I am on tier 2, however, let me deal with the vexed question of restaurants, which the hon. Member for Leicester, East rightly raised. We are grateful to him, and I am also grateful to Christine Lee of the North London Chinese Association, and to others including Mr. Enam Ali from the Guild of Bangladeshi Restaurateurs for passing on their detailed concerns about the effect that the new system might have on hundreds of small businesses. I know that the Minister has held meetings on this subject, so he is aware of the main points of concern, which boil down to whether enough chefs with specialist skills will be available to keep Chinese, Indian, Bangladeshi and other restaurants going.

A few days ago, the Home Secretary appeared to say that the way to solve the growing shortage is simply to train replacements in this country. Again, the House deserves some clarity as to whether that is the Government's solution to the problem. Ministers are aware of the concerns that under the current proposals even highly skilled chefs will not score enough points to qualify under tier 2, particularly if they do not have any significant paper qualifications. There is also the issue of benefits in-kind, such as accommodation, which is often provided for chefs who come to this country. It is not obvious from the Command Paper how the salary-based allocation of points accounts for that. Mr. Ali, whom I mentioned, said:

"We can cite numerous examples where the lack of educational opportunity (which is the norm throughout the third world) to gain formal qualifications equivalent to NVQ levels 3 or 4, is being abused by Entry Officers as a pretext for Visa refusal. Typical is the story of a top chef currently running the kitchens of a five-star Bombay restaurant, who cannot gain entry to the UK because he is virtually illiterate."

Clearly, such sensitive issues will arise.

Mr. McNulty: I have spoken to Enam Ali, and I have told him, and I will tell the hon. Gentleman, not to quote constantly examples that are profoundly wrong. Any chef who is currently working and has the skills to work in a five-star restaurant in Bombay will be welcome in this country with open arms under the new system. The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong, and so is my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz). If there are differences, let us address those now.

Damian Green: I am glad that the Minister is confident enough to believe that he is right, and that distinguished Bangladeshi restaurateurs, his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East and the whole world—except for him—are wrong. For his sake, I hope that that is the case, as otherwise he is storing up trouble ahead—

Keith Vaz: He will be very hungry.

Damian Green: As the hon. Gentleman comments from a sedentary position, I strongly recommend that the Minister confines his dining out over the next few months to restaurants where there is a properly qualified chef.

On the wider question of access to the skills advisory board, some ethnic minority groups feel that they have no easy means of obtaining representation on it. A measure to address that would improve their confidence in the system, which is rather less than the Minister's. [Interruption.] Yes, I am aware that the Minister met them last week. I have spoken to them since that meeting with the Minister, and I can only repeat that he is more confident in his proposals than they are.

It is worth pausing on the role assigned to the skills advisory board, especially in relation to how much detailed planning and predicting it is expected to do. It will not just have a national responsibility to identify shortages, but will be expected to pick up shortages in each region. It will therefore be required to say how many extra workers are needed in each sector in each region of the country. That sounds perilously close to the kind of micro-management of the job market by Whitehall that has failed so badly in the past. I hope that Ministers are planning to avoid that, and we would welcome early publication of guidelines for the SAB so that we can consider in detail what it will be expected to achieve. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) made the point about the sudden drop in demand for IT specialists in 2000, which caught everyone in the labour-predicting industry by surprise. If something like that happened again, the SAB would need to be flexible enough to pick that up on a national and regional level. It is being set a high hurdle.

John Bercow: I am listening to my hon. Friend's speech with close interest. He is decently sceptical about the prospects of accuracy in the labour market projections of the skills advisory board. He is probably right to be so, but can I put it to him that it is precisely because of the uncertainties and the rapidity with which demand and supply can change that it is also wise to eschew fixed limits?

Damian Green: There are two separate issues. The point about the skills advisory board, which we welcome as one of the good things about the system, is not to overload it. It is perfectly possible, if it tries to be too prescriptive, that it will be overloaded in an attempt to micro-manage the economy. That is a much bigger problem.

Another big area of concern is the policing of the system. Both universities and businesses seem to be responsible not just for their current students or employees, but for those who have left. We should be clear that universities and businesses do have responsibilities when they bring people into this country, but it is important that what they are being asked to do is practical. Many of them, especially small businesses, will not have the capacity to act as a police force for their ex-employees, and if the Government expect them to do so, another element of potential chaos will be introduced in the system.

In addition, how is the public sector to be policed? With the NHS being the biggest importer of migrant labour, who will be responsible for the inevitable offences? Will it be individual NHS trusts? If they are culpable, how will they be punished? There will be something perverse about a trust in deficit, as many of them are, perhaps laying off medical staff, as many of them are, having to pay a fine to another part of government because some of its trainee nurses have gone walkabout halfway through their scheme.

Justine Greening: On that matter, will my hon. Friend ask the Minister whether the new system will take account of skill shortages in countries from which we are getting migrant workers, and whether that should be taken into account in the points-based system?

Damian Green: It certainly should be taken into account. The Minister did not mention it, and perhaps other Members will do so later. Clearly, the brain drain from poorer countries to keep our public services going is a huge issue, which we need to address. It is not a simple issue, as many people involved in international development have argued to me that, for example, the remittances going back to such countries are one of the best forms of aid, because they go into the hands of individuals rather than Governments and therefore get spent properly in the local economy. It is not an open-and-shut case, but I agree that the issue is worth considering.

My final detailed point is about the practical implementation of the scheme and its reliance on technology. In that regard, it is worth reading out in full paragraph 162 of the Command Paper, in which the Government solemnly say:

> "We do not underestimate the significance of the IT requirement that will be needed to support the new system and we will only roll out any part of the system when it has undergone rigorous testing."

We will remember those words in the years to come. We can only hope that this will not be another of the expensive technological disasters that have overcome the Home Office and, to be fair, many other Departments in recent years. From the people who brought us the Criminal Records Bureau, Child Support Agency and tax credit systems, among many others, here is another hugely important policy dependent on a new computer system. It is the ultimate triumph of hope over experience.

Justine Greening: Is my hon. Friend as concerned as I am that parallel systems might be running, which could cause even more confusion than introducing a new system on its own?

Damian Green: I am almost certain that there will be parallel systems, that there will be no communication between those running the systems, and that there will be technological disasters. I know nothing of the details of the technology that the Home Office is organising; I simply observe that the Home Office's record, like the record of most of Whitehall in this regard, is so lamentable that it beggars belief that the system will work efficiently. I think that everyone who will be caught up in the early years of its operation should be very afraid.

There are two causes for concern behind our support for the principles of the system. The first is that, even tonight, the Government are still refusing to say what the effects will be on the numbers coming to this country and the numbers staying in this country. The second is that any good intentions will be lost among the practical difficulties. Any dispassionate observer can have no confidence that the new system will be introduced competently, efficiently and on time. Despite my pessimism, however, I hope that it is.

We wish the measure well. This country needs a civilised and controlled immigration system, and I hope that the Government will provide one during their remaining years in office. If they do not, the next Government will have to take on that vital task.

8 pm

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I welcome the debate, and a great deal of what is in the White Paper. That is not always the case when I see what the Home Office proposes. We do need clarity in the system: people must be able to understand the rules, because that is good for both employers and applicants. There is no doubt that the present system is far too complex and bureaucratic. Many of us will know of people who have been given work permits and then been refused entry clearance, although it must have been blatantly obvious that some of them would be refused entry clearance before they were given work permits.

A huge amount of detail remains to be filled in. The White Paper is really no more than an outline, although both the Minister and the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) referred to some of the detail. Neither this debate nor any other debate on the subject that I have heard has dealt adequately with the extent to which a managed migration system should relate purely to economic benefits for the United Kingdom, or—a key question, in my view—with how much attention will be paid to the rights of the people who come here to work. I do not want to see a Gastarbeiter system involving people coming here and working for quite lengthy periods with no rights. That would affect not just those people but the rest of the work force, in ways that I may describe later.

As for the application process, it is clearly advantageous for both applicant and employer to know what is required and to be able to carry out some self-assessment. In theory at least, that is simpler than the present arrangements. However, I should like the Minister to clarify a couple of points, one of which is about the position of sponsors in some of the tiers.

Obviously the reliability of a sponsor will matter. I do not object to the suggestion that an employer or educational institution should have a duty to report when someone has disappeared, or has not even taken up an offer. I note, however, that in some cases sponsors themselves will be given either an A or a B grade. I am far from clear about how that will work, especially early in the process, before there has been much experience of the scheme. What assumptions will be involved in deciding whether a sponsor will be given an A or a B? Will there be any arrangements for sponsors to contest their assessments? It could be argued that an A or a B grade could constitute a reflection on the sponsor's reputation. Certainly some sponsors who receive B grades may wish to contest them, for that simple reason.

As others have pointed out, the system of sponsorships and grading may tend to favour the large employer who continues to import large numbers of workers, rather than the small employer who may find it harder to enter the system. Another question that has been raised concerns the liability of an employer at the end of a contract of employment. I feel that it would be unreasonable to expect a small employer, in particular, to bear any liability once the contract had ended. At the same time, there seems to be no scope for people who may have worked here for two or three years to have a holiday, or to wind up their affairs before they leave.

Obvious questions have been raised about how the higher tiers will cope with people who may be highly skilled, but who may not have academic qualifications or earn large salaries. I have another concern about tier 1, however. It does not require a job offer or a sponsor; it allows someone to come in purely on the basis of qualifications and earnings—in some instances, perhaps, on the basis of qualifications alone. We must ensure that we do not strip other countries of skilled people whom they cannot afford to lose. We have had discussions of this kind in the past about the health service, but it is not only in the health service that such problems arise.

What causes me most concern is tier 3, which will probably cover most low-skilled migrants. We know that some sectors, such as agriculture and hospitality, are highly dependent on unskilled labour from outside the United Kingdom. Tier 3 involves a maximum of 12 months, no rights of entry for dependants and no right to switch to another employment route. The White Paper says that that tier will be run by "operators". I should be interested to hear from the Minister who he thinks those operators will be.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): One of the largest employers in my constituency is the racing industry. Members may be surprised to learn that the Lambourn valley is every bit as multicultural as the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Justine Greening). Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that it is the job of industry, including the racing industry, to make the right representations to those in tier 3—or indeed any tier? Is that not the best way of ensuring that migrant workers want to enter such industries, and that the system works smoothly?

Mr. Gerrard: I entirely agree. The Minister has made it clear that he is willing to talk to the various industrial interests, which will have to make their case if they believe that they have one. The skills advisory boards in particular should be consulted, because they will have a key role in identifying skills shortages.

The point that I was trying to make, however, related to lower-skilled migrants. If we go down the road of effectively shutting out people who are not from other EU countries, what will the possible consequences be? The danger is that that could inadvertently result in more unauthorised people trying to work illegally. Such an approach rests to some degree on an assumption that unskilled work is not really essential work, that it does not matter that much and it does not matter who does it. However, London has a huge number of unskilled people who have come from other countries to do such work. If they were not here, whole sections of London's economy would virtually collapse.

Reference has been made to the effects on indigenous workers, and to the fear that the presence of migrant workers holds down pay and conditions. In this regard, employment rights for migrant workers are very important. Some of the exploitation of migrant workers that undoubtedly goes on is clearly related to their inability to enforce their employment rights. There could be a number of reasons for such an inability. In some cases, the explanation is simply a lack of knowledge of those rights. We should perhaps ensure that those who work in the tier 3 schemes get information on their employment rights in their own language, so that they can understand them and know what they can do to enforce them. If one examined the evidence, it would doubtless become clear that some migrant workers are being discriminated against on the basis of their immigration status. Migrant workers who are sacked by their employer do not simply lose their jobs, they also lose the right to be in this country. That, in itself, can make it much more difficult for such people to enforce the employment rights that they should be able to enforce.

John Bercow: I am intervening to make a slightly different point. The Government want to maintain a strict distinction between labour migration and asylum seekers, and I understand the reasoning, although I am not comfortable with it. I put it to the hon. Gentleman that frankly, it is a tragedy that the thousands of asylum seekers in this country who are qualified doctors, scientists, engineers and dentists—who are perfectly entitled to be here while they seek asylum—are denied the chance to use their skills, earn a living and benefit Britain. Would it not be good if we extended the very limited right to work that currently applies to asylum seekers?

Mr. Gerrard: Of course, at the moment there is no such right to work; there used to be the right to work after six months, but that disappeared. I have always been of the view that we were far too restrictive in our approach. The argument is that such a right would act as a pull, but I have never seen hard evidence to support it.

One issue that we really must address, but which we shy away from, is the position of those in this country who are working illegally. There is no doubt that in a big city such as London, there are a significant number of such people. We have always approached this issue purely in terms of penalties for employers, which have been difficult to enforce. In the past two or three years we have looked at several different schemes for regularising the immigration status of people who have been in this country for some time, the latest example being the family concession in respect of asylum seekers. One idea that we have never seriously considered, but which we should, is regularising the status of some of those who have worked here illegally for some time. Plenty of other European countries—Belgium, France, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal and Spain—have done that in the past seven or eight years, as has the USA. If we go down that road, we can get to grips with some of the exploitation that takes place. That would benefit people who come here legally as migrant workers, but it would also benefit the work force in general.

I turn finally to the subject of appeals. The lack of a right of appeal is a problem. We have administrative reviews now, and very occasionally an entry clearance case gets turned over on administrative review. The idea of getting rid of appeal rights and ending up with purely administrative reviews always worries me. One inevitable consequence will be more work for me, and for any other Member whose constituency contains a significant number of migrants. Even if the person concerned is not in the country, relatives and potential employers will turn up and ask for help. I would much rather we had a clear system through which such decisions could be challenged.

As I said at the beginning, I welcome the paper, which shows that we are making serious moves toward a system that makes sense, is clear and transparent and can work. There is a lot of detail to be filled in, however, and I hope that the Minister will deal with that issue. In particular, I hope that he will examine the lack of employment rights, which is a big gap in our approach to this problem.

8.16 pm

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): It is a pleasure to make my first Front-Bench contribution on home affairs in this debate. It is particularly pleasing to welcome the Government's apparent decision to take up Liberal Democrat policy on economic migration, which, I was surprised to learn tonight, is also the Conservatives' policy. My party officially called several years ago for the introduction of a points-based system to determine policy on migrant workers. We believed then, as we do now, that such a scheme would promote a culture of openness on issues relating to immigrant workers and respond to the country's long-term economic needs.

Before I set out why my party welcomes the broad principles underpinning the Government's new economic migration policy, I want to make two points. First, my party recognises the major contribution that generations of migrant workers and refugees have made, and continue to make, to invigorating our economy, our society and our culture. That is the starting point for our approach to immigration issues, and it is one that can easily be lost. On economic migration, every objective analysis shows conclusively that immigrants have been net contributors to our overall economy, and that their contribution is set to increase in future, as dictated by demographic trends. Our economy simply cannot afford to do without them, and it was pleasing to read that this sentiment was borne out by the consultation undertaken in advance of the Command Paper.

Secondly, I welcome the opportunity to debate this issue tonight. Often, more heat than light is generated on this issue, so I hope that tonight's discussion can involve at least some measure of consensus, as well as sober debate. It provides us with an opportunity to re-state the case for well-managed immigration, and the benefits that it brings to Britain. A points-based system is not a recipe for unlimited immigration, as some Members seem to believe; it is a policy for well-managed immigration. That is precisely why we Liberal Democrats have called for it for so long, and in my view it is what the country wants, too.

I turn now to why I believe that the proposals are broadly to be welcomed. They recognise the long-term challenges and trends that our country faces. They also recognise that, given an ageing population and the globalised economy, our country needs a migration policy that is flexible, relatively simple and able to adapt to changing needs and pressures.

In particular, a move towards simplifying what is currently a fiendishly complex system of immigration is long overdue. The complexity of current arrangements is one of the key factors that have contributed to a general lack of confidence in the system. As we all know, it is that lack of confidence that elements in our society will use to exploit fears and stoke up hatred in our communities.

When it comes to flexibility, it is clear that work permits in their present form are inadequate, especially for meeting the needs of our 21st century economy. An emphasis on plugging skills gaps in the work force and a systematic, strategic approach are self-evidently the right way to proceed to achieve our shared aim of maintaining a competitive economy.

I also welcome the Government's acknowledgement of the diverse needs of our regions. Clearly, a rigid, whole-country approach would be undesirable. As our city regions continue to take shape, we cannot ignore the fact that their economies develop in different ways and in varying sectors. I hope that the regions will have a genuinely strong voice in discussions and decisions about the assessments made in respect of economic migration.

In addition, I welcome the overall transparency of the new system. Coupled with simplicity, that transparency provides the key to public confidence. I hope that the new arrangements will give the Government a much better handle on information and statistics related to economic migration. Furthermore, I hope that the information that the policy provides will be used wisely by all concerned.

I have set out why I and my colleagues welcome the proposals, but now I want to turn to our reservations. The prospect of the large-scale administrative and IT reorganisation of a major part of the Home Office fills me with some dread, as do the potential costs. On pretty much the full range of issues—identity cards, criminal records checks and asylum—there has been a catalogue of disasters in terms of costings, leadership and management. For these proposals to go the same way would be unfortunate, to say the least. We would find ourselves dealing with a system designed to inspire public confidence that was doing precisely the opposite. It would do a great disservice to the good intentions behind these proposals if, as has happened in the past, policy were to be dictated by tabloid headlines.

The main issue to emerge from this policy is that, in part at least, it spells the end of low-skilled economic immigration from non-EU countries. Although I can accept the Government's premise that Britain and the EU together can meet their own labour needs for the most part, there are some obvious dangers, too.

There is a real risk that the proposals could lead to even greater exploitation of low-skilled workers, and not just by the small minority of unscrupulous employers who will use and abuse illegal labour. It could also expand the market for people traffickers, snakehead gangs and other criminal organisations. We know that this area of the labour market is notoriously grey already, but I see nothing in the Government's proposals tonight that sets out how they intend to deal with that problem.

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman makes an entirely fair point, but it is not for the Command Paper to include those policies. There are extensive policies, in the UK and across the EU, on human trafficking and other matters, but they are not matters for the Command Paper. I can certainly provide them, but he can search for those policies in the Command Paper as much as he likes and not find them, as they do not belong there.

Mark Hunter: I am grateful to the Minister for that intervention. If he is prepared to send me that background detail, I should very much like to take him up on his generous offer.

Much of the debate on this issue has been taken up by the specific example of catering workers, some of whom may not fulfil the criteria at any tier of the proposed arrangements. That area of the labour market is just one of many that is likely to be affected, and I hope the new system will have the flexibility and creativity needed to ensure that those sectors of our economy that rely on low-skilled labour are not unduly penalised by the policy.

Although the plans are clear about Britain's needs, as they should be, will the Minister explain what account will be taken of the needs of other countries? Our responsibilities go beyond merely protecting our own economy, and we should not be in the business of draining talent and skills from countries that can least afford to lose them.

We are often told about the ethical dimension to Britain's foreign policy, so I should be grateful for similar assurances that our economic migration policy will have a much firmer ethical foundation.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): One matter follows exactly from the point that my hon. Friend is making, and it concerns those parts of Britain with significant communities of recent immigrants. Members of families already here could come to this country at no cost to the state, as their relatives could house them, and they could then join the work force and exercise their skills. Given that the aim is to build society, community and family, I hope that special attention is given to joining up those families who are willing and able to contribute to the economy. We should not look in different places for people with no previous roots in this country.

Mark Hunter: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point, and I am sure that the Minister will want to respond to it later.

My party's other concerns include possible burdens on businesses and universities. Better partnership working is, of course, to be welcomed and, in theory, the proposals on sponsorship have considerable merit. However, bureaucracy has a tendency to expand as time goes on, and I hope that the system is as user friendly in practice as has been promised.

I notice from the guidance that the Home Secretary can ignore the skills advisory board's views, but I hope that the Minister will confirm that that is not intended to be standard practice. In addition, as flexibility will be a key issue for the SAB, it would be useful if the Minister gave us some indication about the regularity with which the board will report. With seasonal and agricultural labour in particular, any delay on the part of the SAB or the Government could result in worker shortages.

John Bercow: The hon. Gentleman is concerned that the Government should heed the views of the SAB. In most instances, and on the assumption of its competence, I share that view, but does he agree that it is not imperative that the Government always go along with the views of a body that is simply there to advise? However, if Ministers were to decide to go in a different direction, does the hon. Gentleman also agree that they would owe the House an explanation of their reasoning?

Mark Hunter: I very much agree with that, and I guess that the Minister will want to return to the point later on.

Although I praise the Government's efforts to make the system simpler, and believe that they have largely succeeded in that respect, the process of economic migration into Britain will remain fairly complex. Indeed, the Command Paper praises the fact that the new arrangements will be what it specifically calls "sophisticated". That is why a detailed assessment of the pilot scheme will be necessary, and why lessons must be learned. There will be many links in the overall chain making up this policy and a weakness at any one of them could undermine the system as a whole. Any such problems will need to be ironed out during the phasing process. Anyone who has dealt with the points system for local authority housing—and I guess that that includes many hon. Members present for this debate—will know that it is not necessarily a panacea, and that it certainly does not always produce the right or logical result.

I believe that the Government are on the right track with the proposals. If they can implement the system efficiently and effectively in the way outlined in the Command Paper and if they can follow up the policy with effective action on illegal entry into Britain, they will have gone a long way to restoring confidence in the system of economic migration. Those are big ifs and the pilot scheme will need detailed scrutiny over the coming months and years if we are to restore confidence in the system.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I welcome the measured tone of the previous speech. It is clear from both the speeches of the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen that they do not have an alternative policy, and that is probably quite a good thing. The more measured a debate we can have about immigration policy issues, the better it will be both for getting the policy right and for the general tone of public debate and community relations.

I greatly welcome reform, but I have some reservations about the proposed system. I do not disagree that what we have at the moment needs to change. I do not think that anyone would disagree with that. It makes sense to rationalise the 80 streams of immigration into something simpler, more transparent and more straightforward, with a clearer sense of people's entitlements. It makes sense to do so with extensive consultation and I welcome the consultation that the Government have undertaken. However, I have some questions on the practicalities of the scheme and on the principle, as well.

I am glad that the Minister recognised the challenge ahead of him in translating the system into something fair and practicable. When I asked him which of the skill tiers chefs in south Asian restaurants would fall into he gave the honest and clear answer that they could fall into both, depending on their skill level and, I dare say, demand, remuneration and all the other factors that will have to be judged. Given that one of those tiers carries with it the right of settlement after five years and the other does not, there will be some powerful and natural human pressures, as well as all the tensions, and some risk of abuse in the system, which will have to be addressed before the system can be introduced.

I commend greatly the Minister's commitment to have further discussions with the associations that represent south Asian restaurateurs to put in place a system of sponsorship that enables responsible employers with a record of compliance with immigration and work regulations to employ the workers they need. A lot of care will have to be given to that if we are to have a system in which people have confidence, as well as one that meets the human and economic needs that are in play. I underline the point that has already been made that care will have to be given to ensure that small employers are not disadvantaged, either by their lack of understanding of the system or their inability to deal with the bureaucracy. As Members on both sides of the Chamber are always saying, it is the small employers who generate the jobs in this country. They are the ones who will have to operate the system if it is truly to succeed.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), said that there was a key economic test—a test of the economic contribution that workers could make to this country. When we talk about skills shortages in that respect, we sometimes need to think a bit more carefully about the language that we are using. I am not sure that there is a skills shortage; there is a shortage of labour, in different skills categories, ready to work at the going wage rate in that category.

In those terms, it is perfectly plausible that, at some point in the future, there will be labour shortages in lower skilled categories that may be as great—if not greater—as those in some higher skilled categories. That is why, when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made his statement, I asked him whether different groups would be dealt with on a fair basis in that respect. The answer that we should address skills shortages or labour shortages in different skill categories by training applies equally to all the categories—the higher ones as well as the lower ones. Equally, the argument that we might want to meet needs through immigration can apply to the less skilled categories as well as to the more skilled categories. There are some powerful humanitarian arguments as to why that should be the case.

I wonder whether Ministers share my unease about proposing to bring in a system that is institutionalised discrimination against the least skilled and the poorest. I share some of the concerns voiced by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) about what that might mean for the employment rights of those who are working here in the least skilled categories. When someone's right to remain in the country depends on their employer, they are in a vulnerable situation. If a system such as this is to be introduced, it is important that careful attention is paid to the rights and terms and conditions of the workers who are being employed.

I also worry about the extent to which a system such as that proposed will limit the opportunities for significant groups of people to come here from many Commonwealth countries, with which Britain has historical, cultural and family ties. If there were a demonstrable labour shortage in a relatively low skilled area and even those arriving from central and eastern European states were not filling the vacancies, I wonder whether it would not be fairer if some unskilled workers were allowed in without having their rights curtailed to a year's residence.

Another question is what happens to someone who enters under the third tier—relatively unskilled—and, during their time here, demonstrates that they can benefit their employer just as much as someone in a more highly skilled tier. Would they be able to earn a change in their status, which would carry with it the right of settlement? It is that sort of practical and very human question that will arise in the operation of the system.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have rightly praised the enormous contribution made to this country by previous generations of immigrants. We do well to remember that those previous waves of immigration included many people who came here as relatively unskilled workers, but who developed their skills and made a big economic contribution. Their families prospered, as did the society that was pleased to have them. It would be sad if we were to deny that possibility to some workers in the future.

I also worry about what the system will mean for poorer countries. If we take only their most skilled workers, and take none of their relatively unskilled workers, an imbalance will be created. There is a danger that we will take too many of the workers that those countries need and deny many poorer communities the stream of remittances that—as has been pointed out—is an important factor in the relief of poverty there.

We need to consider all the practicalities of the scheme very carefully. I hope that we might be able to consider, even now, the recruitment of relatively unskilled workers when there is a demonstrable need, so that their settlement rights are not curtailed. Both on human rights grounds and because of the risk of exploitation, there are weaknesses to a system that operates in that way. I hope that there will be further consultation on the system and careful reflection on the points that I have made, so that we end up with a fair and practical system that commands public support because its integrity is beyond reproach.

8.38 pm

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): We are asked to consider today a points-based system of managed migration. Most of the management gurus tell us that the important aspect of any management system is not the process, but the objectives towards which it is managed. That is also true of a points-based managed migration system. How it will work will depend above all on the objectives the Government use it to pursue. I wish to discuss, first, what the Government's objectives are, and secondly, what the objectives should be for any points-based managed migration system.

Happily, we know—not, admittedly, from the Minister's speech, but from other sources—what the objectives of the Government's migration policy are, because they were spelt out objectively by Home Office officials in a Government document that the House required them to produce. That document stated:

> "The government wants to encourage lawful migration to the country . . . sustaining and perhaps increasing current levels of lawful immigration."

So we know that the Government's objective is to encourage, sustain and increase lawful migration to the UK, presumably using the proposed system to achieve it.

The Government have certainly been successful in increasing immigration. The net inflow last year was about 223,000 people; more came to settle in the UK than left to return home or emigrate. The figure for net immigration was five times the number Labour inherited in 1997. We know how the Government have achieved that figure: by systematically liberalising the immigration rules. They have trebled the number of work permits granted and drawn to companies' attention the fact that they can bring people from abroad to fill vacancies. In the pamphlet I produced last year, "Too much of a good thing?", I list 10 other liberalising measures that the Government have introduced.

Above all, we know how the Government will operate a points-based system if they generalise it, because they have already introduced one such system. In 2002, they set up the highly skilled migrants programme, setting the number of points people needed to be able to come to this country and seek work. The Government set the points objectively, to establish the level of skill they thought desirable in anyone given the right to seek work in the UK.

Only a modest number of people applied under the scheme, however, so did the Government accept that that was the number who should be allowed to immigrate? No, they promptly reduced the number of points needed to acquire right of entry under the scheme to such a degree that the system was overwhelmed. We know that the Government will, if need be, manipulate a points-based system to achieve their objectives of encouraging, sustaining and possibly increasing immigration.

What should be the objectives of a points-based system? First, let us dispose of the notion that one objective should be to exclude economic immigrants because they are intrinsically undesirable. The caricature of economic migrants as welfare scroungers, driven by a desire to milk our benefit system, prone to criminality and a danger to society is not simply wrong; it is by and large the reverse of the truth. For most of my life, I have lived in areas where there was a large number of immigrants. I have known them as my neighbours, worked with them as my constituents and worshipped in the same Churches, and I have concluded, like anybody who knows the facts, that the vast majority of people who come to the UK to work are decent, hard-working and law-abiding.

Conservatives particularly admire two virtues that characterise economic migrants; they tend to be enterprising—they have to be to get to this country—and to be driven by family commitment and cohesion. We are biased in their favour. In the language of "1066 And All That", we think immigrants are "a Good Thing", but the implication, common to both sides of the debate, is that we need to manage migration and that we need to restrict it—that we can have too much of a good thing, and there should be limits.

Secondly, let me dispose of the notion that the reason for managing migration is that immigrants take British jobs. As my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) said earlier, that idea is based on the lump of labour fallacy. In any well-working market the number of jobs will sooner or later equal the number of people seeking work, who will price themselves into jobs and by obtaining them generate extra demand, exactly equal to the amount of demand that they have absorbed from the labour market. However, precisely the same fallacies lie behind the Government's claims that we need workers to fill shortages.

Whereas those who want to play the race card argue that there is a lump of labour—a fixed amount of work to do—and that, if we allow in immigrants, there will be too many of them and they will take some of that fixed amount of jobs and some of our people will be out of the work, the anti-racists, including the Government and my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham, say that there is a fixed amount of work, but that there are not enough people to do it and that we must therefore import them from abroad. That is the same fallacy, based on the same logical mistake that there is a lump of labour, that prices do not work and that extra workers do not create extra demand.

Indeed, the very idea of a shortage in a properly functioning market is problematic. The vice-chairman of the US Commission on Immigration Reform said:

"the very phrase ... 'labour shortage' provokes puzzlement or amazement among most informed analysts of ... labour markets."

His colleague added:

"Long term labour shortages do not happen naturally in market economies. That is not to say they don't exist. They are created when employers or Government agencies tamper with the natural functioning of the wage mechanism."

So shortages can occur only in unusual circumstances.

The idea that we suffer from a generalised labour shortage is denied by the evidence. The symptom of a shortage in any market economy is a rising price. If we had a labour shortage in this country, we would see wage inflation, but we have never had a period of lower wage inflation in our lives. The idea that we are suffering from a labour shortage is manifestly untrue.

The idea that importing labour fills established shortages has also been disproved by the facts. The Prime Minister began some years ago to say that there are 500,000 vacancies in the British economy and that we need to employ people from abroad to fill them. Some years later, we have imported more than 500,000 people; there are still 500,000 vacancies in the British economy. So that theory has not been proven, because all those who come to work in this country and get jobs generate as much demand for additional work to fulfil their consumption needs—the goods and services that they consume—as they fill any shortage that exists before they arrive. That is why that theory simply does not work in this or any other country: we do not end shortages by importing workers.

As for shortages in certain sectors, they can surely only persist if pay is not allowed to rise to the market-clearing level that will attract people to acquire those skills domestically. If pay is held down artificially in sectors by importing people from abroad who are willing to work at below the market-clearing level for this country, a temporary shortage can be rendered permanent. Of course, the pay will not rise to the level at which people in the domestic market will acquire those skills, so people must continue to be imported from abroad. That has clearly happened in a number of professions in this country, particularly in public sector health and medical services.

The Government's whole theory that there are endemic shortages that can be filled only from abroad is, by and large, wrong. We should avoid becoming permanently reliant on immigration to provide any skill that can and should be acquired by the resident population. We should allow the market to work, with pay rates rising to levels that attract people from the resident population to acquire those desired skills. Even if we import people to meet short-term difficulties, we should not allow that to be used as a reason to depress pay rates in that sector. That would allow the shortage to become permanent.

What the system should do is focus on giving work permits to people with skills that people in this country cannot acquire by the normal processes that are used to fill vacancies. There are such skills and, in the past, they have been the main reason for importing workers from abroad. The first such type of skill is company-specific skills. Companies have their own way of doing things and those that operate worldwide will often want to bring their accountant to this country to install their accounting system here, to train people to operate that system or to introduce their work-flow processes. For all the systems that IBM or Coca-Cola have, they will bring workers here to establish the systems. In due course, those workers will probably return home having transmitted the skills that are specific to that company to people in this country. That is fine and right; we ought to encourage that process. If anything, we should make it easier for international companies to transfer personnel from subsidiary to subsidiary across the world so that they can transfer the specific skills that have been developed internally within those companies.

The second type of skill that one cannot easily just acquire is entrepreneurship. I believe that entrepreneurs are born rather than made. If we can import more entrepreneurs who will generate high-quality jobs in this country for other people, that is excellent. Let us do that. It is another reason that we have traditionally given for granting work permits.

Another category is that of star performers—the people of outstanding skills at an international level. Many sectors of the City need a star performer in their analytical or sales teams. In medicine, one may need a star performer to develop a particular team and its expertise. We should bring in the star performers and, around them, they will generate teams and create jobs and wealth for those of us who star less in those professions.

Very rarely, there can be cases in which economies of scale mean that it is impossible to recruit domestically sufficient people with the particular skill for a post because we do not have the people with the basic aptitudes to fill such posts. An industry the size of the City probably could not meet all its needs from the domestic population, so it is perfectly reasonable to allow it to bring in additional people from abroad to build the huge wealth-generating capacity that the City has.

We therefore need to encourage some immigration. Some immigration is a good thing, but I use the analogy of oil and petrol. We need some oil in a car or it will not go at all. However, putting more and more oil in it does not make it go any faster. It is not like petrol. The Government seem to think that immigration is more like petrol than oil. They think that if they put the foot on the accelerator and encourage people to come, the economy will grow faster and faster.

We need some sensible targeted immigration through a managed points-based system. However, to respond to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), why do we need to worry about numbers? If immigrants are a good thing—in my view, they are; by and large, they are admirable people—why do we want to impose any restrictions at all? The answer is that we are one of the most densely populated countries in Europe. South-east England, including London, is more densely populated even than the Netherlands. It is absurd to suggest that there not enough people here to run a good economy. It is absurd to suggest that we need to—or even can—attract relatively large numbers of people. It is absurd to suggest that we ought to be a country of immigration. For most of our history we have been a country of net emigration, and it is only in recent years that we have become a country of net immigration.

Pete Wishart: What would the right hon. Gentleman say to countrymen of mine who face the fastest depopulation in the whole of western Europe? I accept that there might be overheating in the south-east of England, but we will have chronic problems unless we address our population issues and crisis.

Mr. Lilley: The idea that southern England needs to be encouraged to import masses of people because Scotland is unable to retain its own population would be wrong. In any case, I have good news for the hon. Gentleman: the flow from Scotland to the rest of the UK has ceased and reversed. The latest figures show that there is now a net flow back to Scotland from the rest of the United Kingdom, so he need not worry too much. Keep up the good work and make the country as attractive as the rest of the United Kingdom and it is all solved—[Interruption.] I speak as someone who is half-Scottish and wants to see that happen. I have to add that Scotland is intrinsically perhaps the most attractive part of the United Kingdom, but the political policies that have been pursued there in recent years have had the negative effects that the hon. Gentleman bravely pointed out.

It is sensible to have some limits on the number of people coming here. We know from the Government's forecasts that they expect the population of the United Kingdom over the next quarter of a century to increase—predominately in the south-east of England—by some 6 million or 7 million people, of whom 85 per cent. will be the result of expected net immigration into this country, even assuming, as the Government do, that the rate of such immigration diminishes sharply from the rate that we experienced last year. I hope that the Government will use their proposed policy to allow sensible forms of immigration, rather than as a cover for substantial continuing immigration that will cause the pressures on housing and land use and the creation of congestion that we in the south-east have seen, but the Government refuse to acknowledge, which lie behind the problems that I and most of my colleagues in neighbouring constituencies constantly face as we are urged to build more and more houses for more and more people.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I start with an apology—I have already apologised to the Minister—for not being able to be here at the end of the debate. However, bearing in mind that the Minister and the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green), the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, were on their feet for an hour and five minutes, I do not think that many issues will need to be clarified in the wind-ups. I congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) on his maiden Front-Bench speech. It was a model maiden speech that went on for only 13 minutes, and I hope he makes many contributions from the Front Bench of that length.

I pay tribute to the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality for the work that he has done to ensure that we have the beginnings of an appropriate system for immigration control. I was going to praise the scheme even more and embellish my praise, but the hon. Members for Ashford and for Cheadle both claimed ownership of it as Conservative and Liberal Democrat policy. Whoever's policy it is, it is right that we have taken the trouble to spend time examining the various schemes that operate in the policy area and reducing the number of schemes from 80 to five. However, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) and my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), I have reservations about aspects of the way in which the system will operate.

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality will know from his constituency experience the importance of getting our immigration policy right because it deals with not only the people mentioned by the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley)—those coming in—but those who are here: the settled community. It is absolutely vital that we deal with immigration policy sensibly and maturely, and having an Adjournment debate rather than a whipped vote on an aspect of policy makes it easier to do so. However, when we have had whipped votes on immigration policy in the past three or four years, the House has not divided.

I hope that the system that we are debating today will enable us to achieve clarity on the way in which applications are made. One concern that has always been with me since I started to do immigration work in my constituency is the complexity of the work permit scheme. Sometimes, a work permit is issued in Sheffield, but when the applicant is interviewed in Mumbai or New Delhi, the application is turned round. In such cases, the trouble and expense of obtaining the work permit is suddenly put to one side, which creates enormous difficulties for enterprises that rely on bringing people into the country in order to fill the skills gap.

[Keith Vaz]

In introducing a new policy, I am also concerned that we bring members of staff with us so far as the facilities at Sheffield and Lunar house are concerned. It is important in dealing with a new set of rules that those who will implement the policy are fully up to speed with what has been proposed and that they are also part of the mechanism by which we improve the system.

I hope that the Minister will tell us something about the results of the recent inquiry into the immigration and nationality directorate in his winding-up speech. I thought that the Minister was a bit harsh on the hon. Member for Putney (Justine Greening), because she raised issues about the way in which the IND operates, such as the length of time that it takes for hon. Members to obtain replies to questions. I, too, have received letters from the IND about cases that I have been dealing with for several years, and those problems have not been resolved. I know that the IND has a new director-general, Lin Homer, who has brought a fresh approach to the way in which it operates, but when one writes to constituents and tells them that their case will be dealt with in 13 weeks, it is important that they receive a response within that period.

Although the Minister has provided a written answer to the allegations made by Mr. Panmani about the problems that have occurred in the IND, we have not received a definitive response from him on the steps that he has taken. He identified the serious problems and set up the inquiry very quickly, and I congratulate him on doing so, but it is important that he makes it clear that those matters have been dealt with and that those responsible for some of the practices at the IND have been dealt with severely. Confidence in the system means confidence in those who are administering the system, which means those at Lunar house and other Home Office facilities.

We also need a more joined-up approach on the decision-making process. A lot of the information gathering will take place at the overseas posts, so we should not underestimate the importance of the entry clearance system. I know that the hon. Member for Ashford has referred to that point in passing, but it is important that we get the decisions right in the overall way in which we deal with immigration cases. We must realise that those applications will be considered here, but when we get the information from the overseas posts, it is vital that it is as accurate as possible.

I also share the legitimate concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow about the right of appeal.

At today's sitting of the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs, we took evidence from the president of the asylum and immigration tribunal, Sir Henry Hodge, and the lead judge of the administrative court, Mr. Justice Collins, who was worried and concerned about the tribunal's backlog. He said that it was 80,000 cases. He has opened all the cupboards at the tribunal's offices, and he found that there were more cases than he thought. We asked whether the abolition of the right of appeal under the Immigration, Nationality and Asylum Bill would help, as there will not be any rights of appeal on work permits and in student cases, but he said that it would not make any difference. Why abolish or prevent appeals, when it is possible to have a system that will allow someone other than the departments themselves to scrutinise decisions by officials? It is vital that we reconsider the issue and make sure that there is a right of appeal. In my view, that is the most important way in which we can guarantee that justice is done. The scheme has been set up, and its broad thrust is apparent. I accept that the Minister is not going to announce today that the right of appeal is to be retained or restored, but I hope that he accepts that abolishing it will not suddenly reduce the number of cases brought to tribunal, as the president of the immigration appeal tribunal says that it will not make any difference.

Finally, may I raise the subject of chefs, to which I have previously referred? I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for meeting colleagues and myself to discuss the issue. There are some fine restaurants in his constituency of Harrow, East, in Harrow and in Stanmore. It is an important industry for Britain—10,000 restaurants make 2 million curries every week—worth £2.5 billion. I am sure, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you and other hon. Members have a favourite Indian restaurant. It is probably run by Bangladeshis, but they are called Indian restaurants, so let us be fair to them all and call them south Asian restaurants. If the Minister goes to the Maurya restaurant on Stanmore broadway on Saturday and asks the owner about his chef, he will discover that he has come from abroad. If he goes to the Tales of India restaurant on Buckingham parade in Stanmore he will find that the chef has come from Sylhet. If he goes to the fine restaurants in Harrow, they will say that their chefs are brought to this country. They will all say that there is a shortage of specialist chefs now. The Minister says that the scheme, with its wonderful tiers, will solve the problem of shortages. He guarantees that no chef who has cooked in a five-star restaurant in Mumbai will be refused admission because he cannot get into tier 2. That is a significant challenge. I guarantee that many chefs in five-star hotels on the sub-continent will want to come to work in our country.

Mr. Lilley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Keith Vaz: I will do so if the right hon. Gentleman's intervention is about chefs.

Mr. Lilley: As a crass economist, may I ask why there is a shortage of chefs? Could it be that their pay is not enough to attract people from the community in this country to do the job? The rate is held down by the constant flow from abroad.

Keith Vaz: No, that is not the reason. The right hon. Gentleman can go and visit his fine Indian restaurant in St. Albans. I dined in the Royal Bengal with his next-door neighbour, the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning), only last Thursday, when we talked about the chefs who come to Hertfordshire. They come there because those restaurants advertise in jobcentres and in the ethnic press. They advertise to find somebody who is able to take up that employment at the price that is right for the industry. They get no responses because nobody wants to work in those restaurants, not because of the price, but because they do not have the skills.

The problem is partly cultural. The Home Secretary said that his special adviser on these matters was Mrs. Delia Smith. I picked up the last Delia Smith cookbook, but I saw no curries in it. The Home Secretary and the Minister think the answer is to set up training schools for chefs. The younger generation do not want to become chefs. They want to find other careers. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. He can come with me and I will show him restaurants. The younger generation do not want careers in that industry. It is not a question of money. That is why restaurant owners have to look abroad.

Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): The point that my hon. Friend is making about chefs applies equally to halal butchers of the most expert, religiously trained and skilful kind.

Keith Vaz: Absolutely, and my hon. Friend will not find many of those in Hertfordshire. People have to be brought from abroad to fill such posts. That is what worries me.

I like the Minister. I have known him for many years and I know that he cares deeply about the ethnic minority community. He is assiduous in attending their functions, eating their meals and being part of the local community in Harrow, so he has first-hand experience of these matters. I put him to the test. He tells me that the new points-based system will deal with the 20,000 vacancies in the industry. He says that the people who do not qualify as chefs and who have no skills will qualify under one of the other tiers and will come from one of the new member states of the European Union.

We welcome the arrival of those from the new member states. They have made a huge contribution to our economy. Almost 330,000 have come to the UK and helped our economy greatly. They are doing jobs because they have the skills to do those jobs. Only a tiny minority of those who came from the new member states are on benefits. If they come in order to work in restaurants, they come on a temporary basis. That is not a career path for them, as it is for someone who comes from Sylhet, joins a Bangladeshi restaurant in Harrow and wishes to learn the skills and remain part of that industry. That is the difference between the short-term fix that the arrival of the new member state population will give us, and the long term.

My hon. Friend the Minister is right to say that when Germany, France and the other countries change their derogations and allow Polish and Czech workers to go to their countries and work on the same basis as we allow them to work in the UK, we will have the same shortage again and we will have to look abroad. I ask him to be very careful about this. The industry is important for us and we want to make sure that it remains successful, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East said. Please monitor the scheme and make sure that there is a long implementation so that if things go wrong, we can put them right. In the end, when we judge the new scheme, the proof will be in—to coin a phrase—the rasmallai.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): I preface my remarks by saying that whenever this House debates immigration, it is important that we use clear and precise language. We must also set our remarks in the proper context. I therefore want to make it perfectly clear that I am not merely tolerant of immigration into this country but positively in favour of it.

As other right hon. and hon. Members have said, immigration contributes not only to our economic life but, far more broadly, to our cultural, political and social life. Perhaps this debate has been far too narrowly focused on economics, although I fully understand that that is because it is primarily about a system for managing economic migration. Nevertheless, it is right to recognise the other effects that immigration has and to say very clearly that we should not regard immigrants who come to this country for economic purposes merely as a transitory work force who are here only to satisfy our economic needs—because they can do much more, and should be encouraged to do so. I am referring primarily to the tiers in the system that may lead to economic migrants remaining in this country in the long term, or permanently, and subsequently becoming fully fledged citizens of this country. That is an exceptionally worthwhile progression, and surely something from which we, as well as they, can benefit.

Whenever we debate immigration we should face up to the hard truths. Perhaps in this House above all, those of us who feel strongly on this subject should be able to say what we think. There should be no check on what we say based on a fear that we may have of being labelled in a certain way. Whatever the Minister may have said at the outset, there is very little dispute between Members on either side of the House about the fact that it is clearly true that not everybody who wishes to come to live and work in this country can be accommodated here.

The Government have therefore sensibly conceded that there must be a mechanism whereby we decide which of those aspirant immigrants can come here and which cannot. The points-based system has a great deal to commend it, as is clear from the fact that Members on both sides of the House have spoken in favour of the general principles that underpin it. In effect, it assesses potential immigrants on the basis of what they have to offer this country economically. It can also inform the way in which we engage with recent immigrants once they have gone through the process that the system defines and we know who can come here to work, who will stay for the long term and who for the shorter term, and in what way they will contribute economically to this country.

Once we have established the principle whereby we allow people to migrate economically into this country because they have something to contribute, which is perfectly sensible, we can easily apply it to everything else that immigrants do in this country. Immigrants contribute not only to our economic life but to our arts, drama and music, and, as the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) eloquently pointed out, to our culinary life. It is vital that we regard all those aspects in the round.

If we say to economic immigrants, "You are welcome in this country if you have something to contribute to our economy," we would also be right to say, "You have the obligation to contribute in other ways, too, if you stay in this country in the long term. You are obliged to participate in our life as a nation and comply with our laws." A crucial point, which the system recognises but the Minister did not mention specifically, is expecting people who come to participate in the life of the country to learn the language. It is right to include language ability in the assessment criteria. We, as a nation, should offer those who come to live here opportunities to learn our language so that they can participate fully. That must be our objective.

I would congratulate the Government if they took a profoundly sensible step, which would have a long-term impact on the way in which those who migrate to our country are assimilated, and help to welcome them as they should be welcomed. The Government should develop a system whereby those who become citizens of this country undergo a ceremony that formally recognises that. It is right to welcome those who become immigrants to this country properly. There should be formal recognition of those who commit to this country and become a citizen of it or an immigrant to it. They should be told that they are welcome and that we hope that they contribute not only to the economic life of our country but in many other ways.

Mr. McNulty: The elements that the hon. Gentleman properly describes are not in the document because it deals with the managed migration system. As I said to the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter), we have substantive policy documents on integration, nationality, settlement, citizenship rights, the right to life in the UK and tests of language requirements, all of which I am more than happy to send to the hon. Gentleman. He makes fair points, but they are not appropriate for inclusion in the document.

Jeremy Wright: I follow the Minister's argument, but there is more advantage in the proposals than simply the ability to manage a system of economic migration. They also constitute an opportunity to establish clearly from the outset that people who come to this country can make a contribution, but that there are also expectations of them. The system's ability to admit those who can make a contribution benefits not only the economy but many other aspects of life. I understand the Minister's points, but the debate could be allowed to go a little wider, and that is what I have tried to do in my contribution.

However, with the reservations that my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Damian Green) expressed about whether the detail of the system will work as it should, I want to make it clear that I support what lies behind the scheme, not only because it is a way of managing economic migration but because it is a factor in a more wide-ranging system, which we can use to ensure that immigration works for the benefit of those who already live here and those who, quite properly, wish to do so.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): It will not surprise hon. Members if I approach the matter from a slightly different perspective—from the north. In Scotland we have chronic demographic problems. As I said to the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), we have the fastest falling population in Europe. For the first time in a century our population will drop below the symbolic 5 million mark by 2017, and is expected to fall below 4.5 million by 2041. We are the only constituent part of the United Kingdom with population decline on such a scale. For example, in the same period—up to 2041—we expect a population increase of some 7 million, which is a rise of 12 per cent., in England.

In the past decade we have attracted only 4.7 per cent. of migrants, although our total population is 8.5 per cent. of the United Kingdom population. Our demographic problems have been described as the single biggest challenge that faces Scotland in the medium to long term. Those are not my words but those of Labour First Minister Jack McConnell. He does not get many things right, but that assertion was absolutely correct.

It is clear from those headline figures that something is not working. If any constituent part of the United Kingdom needs creative and imaginative solutions to address this decline, it is Scotland. It is also clear that Scotland's problems are so different from the basic challenges faced by the rest of the United Kingdom that they must have Scottish-based solutions.

The simple fact is that we need people to come to Scotland. For our population merely to stand still, we shall need between 8,000 and 10,000 people to come each year for the next decade. If we do not achieve that, there will be massive consequences for every sector of our community. There will be a huge impact on our general economy, and deterioration in our community infrastructure and public services. Scotland will simply lose its competitiveness compared with other small nations in Europe.

To see how other small nations deal with such pressures, we need only to look across the Irish sea to the Republic of Ireland, a country in charge of its own immigration policy. It faced massive problems in the first half of the last century, with high levels of emigration from its shores, but it is now attracting migrants on a large scale. In fact, it has had nearly five times as many migrants as Scotland over the past few years. It is now introducing a green card system that will allow it to tackle its population problems much more impressively than we can in Scotland.

I detect in the general UK-wide immigration policy an underlying attempt to keep people out and to discourage them from coming here—I am sure that the Minister will say that that is not the case, and I respect the fact that the points-based system is an attempt to address the problems—but that is entirely the opposite of what Scotland needs. We need people to come in, and we need policies to attract them.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Why does the hon. Gentleman think that Scotland is having so many problems attracting people to live north of the border?

Pete Wishart: We are having those difficulties because we do not have control of our immigration policies. We have an Executive who have made sure that Scottish economic performance is way below that of the rest of the United Kingdom and of similar-sized countries in the rest of Europe. That is why we are having difficulty in acquiring the skilled migrants that we need. We need our own distinct policies to attract people if we are to deal with these problems.

Will the new points-based system help Scotland to address those challenges? Scotland's particular difficulties are acknowledged by the fact that someone would have to have lived in Scotland for only two years before residency was granted. That is half the length of time required in the rest of the United Kingdom. There is a further concession, in that a skills shortage list will be drawn up to target the skills shortages there, especially in the oil and gas industries. That is all very well, and all very welcome, but is it enough to address the chronic underlying problems?

To answer that question, we need to understand how the scheme will be administered. We have heard that that will be done through the skills advisory board. A further concession to Scotland has been made in the proposal for one Scottish representative—from Futureskills Scotland, I believe—to sit on the SAB. However, that will just be one Scottish voice in a chorus of UK-wide voices. Regardless of how forceful and articulate that one Scottish voice might be, it will necessarily be subsumed into the chorus of voices representing UK-wide interests.

I asked the Minister in an intervention about the future of the fresh talent initiative. That was the Scottish Executive's response to our chronic demographic and population problems. Feeble though it was, it was all we had. It was a programme that was able to attract skilled migrant workers into Scotland. However, the Minister's response to my intervention suggested that the fresh talent initiative has now gone, leaving us with no competitive advantage over the rest of the United Kingdom. Scotland's population problems will therefore be further entrenched.

How will the residency system work itself out? We welcome the fact that it will take only two years to get residency in Scotland, but because we have no distinct or separate immigration service, what will happen after those two years? Will people naturally slip down to London or the south-east of England? How will we be able to retain those people in Scotland after that two-year period has been concluded?

Many commentators have mentioned that the new points-based system is similar to the scheme operating in Australia. In many ways it is almost identical, but with one crucial and significant difference: Australia has full devolution of immigration responsibilities to state level. States can manage their own immigration requirements and introduce policies and approaches that will help them address some of their problems. Many states, such as South Australia, Queensland and Tasmania, experience challenges similar to those faced by Scotland, but the Australian system allows those states the flexibility to control their immigration policy.

Australia has recognised the benefits of area-specific migration policy for the past 10 years, and has benefited significantly from being able to control immigration policy, determine priorities and give residency status to migrants way beyond what is required for the normal Australian model. If that can work in Australia with a system of state federal government, why can it not work in the UK with devolved government? Scotland has a Parliament in Edinburgh and distinct and different immigration requirements, so why cannot it have the proper powers to address those?

Of course, the most effective way of tackling our demographic problems would be to have the full powers of a normal small nation. We only need to look at Ireland as an example. With the introduction of its green card, it is building on successive decades of success in attracting migrants. We can only look at that jealously, and reflect on what could be achieved in Scotland were we able to do that.

Since the emergence of the Celtic tiger economy in the 1990s, Ireland has seen a huge turnaround in immigration. My reply to the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) is that Ireland has benefited from being in charge of its economic policy and being able to determine its own agenda in terms of economic policies and prosperity.

Damian Green: The hon. Gentleman is making an extremely interesting point about the contrast between Ireland and Scotland over the past 15 years or so. Will he reflect on the fact that the principal reason for that is that the Irish economy has moved in a steadily deregulated direction, while the Scottish economy, under a Lib-Lab Government, has moved in a steadily over-regulated one?

Pete Wishart: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those comments and observations; he is probably correct. I am glad that his party's shadow Chancellor acknowledged the success of Ireland on his visit there. Seeing companies such as Google and Bloomberg settling in Ireland as opposed to London is also very positive. It all suggests to me what could be achieved in Scotland if we had our hands on those powers. Being able to adopt that approach and that type of policy would make such a difference to the Scottish economy and the destiny of my nation.

Mr. Lilley: I believe that the Scottish Parliament has the power to reduce taxation. Does the hon. Gentleman's party support that as a way of attracting more people to Scotland?

Pete Wishart: If anything, that is a trick question, and I will resist the temptation of venturing an answer. Scottish parliamentary elections will take place next year, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will wait with great anticipation to see what the fiscal policy of the Scottish National party will be.

To conclude, Scotland's immigration requirements are so far out of kilter with those of the rest of the Untied Kingdom that we must have specifically Scottish solutions to deal with them. We have introduced the idea of a green card system, similar to the Irish model, and we need to adopt such imaginative creative approaches. If we do not, we will continue to see economic decline and deterioration in the quality of life in Scotland. I again urge the Minister to consider the Australian model, how it has devolved power to state level and whether it is suitable and appropriate for Scotland. Surely we need our hands on the tiller so that we can use such powers to make a real difference to what is described as the biggest challenge facing Scotland in the medium to long term.

Mr. McNulty: On the whole, my opening remarks about welcoming such a debate were well made, because it has been, on the whole, an interesting debate. Many extremely reflective and thoughtful contributions have been made on the substance, details and practicalities of the new system, without demurring from the overall shape and framework of the system. For that, I am enormously grateful.

I shall not spend undue time on each and every point that has been made, but I shall deal with the broad thrust of what Members have said. One theme was how lower-skilled workers fitted into the overall system. That was a moot point, particularly for my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). We need to consider wider issues, such as the need not to build in too much reliance on what may appear, at least at this stage, to be an unending stream of people from eastern Europe and the A8 countries making very positive contributions.

The key point must be that the system rises and falls with the needs of the economy. In an intervention on the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) described himself as a crass economist. Without, I think, being unduly offensive, I will give the right hon. Gentleman "crass", because I did not agree with his comments at all. I thought that his attempts to analyse a labour market were quite fourth-form. We have heard such views before. We have heard them put less eloquently by Sir Andrew Green and other characters, and we heard them put far less eruditely by the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green).

I am afraid that the position of Conservative Front Benchers is still deeply confused. I will give them this: if we deem May and June 2005 to be the immediate election and post-election period, while it appears that the leadership has reached October or November of that year in its Pauline conversion to things more civilised, I fear that the hon. Gentleman is stuck somewhere around the day before the election. Neither of those speeches was terribly good.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East—he has left, but he told me that he would have to—is entirely right. If our managed migration system is indeed driven by the questions "What are the needs of the economy?" and "What are the needs of the country?", it is obtuse to talk of limits, numbers and quotas to the extent that the hon. Member for Ashford did—or, worse, to talk in a "second gunman on the grassy knoll" conspiratorial way about the liberal elite simply wanting to get more and more migrants here, for what purpose I do not entirely understand.

I really thought—and most contributions acknowledged this—that in welcoming the points-based system we had reached a stage at which there could and should be mature reflection on the needs of the UK economy. I agree with the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) that the sum of what migrants have contributed to this country goes far beyond the economic dimension, entering social, cultural and other dimensions. However, the thrust of any managed and controlled migration system must be principally economic.

Damian Green: The Minister is adept at spraying around words such as "obtuse" and "uncivilised", which he has used in the last three minutes, but less adept at answering a simple question. Does he agree with the former Home Secretary that there is no obvious upper limit on legal immigration to this country?

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman may talk of my "spraying around" phrases, but if he is obtuse, he will be described as obtuse.

Damian Green: Answer the question.

Mr. McNulty: The answer to the question is simply put in the living, breathing elements of the points-based system. What is required by the country and the economy is the appropriate level of migration. It is facile and fatuous in the extreme to talk of upper limits, as happened during the general election. The hon. Gentleman would have it that the country needs a certain number of migrants for the next decade—x migrants—and that is it. Regardless of whether parts of the economy are starved of skills that particular migrants might have, the view of the Conservative party and the hon. Gentleman is that the future of the economy and the vibrancy of the country can go hang if we reach x + 1: one above the facile and fatuous quota that he would set for migration.

The hon. Gentleman's facile argument—it is not a conspiratorial one involving Back Benchers—is that the liberal elite want more and more migration. I repeat: the premise for any managed migration system must be the prevailing economic needs of the United Kingdom in the next five to 10 years that will not be met by the EU-wide labour market. That must be the only driver. However, the hon. Gentleman has some other intention and, once again, he deliberately conflates—he needs to stop doing so if he wants to remain on the Opposition Front Bench—race, community cohesion, asylum, immigration and a whole range of other matters. This is all that a quota is about, and he should be ashamed of himself.

Damian Green: If I had done anything like that, I would be ashamed of myself, but the person who should be ashamed of himself is the Minister. Nothing that I have said this evening could conceivably be construed as having anything to do with damaging race relations in this country. Both this evening and in every speech that I have made since taking this job, I have deliberately made it clear that the cross-over between asylum and immigration is often done improperly, and that they are two entirely separate areas. The Minister demeans his office by making this cheap insult.

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman is being deliberately obtuse. He has offered the view that the scheme lacks rationality without a quota. He has said, in terms, that it cannot constitute a way forward unless we say what the limit on immigration should be, and he condemned himself with that fatuous claim. It is as fatuous as his even more obtuse claim at the last election that an asylum limit or quota should somehow be established. How, in the context of the 1951 convention, that can possibly be done defies belief; so, subconsciously or otherwise, he is obtusely conflating all the issues that the Conservative party deliberately conflated at the last election. That is a matter of regret, because the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth did not do so and neither did the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden. I profoundly disagree with the right hon. Gentleman's economic analysis and, therefore, his conclusions, but he did not conflate such issues in the scurrilous way that the hon. Member for Ashford did.

Damian Green: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: No—I am bored. The hon. Gentleman is boring me now. He has nothing of substance to offer, which is a shame because most the contributions were thoughtful and reflective and raised very real concerns about low-skilled workers and, for example, the practicality of administrative reviews compared with appeals. Such issues are still being discussed.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) on making a thoughtful maiden Front-Bench contribution. I would have liked to congratulate the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart), but I shall not because he spoke absolute nonsense. The notion that, in a UK setting, Scotland's answer in respect of immigration is to have its hands on all the tillers is bunkum—unless the hon. Gentleman is going to explain, in his own paper on a points-based system, perhaps, that border guards will be stationed at Hadrian's wall to let people in and out of Scotland, and that there will be various other port controls.

Scotland is an integral part of the UK and its problems—I accept that they are very real; I have discussed them extensively with the Executive—will best be dealt with by the Scottish Executive and the UK Government sitting down together and working them through. Some matters are devolved and are therefore particular to the Executive, who have done a great deal of work to increase Scotland's attractiveness as an inward investment destination—very successfully—and as a destination for migrants. I congratulate them on that and as I said to the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire when he intervened, there are further measures we can take in respect of the points-based system, and we are talking to the Scottish Executive about them. But the notion that, once Scotland is independent and free at one leap of London's tyranny, all its very real demographic problems will be solved is absolute bunkum.

Pete Wishart: I am astonished at the Minister's response to a rather measured inquiry. Why cannot what happens in Australia, or between Northern Ireland and Ireland, happen in Scotland too? Those are examples of how the devolution of immigration can work to help the states involved significantly. I merely want the best solution for Scotland.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Australia is different.

Mr. McNulty: As my hon. Friend notes from a sedentary position behind me, Australia is entirely different—in scale, geography, history, and in terms of its economic needs and demands. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to lump together the Australian system and the points-based system proposed for this country. Essentially, and critically, the UK is not a federal system in quite the same way as are Australia's six states and one territory.

The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire draws parallels with Ireland, and conveniently suggests that Irish history began about 12 years ago. He prays in aid a small nation that, until recently, was the one European country with a population much smaller than it was 100 years ago, for all the obvious reasons. I am the son of an Irish economic migrant, and I glory in the success of the Irish economy, but the parallels that the hon. Gentleman draws are, at best, hysterical—I am sorry, I mean ahistorical, although they are probably hysterical as well. They are not appropriate in any way, shape or form, not least for reasons to do with regulation.

As I said earlier, I am enormously gratified by the overwhelmingly positive welcome that the Command Paper has received. We will go further by the summer, when we will lay out what we consider to be the next steps, in respect of both consultation and detail. We do not underestimate the nature of the task in any way.

Another piece of nonsense to emerge from the debate was the myth that the CRB is a basket case in IT terms. That is not true: the CRB is hugely successful, and works very well. As with passports, the problem was that not enough time was allowed for the introduction of new systems, which were introduced in a big-bang fashion. The things that have been said about the CRB and the passport regime are of no relevance now, even though they are constantly offered as shibboleths for explaining why Government IT systems fail.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East made a good point about the sophisticated requirements for training and resourcing entry clearing officers. The process is under way already, and the Government intend to set out how such elements, along with the new IT systems that are needed, will be implemented over the next 18 months or so. However, if some of the matters that have been alluded to mean that the process needs to take a little longer, so be it.

As I said, we do not underestimate the size of the task in any way. These reforms amount to the most significant change in our approach to migration in 30 or 40 years. They do not conform to the rather fatuous description given by the hon. Member for Ashford, who said that they proved that everything that the Government had done previously was wrong. They will radically transform our migration system, which has not been fit for purpose for as long as 40 years. Successive Governments have cumulatively bolted adaptations on to that system and, although I accept that that has happened since 1997, I assure the House that it went on for a long time before that.

We are now in a position to implement the managed migration system that this country, collectively, needs. We are ready to have a sane and rational debate about the substantive details of the new system, and about what immigration contributes to the country. The British public will thank us enormously for that.

[Mr. McNulty]

It is clear that most hon. Members are ready for the move, but it will be nice when the Conservative Front Bench catches up with everyone else.

Mr. Lilley: I hope that the Minister realises that this good and measured debate has been marred only by his poor opening and worse closure. Will he deal with some of the issues involved, rather than merely abusing people? Does he anticipate that the measures being introduced will reduce immigration levels? If so, roughly how large will that reduction be, in present circumstances?

Mr. McNulty: I shall ignore the right hon. Gentleman's preface to his question. In fact, I shall ignore his question too because, if he has not listened to the substance of the debate, it does not deserve a response. The future level of immigration in this country will be the level required by the UK economy to go about its business and grow and develop in the vibrant way in which it has over recent years. That is not ducking the question. The point made about 15,000 or 250,000 is nonsense.

Mr. Lilley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I would be grateful if you could confirm that my question was in order and it would be normal courtesy to answer it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): One thing that the Deputy Speaker does not have to do is get embroiled in the debate itself. Questions may be put and they may be answered in the way that hon. Members and Ministers decide.

Mr. McNulty: I was not challenging whether the question was in order in parliamentary terms. I was just explaining—I think quite rightly—that, in the context of all the contributions that I have made thus far and of this evening's debate, the question is redundant. The question goes to an understanding of immigration and what it means for this country—both the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden and the hon. Member for Ashford do not understand at all. Their colleagues do. Colleagues on the Liberal Democrat and Labour Benches do.

I fully accept that there are still points of detail and substance that we need to work through and I am not undermining those points in any way, shape or form. I repeat the points about low-skilled workers, the administration review, the loss of appeals and the nature of shortages. Poignant points were made about the skills advisory body and how that fits in. There were very germane points that went to the substance of the matter. I am sorry if the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden thinks that this is discourteous, but the point that he just made and the points made by the hon. Member for Ashford are fatuous. I would prefer the two of them to join the substantive, mature debate about migration sooner rather than later. I do not demur from the substance of the contribution made by the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden because he at least has the benefit of being consistent. The hon. Member for Ashford is a classic flip-flop artist whom we have come to know and love.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): Perhaps as an alternative to calling his opponents fatuous, the Minister might deploy the argument that there are sectors in our economy—for instance, in the NHS and social care—that already vitally depend on immigrant labour and would be in crisis if the Conservative party's policies had been implemented after the last general election.

Mr. McNulty: Had the hon. Gentleman bothered turning up to the debate, he might have made a contribution. I will take his comments, and his level of interest, in that context.

The document is substantive and important and I am grateful that we have had a chance to debate it. I commend not only the Command Paper, but the processes that we have yet to go through to turn it into a substantive document, to the House and urge all hon. Members, from whatever side, who have expressed an interest to maintain that interest over the next 18 months or two years while this system, which the country desperately needs, is put in place. I commend it to the House.

Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PETITION

Council Tax

9.53 pm

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): This petition explains my presence in the Chamber. I am presenting a petition on behalf of 290 residents of Cheltenham who fear that the present system of council tax is causing financial hardship to many, especially to pensioners and single householders on low, fixed incomes.

The petition states:

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons votes to replace Council Tax with a fair and equitable tax that, without recourse to any supplementary benefit, takes into account ability to pay from disposable income. Such tax to be based on a system that is free from any geographical or politically motivated discrimination, and that clearly identifies the fiscal and managerial responsibilities of all involved parties.

To lie upon the Table.

Post Office Closures (Ellesmere Port)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

9.54 pm

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I am sure that you have sat in that Chair through a number of debates about the Post Office, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I want to start the discussion of the closure of Ellesmere Crown post office by saying that I do not blame my hon. Friend the Minister for the state of the Post Office today. However, he must listen to the combined voices of all political parties in Ellesmere Port, who, together with the Communication Workers Union, the employees of the Crown post office, and the public, are all disgusted at the cavalier way in which Post Office management have not only ridden roughshod over the views of local people, but have failed in their duty to look after the public purse.

My hon. Friend will also be aware that at the Labour party north-west regional conference last week a resolution was passed that referred to this sorry debacle and called on the Government to institute a statutory review of the impact of full liberalisation from January 2006, to ensure that Postcomm meets its primary duty to defend the universal service.

The farce in Ellesmere Port goes back to the summer of 2004, when I returned from a couple of weeks away with my family to discover a pile of letters on my desk from constituents, complaining about the threatened closure of two branch offices, one in Station road and one in Whitby. The Station Road post office, in particular, serves some of the most disadvantaged people in my community.

I wrote in some detail to the chief executive of Post Office Ltd, Mr. David Mills, and after a series of public meetings and the gathering of information, a very detailed case was submitted. I shall refer to one of the letters in my bundle of documents to focus my hon. Friend's mind on the disingenuous language that the Post Office has used. In a letter dated 6 February this year, a Mr. Partington referred to previous commitments that I "alleged" had been provided to me. If I, as a Member of Parliament, on behalf of my constituents, say to a public servant that I have received some information, he should accept that I have done so. It is an insult to the House to use language like that.

The letter referred to information that I "alleged" that a previous employee of Post Office Ltd had given me about the future of the post offices. Mr. Partington then sought to disconnect what had happened around Christmas 2005 from more recent events by saying that the former had been part of the Post Office reinvention plan, but the latter were entirely different.

In 2004, the Post Office failed to get to grips with what happened at Station Road. It was a sad story of dishonesty. Loyal employees were working for an owner who had spent some time in jail. Those loyal employees had served the public well and treated their elderly customers as if they were relatives. They would knock on doors when elderly people did not come to collect their pensions. People of that calibre were dumped by the system. But, of course, that was under the Post Office reinvention scheme.

In the letters to me at that time, the Post Office, in describing what it now claims to be a different exercise, used the heading "Post Office area plan for Ellesmere Port & Neston". That could mean one of two things. It could mean the area plan for the borough of Ellesmere Port and Neston or for the parliamentary constituency. It cannot, under any use of the English language, be reinterpreted a year later to mean a post office covering two super output areas in the poorest parts of the community. It covered the whole community.

Mr. Dave Barrett announced the closure in a letter I received on Christmas eve 2004, when pensioners were trying to collect their benefit.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Andrew Miller: I accept that the closure of the post office notified on Christmas eve was due to unfortunate and unforeseen reasons; a robbery at the post office had brought forward the closure. However, Mr. Barrett wrote:

"Within the scope of the Network Reinvention programme, we have now completed our work in your constituency and no further closure proposals will be considered under this programme in your constituency."

If I were in the Minister's position I could be pedantic and say, "Ah, that was the Post Office reinvention plan", but I remind the House that the heading on the letter was unambiguous: "Post Office area plan for Ellesmere Port & Neston".

What were the motives behind that lack of clarity? Laziness, incompetence, deliberate action? I will let the House determine the answer. I only know that one of the most impoverished parts of my constituency was left without an essential service. Post Office management said, "They can go to the Crown office just up the road", referring to elderly and infirm people in an area with the lowest car ownership in the sub-region.

The letter of 23 December 2004 said that there would be no further closures, yet a year later the Post Office came back for another bite at the cherry and announced that the Crown office would be absorbed in an Asda store. The proposal was to halve the counter space and the resources for post office services in the town centre. I was told that the Post Office had identified financial losses at the Crown office, but that information was not shared with me.

I have no complaint about Asda, but I object to being insulted by the deviousness of Post Office management. I do not mind that personally, as in this place one gets used to being insulted by experts, but Members are entitled to expect at least some deference from a public body towards our constituents. No such thing has come from the Post Office.

My early-day motion 1446 states:

"That this House condemns the manner in which the Post Office has failed to engage in meaningful consultations with either staff or public about the closure of Ellesmere Port Crown Office; and calls upon the Government, as shareholders, to instruct the Post Office management to withdraw its current proposal, to share with stakeholders the financial facts and ensure that if it demonstrates a position that is commercially recoverable that time is allowed to enable a proper recovery programme to be instituted."

[Andrew Miller]

That is not an unreasonable request from a Member of Parliament, yet it was wholly ignored. The Post Office made no comment on it, apart from an indirect one to which I shall refer.

A letter of 6 February set out in four or five pages the logic behind the Post Office's decision to close. I was assured that there would be "longer opening hours ... a brand new, modern Post Office branch ... flat, level access ... automatic entrance doors ... a low-level writing desk ... car parking facilities nearby ... and ... a bright, modern, customer friendly retail environment within which to shop".

Interestingly, that letter referred to events that occurred just yesterday—the axe fell finally, the closure happened and the new system came into force.

All hon. Members have constituents who are prolific letter writers. I bet that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, could name a handful of people in your own constituency who are the most prolific letter writers, as could every other hon. Member. One such in my constituency is a gentleman called Mr. Ellams, who writes to me on all sorts of issues, and he would not be offended if I say that I find myself in disagreement with him on nine out of 10 of them. However, he pointed out something extremely useful yesterday, and the Minister ought to be aware of it, bearing in mind the commitments that the Post Office has given to me in writing, which the Minister has seen. Mr. Ellams says that some of the counters were closed and that queues were coming out of the door—at a post office that was supposed to provide a better service for my constituents. Frankly, that is what I expected, because I do not believe that the provision for either the transition into the Asda operation or the final scale of the Asda operation will be adequate to meet my constituents' needs.

One of the issues that I raised in the early-day motion and in the subsequent correspondence with the Post Office was the financial basis on which the decision was taken. At a public meeting—at which the Post Office was at least represented, to be fair to two very junior members of its staff—a member of the public asked a question, doubting, as I do, the veracity of the financial information that was presented to us. We were simply told that the Crown post office in Ellesmere Port was making a loss. That may be the case, but the point was that a financial year had not been completed since the closure of the two sub-post offices, so no stable pattern worth a light could be analysed. No sensible business financial planning is based on the kind of data that could have been drawn together in that time.

What made me particularly angry was that, when I eventually pressed the Post Office about the financial basis on which the information was taken, Julia Marwood wrote me a letter, dated 20 February, in which she said:

"Turning to the financial case behind our decision to change the way in which we manage Ellesmere Port Post Office branch, I fully appreciate it would give a clearer picture if we could simply publish the financial information and data relating to any individual branch."

I asked the Post Office not to publish that information, but to make it available to me, as a Member of Parliament. The letter continues:

"However we are not obliged, or indeed, at liberty to disclose this confidential information with any third party due to commercial confidentiality."

I have a little difficulty with that. I had understood that we taxpayers owned the Post Office. Of course, if some information is commercially sensitive, I would accept that. I deal with other companies with a similar structure. For example, I regularly deal with British Nuclear Fuels Ltd, which shares with me huge amounts of information. It provides it to me in confidence as a Member of Parliament with a local constituency interest. Why cannot the Post Office do exactly the same? Does it think that some smart Alec Member of Parliament might come up with a better idea because they have more knowledge of the locality that they represent than the people sitting miles away in their ivory towers in the Post Office branch change section as it is now called? It would not be unreasonable for the House to say to the Post Office, "In these circumstances, we expect you to share information with Members of Parliament."

The language gets even more confusing. In November 2005 when the Post Office decided that the Crown office was to close, it wrote a nice, lengthy and detailed letter to me. It says:

"As an organisation committed to delivering the best possible service"— tell that to my constituents—

"we want to do our best to meet our customers' requirements and maintain continued access to our branch network."

No wonder we are confused, because the Post Office is confused. It confuses branch with Crown offices, but that is its choice. The letter continues:

"Whilst the decision to change the management of the Ellesmere Port Post Office branch to Asda Store Ltd is not, in itself, subject to public consultation, we are keen to seek feedback".

In writing to me, the Post Office says that the matter is not subject to public consultation.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister treats his correspondence seriously. In a letter he wrote to me on 22 January this year, he says:

"No decisions will be taken on individual closures until after public consultation has been completed."

Again, there is an anomaly between the position adopted by the Post Office management in its discussions with Members of Parliament and what it is saying to my hon. Friend. I do not believe for a minute that he invented that sentence without believing that the Post Office should have consulted representatives in the constituency.

The Post Office can rescue the situation and the operation in my constituency can be made more profitable. However, given the decision on the Station Road branch affected one of the most disadvantaged wards in the country let alone my area, the fact that the Post Office is prepared to ride roughshod over people such as the folk in the Westminster ward in Ellesmere Port and to use disingenuous language in correspondence with a Member of Parliament and the fact that there has been no attempt to resolve the problem by a process of examination, negotiation and studies as to whether alternative solutions can be found, I despair for the future of the Post Office. I therefore hope that my hon. Friend and his colleagues will get hold of a few people very tightly and suggest to them that because the Post Office is a public entity—it should remain so—it should act with greater consideration towards the people whom Members of the House seek to represent. When ideas come forward about alternative ways forward, it should respond positively to them.

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) on securing the debate. He has been absolutely assiduous in voicing concerns about recent changes to the local provision of post office services in Ellesmere Port on behalf of his constituents. I can honestly say that over the course of the past four or five weeks, I have not had a single refreshment in the House of Commons Tea Room without my hon. Friend sitting beside me to discuss these matters. Indeed, I was almost at the point of being able to deliver his entire speech to the House myself without notes. However, in saying that, I do not wish in any way to undermine the excellent work that he has done to represent his constituents' interests to the Government.

My hon. Friend spelled out clearly and fully his views and concerns about the changes that are planned by Post Office Ltd in the coming months to post office services in the Ellesmere Port town centre. The future of the post office network is relevant to every Member of the House. We all share concerns about the future provision of postal services in our constituencies. We all also recognise, as I know that my hon. Friend does, that until 1999 and the advent of the action taken by the Government, there had been underinvestment in the business for decades. Most of all, we know that advances in technology, greater mobility and changes in constituents' shopping and financial habits have resulted in a growing proportion of people simply not using post offices in the way in which they did in the past. For many reasons, custom across the network has sharply reduced, which has created a spiral of decline in certain areas.

If the post office network is to survive and thrive in the longer term, it needs to change significantly. The Government want a post office network that can prosper on the basis of the needs of today and the future, not those of 20 or 30 years ago. However, in doing so, we also have to face up to present reality. The Government are providing £150 million a year to support the rural network and will continue to do so until 2008—I am delighted to say that state aid clearance came through from the European Union only a couple of weeks ago.

May I correct my hon. Friend on a point about the directly managed Crown offices? He implied that his correspondent from the Post Office had been mistaken in calling them branches. In fact, the correspondent was entirely correct because the proper name for them is directly managed branches, although we colloquially retain the name Crown offices.

The Crown offices and the deprived urban area network are also losing substantial amounts. Collectively, some 500 directly managed offices have been losing £70 million a year. Clearly the status quo is not sustainable in such circumstances. Several important steps to restructure and revitalise the Post Office have already been taken, but the future of the network rightly remains an issue of national debate. It is clear that there are still considerable challenges to be faced.

The starting point for the Government's policy for the post office network is the performance and innovation unit report "Modernising the Post Office Network". The Prime Minister commissioned that report in 1999, because it had become clear that, following decades of decline and underinvestment, dramatic action was necessary to get the business on track and to secure its long-term future. We set about introducing policies that would help to achieve that, which previous Governments had totally failed to do.

The PIU report showed very starkly that the post office network had not kept pace with the changing needs of its customers. Too many post offices had become dingy and shabby through lack of investment and were losing business. The report was widely welcomed as squaring up honestly to the challenges facing the network, and the Government accepted and implemented all 24 of its recommendations.

It is important to remember that the post office network has been contracting since the 1960s. Between 1979 and 1997, Conservative Governments presided over 3,500 closures, and in all that time they produced not a single policy on how to ensure that the network could continue to remain relevant into the 21st century. There have been reductions in post office usage for all sorts of reasons, and the absence of investment by the previous Government is significant, but above all changes in lifestyle and habits mean that a large proportion of our constituents do not use the Post Office as much as they used to and custom has sharply reduced. That is not a matter of the Government or some unseen market force acting against the interests of post offices and their customers; it is about ordinary people—our constituents—making personal choices.

Research commissioned by Postcomm, the regulator for postal services, has also noted that in other countries people are also increasingly accessing services electronically, over the telephone and through the internet. In response, most countries have been remodelling their networks, usually by closing the smallest or least profitable offices and converting directly run offices to agency offices. In Germany, for instance, the number of post office branches has been reduced by 17,000 offices, which is more than the entire UK network of 14,500 offices. In Britain, other networks, such as those of the retail banks have been scaled back too. Like them, the post office network needs to adapt to changes in people's preferences and new ways of doing business. Those external changes pose big challenges to the network of post offices, which must be addressed, not ducked.

We must recognise that 96 per cent. of the nation's post offices are run by sub-postmasters, who are private business people who have invested not only their own money into their businesses, but a great amount of care and effort to help the post office network achieve its highly regarded status. My hon. Friend has said that we, the taxpayer, own the Post Office. I must inform him that we, the taxpayer, own Post Office Ltd, but we do not own the 14,500 sub-post offices up and down the country, which are private businesses that enter into commercial contracts with the Post Office. The reason why it is not possible for the Post Office to make available commercially confidential figures about the viability of those offices is because it would prejudice the capacity of that private business person to sell their business in due course.

Andrew Miller: If the Minister had listened to me, he would have heard me talk about Station Road, which was a sub-post office that had suffered under mismanagement by the previous owner. This debate is about the closure of the Crown office, and only the Post Office has a commercial interest in its viability.

Barry Gardiner: My hon. Friend has referred to separate post offices today—he has referred to the Crown office, and he has also referred to the Station Road office. I am seeking to explain that there are conditions of commercial confidentiality, because the capacity of any sub-postmaster in Ellesmere Port to run their business viably and to be in a position to sell it on in future depends to some extent on commercial confidentiality between themselves and the Post Office.

Andrew Miller: Is my hon. Friend saying that Members of Parliament should not be entrusted in confidence with such information?

Barry Gardiner: Neither my hon. Friend nor I would expect to be made privy to information relating to the commercial viability of any private business in our constituency. We must therefore agree to part company on the matter.

Turning to the substance of my hon. Friend's argument, I have said that we must recognise that 96 per cent. of the nation's post offices are run by sub-postmasters. However, as there is declining profitability in the network as a whole, the viability of many individual offices has taken a severe knock. Decisive action in the form of the urban reinvention programme was taken to restructure a sector of the network where there was extensive over-provision with the aim of better matching supply to demand and of creating the viability necessary for a sustainable network for the future. That is why we backed Post Office Ltd's plans for managed restructuring of the urban network, which resulted in almost 2,500 office closures while ensuring that, nationally, 99.3 per cent. of people in urban areas, including Ellesmere Port, still live within a mile of their nearest post office.

We now need to address the issues facing the loss-making sectors of the network that are no longer financially sustainable in their present form. It is no longer clear that the needs of customers are best served by the traditional costly and inflexible network structure, so we must find innovative and more cost-effective ways of delivering post office services. My hon. Friend diligently monitors the issues in his constituency, as he has made very clear tonight. He took a keen interest in the urban reinvention programme, probing and challenging Post Office Ltd's area plan proposals for Ellesmere Port and Neston. Ultimately, as part of that programme, two of the 17 sub-post offices in the constituency closed. I accept that he had particular concerns about force majeure events, including the attempted burglary of the Station Road sub-post office, which led to its closure ahead of schedule just before Christmas 2004.

I should like to point out to my hon. Friend that the Station Road closure was, indeed, a voluntary closure under the urban reinvention programme. A former sub-postmaster volunteered for closure at the same time as he sold the premises. He was not the post office manager at the time—indeed, he had to secure a tenant, because he could not manage the premises—but the closure was voluntary, as is the case for every single one of the 2,500 closures under the urban reinvention scheme. There was therefore a voluntary closure of Station Road by a former sub-postmaster who was selling the premises. It was not something that was done by Post Office Ltd or by the Government to the people in the area around Station Road—the closure was volunteered by the former sub-postmaster.

More recently, my hon. Friend challenged Post Office Ltd's plans for changes in service provision in Ellesmere Port, setting out his concerns in an early-day motion tabled on 23 January. As he has explained, on 6 February 2006, Post Office Ltd confirmed its intention to merge the operations of the existing directly managed office in Marina walk and the existing Market Square branch in Asda into the new Asda Market Square store when rebuilding work is complete. In the interim, Asda will take over the management and operation of the Marina Walk office while the existing Asda Market Square office will close as the premises are to be demolished to enable redevelopment of the site.

Before addressing specific details raised by my hon. Friend, there are some key points of general principle that it would be helpful to clarify. First, although the urban reinvention programme achieved its aim of better aligning post office service capacity with current levels of demand in urban areas, it was never envisaged that that would preclude further changes to the urban network as the need or opportunity arose. Secondly, the plans for Ellesmere Port relate to the combined results of the impending demolition of the present Market Square office premises—

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Small and Medium-sized Enterprises

1. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When he next plans to meet representatives of the Welsh business community to discuss the impact of central Government regulation on small and medium-sized enterprises in Wales. [59246]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have regular meetings with representatives of the business community to discuss issues that concern them, most recently during our recent visits to north Wales. In addition, my right hon. Friend will be addressing the CBI North Wales annual dinner in May.

Mr. Bellingham: Will the Minister confirm that business investment and productivity are falling and that England and Wales have both fallen in the world competitiveness tables? Whatever else happens in his discussions with representatives of small and medium-sized enterprises, will he confirm to them that the Government will ensure that Britain keeps its individual opt-out from the working time directive? Will he confirm that to the House today?

Nick Ainger: The hon. Gentleman, who regularly asks that question at Wales questions, still does not accept that Wales is doing extremely well. Welsh private sector output grew for the 35th month in succession in February 2006, according to the Royal Bank of Scotland, and 4,800 businesses started up across Wales in the third quarter of 2005, a rise of 7 per cent. on the previous quarter. Wales is doing extremely well, and small businesses in Wales are doing extremely well.

Alcohol-related Crime

2. Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the incidence of alcohol-related crime in the past 12 months in north Wales. [59248]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): It is clear that the Government's approach to alcohol misuse and alcohol-related violence is working, and that police and local partners are getting their tactics right.

Mrs. Williams: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that the press speculation following the passing of the Licensing Act 2003 has proved incorrect? Indeed, the figures from North Wales police show a significant drop in alcohol-related crime. Is that the general pattern throughout Wales? Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating all the divisions of North Wales police on their hard work on the Home Office alcohol misuse initiative, which proves that such measures can pay dividends if we all work as equal partners to ensure that our communities benefit from them?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that a fantastic job has been done in north Wales by the North Wales police, and I join her in congratulating them. In fact, there has been an 11 per cent. fall in all violent crime in England and Wales during the recent alcohol misuse enforcement campaign. All those lurid allegations from the Conservatives, the Liberal Democrats and Plaid Cymru—who formed an unholy alliance on this issue—have proved totally groundless, as the Licensing Act has had a beneficial effect in our local communities.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): One of the lurid allegations that we were making was that alcohol-related crime would increase late at night. I spoke to a representative of North Wales police this morning and learned that, since the Act came in, there has already been a 4 per cent. increase in alcohol-related crime between midnight and 2 am, and a 2 per cent. increase between 2 am and 4 am. Things are not as rosy as the Secretary of State suggests, and what he has said does not add up with what North Wales police have told me. I wonder who is right. Will the Secretary of State also undertake to review the temporary event notices, under which licences can be granted for 10 events a year, simply by giving 48 hours notice to the police?

Mr. Hain: Obviously, I shall be happy to look at that question for the hon. Gentleman. However, I simply do not accept his selective use of statistics, either for north Wales or right across England and Wales, where the picture is very different from all the ritual expectations whipped up by his party, along with its alliance partners in the Assembly, the Conservatives.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): We all know that alcohol-related crime now costs this country more than £7.3 billion a year, and that more than 60 per cent. of male prisoners now have serious alcohol-related problems and need detox and rehabilitation programmes. With Swansea and Usk prisons in the top 10 most overcrowded prisons in England and Wales, how on earth can our Welsh prisons even start to deliver the treatments needed to reduce alcohol-related crime and dependency in Wales?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Lady is right to say that alcohol-related crime right across the United Kingdom, including Wales, has been very serious for a long time. It seems to be a particularly British phenomenon—and a Welsh phenomenon as well, for that matter—and we need to bear down on it. I would remind her, however, of what she said before the Licensing Act 2003 came into force. She spoke of "last-minute chaos", and said that the new law would

"cause increased drinking, damage, street violence and physical harm to even younger people."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 25 January 2005; Vol. 430, c. 9WH.]

None of those things has happened. The hon. Lady's sherry glass—or should I say "Cheryl glass"?—is always half empty rather than half full.

Young People

3. Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the Welsh Assembly Government on funding diversionary activities for young people. [59249]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have regular discussions with Assembly colleagues about matters affecting young people in Wales. The Welsh Assembly Government are investing in a variety of schemes, including the pilot scheme for half-price bus travel for 16 to 18-year-olds and the Cymorth programme, which is aimed at improving young people's life chances.

Mr. Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that the half-fare bus scheme for 16 to 18-year-olds, which is rolled out in Wrexham and Denbighshire, will make it easier for young people to access leisure activities? Will he ensure that he puts forward his view that it should be rolled out throughout Wales?

Nick Ainger: Yes, but before I respond directly to my hon. Friend I want to pass on my and, I am sure, the whole House's congratulations to Michaela Breeze, David Davies and David Phelps, all Welsh gold medal winners in the Commonwealth games. I am sure that their success will be an inspiration to all young people, particularly in Wales.

My hon. Friend is right that the proposal is to roll out the scheme throughout Wales. That is a Labour party manifesto pledge, and it will assist young people to get to leisure activities as well as to training and employment. I am sure that he will agree that activities such as the Digilab IT project, which focuses on young people who gather in Wrexham town centre on evenings and weekends, provide good quality diversionary activities for young people.

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): Given that calls to ChildLine made by teenagers contemplating suicide have been increasing at 14 per cent. a year, and that the suicide rate among 11 to 17-year-olds in Wales is five times that of England, may I encourage the Secretary of State and the Minister to talk to their colleagues in the Assembly about how they can support more effectively those services in Wales working with young people at risk, such as victims of bullying and sexual abuse? Currently, there are far too many gaps in provision for vulnerable young people.

Nick Ainger: I am more than happy to discuss that matter with Edwina Hart, as it would come under her portfolio as well as Jane Davidson's. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is not aware that young people's partnerships have been set up under every local authority in Wales. Those are made up of various bodies, including the voluntary sector, which impact on young people's lives and can come together to plan and address the issues that he rightly raises. By 2007–08, the Cymorth programme will have a £57 million budget to spend on those initiatives, and I am sure that it can address the issues that he highlights.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Does the Minister recognise that the provision of diversionary activities is made harder by the Welsh outdoor pursuits industry's increasing fear of litigation—much of which, as we both know, is vexatious and unfounded, but is a huge disincentive to providing adventure-based activities nevertheless? In that context, will the Minister act as a conduit for the industry's concerns by being prepared to convey any recommendations from Welsh outdoor pursuits providers on ways to address the litigation culture, perhaps through the Government's welcome Compensation Bill?

Nick Ainger: The hon. Gentleman referred to the Compensation Bill, currently being considered in the other place, which makes it clear that the social value of activities is a factor that a court can take into account when considering a claim for negligence. That would go some way to reassure those companies involved in outdoor activities. The Bill is only part of a programme that the Government are taking forward to tackle perceptions that can lead to a disproportionate fear of litigation and to risk-averse behaviour. As we all know, the hon. Gentleman is not risk averse—to his own personal cost—but I am sure that he will agree that the Government are addressing this issue. If he wants to direct any organisations to me with particular concerns, I will be more than happy to take up those issues.

Dentistry

4. Dr. Hywel Francis (Aberavon) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the Welsh Assembly Government on the implementation of the new dental contract in Wales. [59250]

8. Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with the Health Minister in the National Assembly for Wales about NHS dentistry in Wales. [59254]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I regularly meet the Assembly Health Minister to discuss dental services in Wales. A new dental contract is being introduced in April 2006 to improve both patient access and dentists' working lives.

Dr. Francis: My constituency is in the county borough of Neath-Port Talbot, where we have 10,300 new registered dental places as a result of eight pilot schemes established by the Welsh Assembly Government. I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the efforts that he put into achieving that, along with our local health board and the Welsh Health Minister.

May I urge the Minister to make representations to the Welsh Assembly Government to ensure that such pilot schemes become a permanent feature of NHS dental services in Wales, so that all communities in Wales—rural, urban or valley—benefit from a comprehensive dental health service in the future?

Nick Ainger: My hon. Friend is right to mention the number of additional NHS dental places in his constituency. As he knows, one company, Denticare, is opening a super-surgery that will provide 10,300 extra places. Moreover, the personal dental service contract will bring further places to the Neath-Port Talbot local health board, bringing the number of new places to some 11,900. An additional 2,100 places will come on-stream by 1 April throughout Wales.

Mr. Harper: I am afraid that the rosy picture painted by the Minister will not be recognised by my constituents. In the past few weeks, many of them have received letters from dental surgeries that they attend in Wales telling them that they are no longer welcome on the NHS. Will the new dental contract that will come into force on 1 April mark the end of NHS dentistry in Wales and in England?

Nick Ainger: Yes, it will. [Interruption.] As I said, there will be 200,000 new places in Wales alone. [Interruption.] Let me run through them. Dental Care is establishing practices in Newtown, Brecon, Lampeter, Port Talbot and Swansea. There will be an additional 26,000 NHS places. Integrated Dental Holdings plans new practices in Llanelli, Wrexham and Whitland, where there will be 24,000 extra places. Oasis Healthcare will open eight new surgeries across north Wales, with 80,000 NHS places. There will be new surgeries in Denbigh, Mold, Ewloe, Flint, Rhyl, Caernarvon and Colwyn Bay. That is good news. There will be a comprehensive NHS dental system throughout Wales.

Economy

5. Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the state of the Welsh economy. [59251]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The Welsh economy is strong and has shown considerable improvement in recent years. Indeed, the Bank of Scotland recently suggested that it would grow at an above-average rate in the first half of 2006, and was likely to experience even stronger growth than the United Kingdom average.

Jessica Morden: As my right hon. Friend will know, the success of the economy in Wales has led to a new confidence in the city of Newport. However, the steel industry still dominates the economy in my constituency and is currently struggling as a result of rising energy prices. What measures can be taken to alleviate the impact that that is having on Wales and on the part of the UK that is most dependent on the manufacturing industry?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that the Newport economy is booming. I know that manufacturing is booming as well: I recently visited EADS and International Rectifier in the Newport area. However, my hon. Friend is also right to say that Corus has suffered a big impact as a result of rising energy costs, which are a global phenomenon. We are working on that as a Government, especially with our European partners. I note that Corus announced huge profits today, and I welcome that. It is a hugely successful business.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): Despite what the Secretary of State said in his answer, I should like to know what message he has for the 100 constituents of mine who have lost their jobs at Dairygold in Felinfach. There is a possibility of 40 more job losses at Iger near Aberystwyth. Does he accept that job losses on that scale in a rural economy have a disproportionate effect on the immediate locality?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Before the Secretary of State replies, let me say to the House that it is grossly discourteous to colleagues who have questions to ask about Welsh affairs if their questions cannot be heard and it is difficult to hear the Minister's answer. It is also extremely disrespectful to the people of Wales as a whole.

Mr. Hain: May I point out to the hon. Gentleman that, yes, any job losses are serious, especially in a rural economy and area such as he describes, but unemployment has come down massively in his constituency under this Labour Government? There are 118,000 more people in work in Wales, business is doing better than anybody can remember and the economy in Wales is stronger than anybody can recall, including in his part of the world. Inevitably, there is a churn of jobs, but job opportunities will increasingly be found for everybody.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Production of photovoltaic cells at the Sharp manufacturing plant in Wrexham has tripled in the past two years. The production of such cells offers Britain a huge manufacturing opportunity, but the domestic market needs a bit of encouragement. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, later this afternoon, the Chancellor should look kindly on the photovoltaic sector and get as many householders throughout the UK as possible to have solar cells on their roofs?

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has told me not to reveal anything, so I certainly will not, but he is very supportive of renewable energy; indeed, he encouraged a £60 million renewable energy fund for Northern Ireland that I announced recently. The Sharp factory is a beacon for photovoltaic panels; indeed, I have them on my own roof in south Wales. Such developments are part of this Government's commitment to renewable energy.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): The workers in Wales will be very depressed by what the Secretary of State has just said. After nearly nine years of a Labour Government, Wales is still the poorest part of the United Kingdom. Some 28,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost since 1998, Welsh manufacturing dropped by 6 per cent. last year and Welsh industry is facing prohibitive energy prices. What is the Secretary of State actually doing about it?

Mr. Hain: I invite the hon. Lady to live in the real world of Wales, for once. Wales is booming under this Labour Government. There are more jobs, greater prosperity and better business growth than ever before and a stronger Welsh economy. She should stop talking Wales down and join the business sector and the rest of us in moving Wales forward.

Mrs. Gillan: It is not Wales that I am talking down; it is the Secretary of State and the Labour Government. Let us turn to Anglesey, which has the lowest gross value added of any region in the UK. If the Wylfa power station shuts down, 1,500 jobs and more than £42 million in wages and salaries will be lost in what is one of Wales's worst employment blackspots. The Springfield plant that provided Wylfa with fuel stopped production this month. Does that mean that the Secretary of State has failed in his discussions with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to extend the life of that power station, and how is he now going to avert a social and economic disaster in Anglesey?

Mr. Hain: I am working very closely with my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen), who does a brilliant job in his constituency, to see whether we can extend the life of Wylfa, but there are very real logistical and practical reasons why that is difficult, so we are looking at alternative power supplies. However, it is absolutely clear, as the hon. Lady cannot dispute, that Anglesey's economy is doing better than ever and is in a completely different state from the one it was in under the Conservatives. Then, it experienced a miserable time—manufacturing jobs were lost and businesses were closed right across Wales.

NHS Deficits

7. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): When he last met the Health Minister in the National Assembly for Wales to discuss NHS deficits in Wales. [59253]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I regularly meet the Assembly Minister for Health and Social Services to discuss a range of issues, including the funding of health services in Wales.

Mr. Amess: As the Secretary of State knows, the cumulative deficit for health services in Wales is predicted to reach £71 million; indeed, it is predicted to reach £100 million by the time of next year's National Assembly elections. Who does he think is responsible for that deficit, and will he explain to the House in clear terms why Government targets have been allowed completely to distort clinical priorities in Wales?

Mr. Hain: I see that the hon. Gentleman has applied for Southend to be part of the western tip of Wales. The truth is that his figures are completely inaccurate. The Welsh Assembly Government announced that, according to their best estimate, the hospital deficit will be under £22 million, which is 0.5 per cent. of the £4.3 billion health spend. That is a tiny percentage in the light of an overall record of increasing success and increased spending, which has led to the recruiting of an extra 7,300 nurses in Wales, with more to come.

Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in recognising the excellent levels of service provided by the burns unit at Morriston hospital in my constituency? Time and time again, it has proved to be the best unit of its type in England and Wales.

Mr. Hain: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. The performance in health right across Wales—at Morriston hospital and also at Singleton hospital in Swansea—has been extremely good. That reflects the increased investment that this Labour Government have put into the entire health service in Wales—investment that would be threatened under the Conservative spending plans.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Patients waiting for routine operations in Wales have to wait twice as long as patients in England. Does the Secretary of State agree that the NHS in Wales is an absolute disgrace and that Nye Bevan would be spinning in his grave?

Mr. Hain: I certainly do not agree. We are treating and seeing more patients than ever before and waiting times are plummeting. Waiting lists are being reduced, there are more nurses and doctors, and hospitals right across Wales are doing much better. However, all of that would be threatened if Conservative spending plans were ever brought into effect. That is why people should continue to support this Labour Government.

Economic Inactivity

9. Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): What progress has been made in reducing economic inactivity in Wales. [59255]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The number of economically inactive people of working age in Wales fell by 3,000 compared with the same period a year ago, but there is more to be done.

Chris Bryant: The Welsh economy has been transformed in recent years, with more people in work than ever before and a very highly skilled work force ready to do more. My right hon. Friend was unfortunately unable to attend Monday afternoon's launch of the Metrix bid to set up a defence training academy at St. Athan, which would be the biggest ever investment in the Welsh economy. However, does he agree that attracting that investment to south Wales would be a great deal for the Ministry of Defence, and that the Welsh economy would be improved significantly?

Mr. Hain: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. That is a bid to build a world-class defence training facility in the St. Athan area, which is an ideal location. He is also right that the number of economically inactive people in Wales, although it remains high, has fallen, despite there being 9,000 extra students in the figures. That shows again that, under this Labour Government, the Welsh economy is doing better than ever before.

Welsh Language

10. Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): What recent discussions he has had with colleagues in the National Assembly for Wales on the current legislative arrangements for use of the Welsh language. [59258]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I have had recent discussions with Assembly colleagues and the chair of the Welsh Language Board about the Government of Wales Bill, which will give Assembly Ministers important new powers to support the Welsh language.

Hywel Williams: Does the Minister agree that it is the fundamental right of accused people to have the evidence that they present to a court understood by the jury in the language that they choose—Welsh or English? Will he therefore pledge his support for the moves to have all-bilingual juries in certain circumstances in Wales?

Nick Ainger: The Office for Criminal Justice Reform launched a consultation exercise in December 2005. That exercise closes at the end of this month. We will consider the matter further in light of the responses to that consultation.

Energy Policy

11. Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the review of energy policy in the UK as it relates to Wales. [59259]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The Wales Office is working with the Assembly Government and the Department of Trade and Industry to ensure that Welsh interests are represented at each stage of the energy review.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response, but does he agree that Wales is uniquely poised to take advantage of initiatives in environmental and green energy, in terms of both job creation and the contribution that Wales can make to the renewable targets? However, does he share my distaste for the way in which Opposition Members flip-flop on the matter? [Interruption.] In this Chamber, they say that they support green energy but, on the ground, they say something completely different. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Secretary of State replies, I once again appeal for order. If they are reached, Questions 11 and 12 are just as important as any others.

Mr. Hain: I agree with my hon. Friend. This Government are committed to renewable energy, and we have done more than ever before to drive it forward. He is right to point out the hypocrisy on the Opposition Benches. The Leader of the Opposition says that he is in favour of renewable energy and even takes npower juice. However, he has denounced the wind farm off the north Wales coast that produces that energy and attacked it for being a bird blender. We need some consistency from the right hon. Gentleman, instead of these flip-flops all over the place.

Dee Estuary

12. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary on the progress of dredging on the Dee estuary. [59260]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): In August last year, the Welsh Assembly Government, the Department for Transport and the Environment Agency granted dredging and disposal consents to the port of Mostyn Ltd. I understand that the dredging activity to date has been well within the authorised schedule—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry if I have taken the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Ben Chapman) by surprise, but welcome to Welsh questions.

Ben Chapman: Does my hon. Friend appreciate that the Dee estuary is among the most sensitive environmental sites in Europe and, of course, in the United Kingdom? Does he agree that the dredging issue is important, not just for the people of Wales, but for the people of Wirral, and does he agree that we need to keep a close eye on the situation?

Nick Ainger: I assure my hon. Friend that there are conditions attached to the dredging programme, which include monitoring to safeguard the integrity of the nature conservation assets in the estuary. I hope that he is reassured.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [60083] Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 22 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Ms Barlow: May I seek to cheer my right hon. Friend with good news from the south coast, where Operation Reduction, a combination of police enforcement and drugs treatment, has led to a 48 per cent. reduction in burglary, a 45 per cent. reduction in vehicle crime and a 26 per cent. reduction in robbery in Brighton and Hove? On this historic 10th Budget day, given the Government's record in crime prevention, may I appeal to him to ensure that Operation Reduction gains a further 12 months' funding from 1 April, and would he like to see—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. When I am on my feet, the hon. Lady must sit down. She has had a very good innings.

The Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that this programme in her constituency, which has seen such huge reductions in acquisitive crime, will also mean that across the country over the next few months, we will have somewhere in the region of almost double the number of people in drug treatment. That is a very important part of cutting overall crime.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Can the Prime Minister tell us, is this the Chancellor's last Budget?

The Prime Minister: What I can tell the right hon. Gentleman is that I think that he will be sitting on that side of the House for a long time to come.

Mr. Cameron: Oh, come on, don't be so coy. Let me put the question in a way that I suspect about 350 Labour MPs would like it put. When is he off?

The Prime Minister: I regret to have to tell the right hon. Gentleman that we shall be here—I shall be here—for the time that is necessary to carry through the programme on which we were elected, since, I might just remind him, there was a general election less than a year ago, and for the third time, we won it.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister agrees with me that when local schools have problems, they should be given the opportunity to turn themselves around. Will he join me in condemning Leicestershire county council, which is making the decision this afternoon to close Rosebery primary school, without the opportunity for that school to be given a chance to improve itself over the next year? It has taken the council a matter of weeks to come to the conclusion that it wants to close the school, despite the massive support from parents, governors, teachers and the local community to keep it open.

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend will realise, part of the purpose of the education legislation that we are putting through at the moment is precisely to ensure that local authorities take greater account of the wishes, needs and desires of parents. I know that Rosebery school in his constituency has a very high reputation and I hope that his representations are successful.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): After the events of the last week, does the Prime Minister still believe that Members of the House of Lords should be appointed and not elected?

The Prime Minister: There will be a debate on that in the months to come, because there will be the opportunity to debate the House of Lords and its composition. In my judgment, it is important that whatever happens after that debate—as I have said before, I will listen to it carefully—we do not do anything that challenges the primacy of this House.

Sir Menzies Campbell: The debate would be much better informed if the Prime Minister would tell us his personal view on the subject.

Can it be right that the Labour party is financially indebted to a Minister of the Crown? Is not that a potential conflict of interest?

The Prime Minister: If I may respectfully say so to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he has had his own problems in relation to party funding for the Liberal Democrats, as all parties probably have. That is why it is sensible that we allow Hayden Phillips to conduct the negotiation on how the system is changed for the future.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we were elected on a clear commitment to introduce ID cards, and that the attempt by some Members of the unelected House to allow criminals and others to opt out of carrying the card is not only anti-democratic but ridiculous?

The Prime Minister: It is particularly absurd because the purpose of the amendment is to decouple the passport from the identity card. It is vital and necessary—indeed, it is a requirement—that we introduce the new passport with the biometric details. It is therefore absurd to try to detach that from the introduction of an identity card, which can give so many benefits in terms of preventing identity fraud. It is particularly absurd that the argument now being put by the Conservative party against identity cards is cost, because the whole point of linking the passport to the identity card is that 70 per cent. of the cost is in the passport. So it makes perfect sense to link the two.

Mr. Cameron: The murder of Mary-Ann Leneghan has truly shocked the whole country. Four of the six gang members convicted were on probation when that dreadful murder took place. What steps will the Prime Minister take to ensure that the probation service properly assesses the risk that people under its charge pose to the public?

The Prime Minister: That particular case was indeed shocking and appalling. Anybody who has read even the most cursory details could not fail to be sickened by that horrific crime. However, in fairness to the probation service, it is important to state that those people were not on early release, nor were they subject to penalties that involved imprisonment at any stage; they were on probation for far lesser crimes. However, a broader issue is raised not only by this case but by many of the other recent cases, and that is how we monitor offenders through trial, conviction, and subsequently—if they go to prison—when they are released. That is the purpose of the reforms to the National Offender Management Service, which is being introduced by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Cameron: Is it not the case that the reorganisation of the probation service, the part creation of the national offender management scheme and the shortage of staff have combined to create a demoralised service? Is not that part of the problem?

The Prime Minister: First, we have increased funding significantly over the years. Secondly, I do not believe that that is the problem. The problem is to do with how we track those who may be highly dangerous offenders, and ensuring that instead of treating the offence, we treat the offender. In other words, we must ensure—this is the whole purpose of the reforms that we are introducing—that if someone has a record of violent or sexual crime they are tracked and monitored even when they finish their sentence. The purpose of the changes to the National Offender Management Service is precisely that. I really do not think that it is an issue to do with the funding of the probation service.

Mr. Cameron: While early release may not have been an issue in this case, will he ensure that the review of the probation policy commissioned by the Home Secretary includes the early release schemes, which cause widespread concern and still let far too many prisoners out of prison far too early?

The Prime Minister: My understanding is that the early release scheme had cross-party support when it was introduced. Release on parole has been going on for many years. I do not agree that the problem has to do with morale in the probation service or the level of funding. It is to do—[Interruption.] I am about to explain. It is about the procedures that we apply to offenders. In my view we have to apply those procedures even when someone has finished their sentence. The problem at present is that someone may be convicted of a violent sexual offence, serve a term of imprisonment and be released from prison once they have served their sentence—and it is at that point that we need new procedures and rules that mean the person is subject to monitoring and supervision and, if necessary, recall, even after they have finished their sentence. That is at the heart of the issue.

The changes that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is making to the National Offender Management Service will be extremely important in making sure that prison and probation work far more closely together. There are real issues to do with how the probation service is organised rather than how it is funded, which need to be addressed.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): Two weeks ago I attended an event at my local Tesco superstore to promote its involvement in Fairtrade fortnight, yet two days later, the company announced that it was shedding more than 400 jobs in my constituency, with no prior consultation with either local politicians or trade unions. I have since received correspondence from Tesco indicating that it knew about that decision for more than a year. Will the Prime Minister join me in reminding Tesco that fair trade should mean not only a fair price for the people who supply the tea, coffee and chocolate that the company sells, but a fair deal for the communities in which it locates and the people whom it employs?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right, and I hope that any company faced with a situation where it has to make redundancies obeys the proper procedures. The information and consultation directive from Europe should assist in that process. Obviously, I do not know enough about the circumstances in the individual case that he raises, but I am happy to look into it for him.

Q2. [60084] Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): In the light of the recent financial scandals, which is the Prime Minister looking forward to most—helping the Italian police with their inquiries or helping the Metropolitan police with their inquiries?

The Prime Minister: I might respectfully point out to the hon. Gentleman that Labour has been a little more open on the issue of loans than the Conservatives have. However, as we have appointed Hayden Phillips to look into the whole area, the sensible thing is to try to reach consensus on the right way forward, because party political funding is difficult for any political leader.

Q3. [60085] Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the announcement by the Low Pay Commission that the national minimum wage will be increased from £5.05 to £5.35 per hour from October? The national minimum wage was once described as "extreme, dangerous and absurd" by the previous leader of the Conservative party, so what assessment has my right hon. Friend made of its impact on poverty?

The Prime Minister: The latest increase in the minimum wage will benefit about 1.3 million people, 66 per cent. of whom—two thirds—are women. As a result of a combination of the minimum wage and tax credits, not merely have we lifted many, many families out of poverty, but we have made work pay. The minimum wage is an issue we had to fight strongly—

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): What about unemployment?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman shouts out about unemployment, but may I remind him that we have 2 million extra jobs under this Government? I realise that he represents the neanderthal tendency of the Conservative party, which I admire in one sense, because it is so genuine. It used to be said that if we introduced a minimum wage, unemployment would go up, but actually we introduced the minimum wage and employment has gone up.

Q4. [60086] Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): Could the Prime Minister tell us which of his policies was responsible for the defection to Labour of Mr. Alan B'Stard?

The Prime Minister: I am not in a position to comment on Mr. B'Stard, but I believe that the reason why we have managed for the first time in our history to win three general elections, and why the hon. Gentleman's party has spent a longer consecutive time sitting on the Opposition Benches than ever, is that we have combined a strong economy, investment in public services and social justice.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): Does the Prime Minister agree that the prospects for cross-party consensus on tackling the long-term environmental challenge will prove elusive while the main Opposition party continues to oppose the climate change levy?

The Prime Minister: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend, and it is worth just pointing out that the climate change levy, I think, now accounts for about 40 per cent. of the reduction in emissions that this country will achieve by 2010. Therefore, support of the climate change levy is a complete test of whether someone is serious about the environment—and whether a party is serious can be determined not by people cycling, or not, to the House of Commons, but by whether they are prepared to take the tough, difficult long-term decisions to reduce CO_2 emissions.

Q5. [60087] Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): The Deputy Prime Minister said in evidence to a Select Committee:

"we are making more and more decisions on a regional dimension. It is done with regional offices at present which . . . the previous administration set up. I believe that" it should be

"on elected representation".

We are inclined to agree with him. Does the Prime Minister? What is he doing to end the colonial government of the English regions and make his right hon. Friend happier?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman may remember, we did have a referendum in the north-east. There are different ways that we can devolve power. One of the ways that we are doing it is, for example, devolving power to schools in local communities. Local area agreements for local authorities are immensely important. And of course, the regional development agencies have been a major factor in regional regeneration. So there are many models of regional devolution.

Q6. [60088] Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): When the Prime Minister was elected he promised to rule and be whiter than white. At what point did he change course, and why?

The Prime Minister: I would simply point out to the hon. Lady that we have introduced in the Electoral Commission laws, and, indeed, in the party funding laws, transparency for the first time—[Laughter.] Yes, it is true that we will have to go further, but I might remind her that prior to 1997, no one knew who funded any political party—in particular, the Conservative party.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): Can the Prime Minister explain to the House why, even before the loan scandal and the Metropolitan police investigation, 80p in every pound of individual donations to the Labour party came from people who were subsequently ennobled by him?

The Prime Minister: I am proud, actually, that the Labour party has the support of successful business people and entrepreneurs. I am quite sure that that is not the case with the Scottish National party—for the very good reason that its policies would wreck the Scottish economy.

Q8. [60090] David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Has the Prime Minister seen the article in The Sun today, featuring 12 people who were murdered by prisoners out on early release? Will he now support the campaign to stop all forms of early release and make Britain a safer place in which to live?

The Prime Minister: I point out to the hon. Gentleman that the early release scheme, when it was introduced, had the support of both sides of the House, and that parole schemes have been in existence for many years. We do indeed look at how we can tighten up those schemes, but it would be a mistake to change the whole of that scheme, which, as I say, had support across the House when it was introduced.

Q9. [60091] John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the sportsmen and women who are doing so well over in Melbourne? Will he also join me in helping to support the Glasgow bid for the Commonwealth games for 2014, and help us as much as he helped London in winning 2012?

The Prime Minister: I certainly join my hon. Friend in congratulating all our athletes on their successes at the Commonwealth games. Let us hope that that continues throughout the remainder of the games. I can tell him that I fully support the Glasgow bid—it is an important bid—and as Manchester found when it hosted the last Commonwealth games, they bring fantastic opportunities for the city. It has been an amazing thing for Manchester, and has very much helped with the renaissance of the city. I know that Glasgow is doing well in any event, but the Commonwealth games there in 2014 would be a great event.

Q10. [60092] Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What possible justification can there be for making nurses and other medical staff redundant at the John Radcliffe hospital in Oxford and the Horton hospital in Banbury?

The Prime Minister: It is important, surely, to put that into the context of the overall numbers of nurses in the Thames Valley strategic health authority. There have been almost 3,000 more nurses and almost 400 more consultants. Now it is correct that the John Radcliffe hospital has severe financial difficulties. That is why we are looking, with the hospital, at how it can get over them—but let the hon. Gentleman be in no doubt at all that in real terms the increase in the funding is almost 7 per cent., and there has to be a finite amount of money available. What is happening with the new financial system in the national health service is that for the first time, a proper account is being kept and hospitals have to live within their means—and it is important that they do so. In some cases that will mean hard decisions, but as one of the chief executives of one of the trusts was explaining the other day, those are necessary for the long-term health of the national health service.

Q11. [60093] Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): The whole House will join me in celebrating the fact that this week is the 60th anniversary of the first Bill that introduced the national health service, which was presented by that great socialist Nye Bevan. Does the Prime Minister agree that if Nye Bevan were looking down now, he would applaud—[Interruption.] He would applaud the massive unprecedented investment in the health service by this Government. Will the Prime Minister give us a progress report? [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: No wonder Conservative Members are shouting, because on 19 March 1946, the NHS Bill was presented to Parliament to create the NHS, but what did the Conservative party do? It voted against it, just as it has voted against the extra investment that is now renewing our national health service so that we have more nurses and doctors, more operations are being performed, waiting times and waiting lists are falling and, of course, cancer and cardiac deaths are massively down. That is the national health service renewed for the 21st century.

Q12. [60094] Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): But the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), told me last Tuesday, at column 398WH of Hansard, that my local hospitals trust should be "commended for their actions" and "supported in their proposals" to sack 300 staff, cancel operations and cut wards, theatres and other essential services. My constituents, who are losing jobs and services, want to know who is responsible for that. Is it the board, which is appointed by the Secretary of State, or is it the Secretary of State herself?

The Prime Minister: Surely the reason why there is a deficit is not that there have not been huge increases in funding. Surely even the hon. Gentleman can understand that there has been an increase every single year in real terms, including one this year of 6.4 per cent., so the West of Cornwall primary care trust is now getting more than £172 million. That has delivered falling waiting times, falling waiting lists and, indeed, more staff—but it is important for his constituency hospital, like the others, to live within its means. There is massive investment going in. It is correct that as a result of the new financial system that is being introduced, hospitals and primary care trusts are having to ensure that they do indeed live within their means. That is important, because whichever Government are in power there will be finite resources. The hon. Gentleman asks what is responsible. Sometimes what is responsible is the fact that hospitals and trusts need to change the way services are delivered so that they deliver the right number of targets that the Government have set down, but do so in a way that prevents them from going into financial deficit. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State congratulated the trust in the hon. Gentleman's area not because anyone wants to see anyone made redundant, but because it is important to do what I have described.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): When Feargal Sharkey opened a new music studio in central Wrexham recently, an orderly queue of young people formed to make their bookings. Will my right hon. Friend commend the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and Wrexham borough county youth service on their excellent initiative of opening the studio? Will he urge all hon. Members to open up space in their constituencies for a very loud and open rock music studio, because such studios engage our young people?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I was trying to think back in my memory which band Feargal Sharkey was a member of—the Undertones, am I right? I am sure that the initiative will be absolutely excellent. It is one of the things that enables young people to get fully involved in the joys of music.

Q13. [60095] Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): More than 8,000 people were on a waiting list for NHS dental care last year in my constituency. Thanks to the hard work of the primary care trust, that was down to 3,000 until this Monday, when a major NHS dental practice pulled out of care, meaning that the figure is back up to 9,000. When will the Prime Minister get a grip on the NHS dental crisis in this country?

The Prime Minister: The majority of dentists are agreeing to the new contract, but it is true that some are not. We are therefore bringing new dentists in and training more dentists, because we have opened a new dental school—but as I have explained before, we cannot force dentists to come into the NHS contract if they do not want to. I am pleased to say, however, that about 90 to 95 per cent. of them are coming in. I am sorry about the people in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, but we cannot force people to be part of the NHS dental contract. I point out, however, that for 5 per cent. less work it is now paying £80,000 a year.

Q15. [60097] Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Last week I asked the Prime Minister a perfectly straightforward question about long-term care of the elderly, and he gave me a totally inadequate reply about pensions. So can I ask him again: why do elderly people in this country continue to have to sell their homes to pay for their care in old age, eight years after he said that he would leave the country if that was still the case?

The Prime Minister: I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman thought that my reply was inadequate. What I actually said to him was that we have put a lot more money into help for elderly people and their care, but there is a limit to the amount of resources that we have.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Last year, despite rising oil prices, the UK had the highest economic growth rate in Europe. We used to have more than 10,000 unemployed in York; now the figure is below 2,000. How have our Labour Government managed to avoid the recessions that we had when the Conservatives were in power?

The Prime Minister: That is due to the strong economic management of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. What we have now is the longest period of sustained economic growth that this country has had. We have low interest rates, low inflation, high employment and low unemployment. That, of course, is enabling us to make the investment in the public realm and the public infrastructure that is also delivering better schools and better health care.

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): Would the Prime Minister agree that public confidence in the office of the parliamentary ombudsman is fatally undermined if when she produces a detailed and lengthy report on the scandals in the pensions industry, its findings and recommendations are dismissed out of hand by the Government?

The Prime Minister: They are not dismissed out of hand, but I think I am right in saying that even those on the Conservative Front Bench have made it clear that they cannot commit to the £15 billion that accepting the recommendations would mean. In the end, that is £15 billion that has to come from the general taxpayer. It is not that we reject the ombudsman's findings out of hand, but they come with a financial cost, and the financial cost is huge. If it really is £15 billion, the hon. Gentleman would have to accept that that is something that the country could not afford.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Now that the Treasury and the Department for Education and Skills have announced the extra money for youth services in England, will my right hon. Friend encourage local politicians to reach out to young people directly to ensure that they decide how the extra money is spent on facilities for them?

The Prime Minister: As a result of the additional money put into skills, we now have about 300,000 or more apprenticeships in the country, and very large numbers of people—hundreds of thousands of them—are being helped through to skill levels for the first time. The results of the extra measures, and also, of course, of the further education White Paper that will be published shortly, will allow us to expand significantly the help that we give people, not merely when they are at school but when they leave school and urgently require reskilling.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Could the Prime Minister have another shot at a question he was asked 20 minutes ago: is he in favour of a predominantly elected House of Lords? Yes or no?

The Prime Minister: I have said before when I have answered that question that I will wait for the debate and I am not going to commit myself. It is important that we do that. [Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman has to accept that there are different views on an elected House of Lords everywhere, and I am not going to express mine at this moment in time. However, there will be an opportunity for the House to vote on this at a later point in time. The one thing that I have said before, and I say again now, is that I will not do anything that challenges the primacy of this House, and it is important that we avoid ending up with gridlock between the two Houses of Parliament.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): At the end of last year 5 million more people visited Government-funded museums than in 2001, when this Government made admissions to those museums free. That is a 66 per cent. increase in visitor numbers. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is a triumph for a policy that allows people equal access to culture, regardless of their income?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. [Interruption.] Opposition Members may laugh, but as she says, that means an extra 5 million visits. There has been an increase of 66 per cent.; visits to London museums rose by 65 per cent. That means that young people particularly, often for the first time, have the chance to go to museums, as do others for their leisure. They are therefore able to see some of the best museums in the world. If anything indicated the strength and correctness of the policy, it is that there are two thirds more visitors today than when we came to office.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Why did the Prime Minister not ask the Electoral Commission to investigate the party loans issue?

The Prime Minister: We have abided by the party loans rules completely. Again, I say to the hon. Gentleman that whereas we have now put out all the names—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Oh yes; whereas we have disclosed those names, his party has not.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating West Lothian district council, a Labour council, which last week was voted the best performing council in Britain? Will he congratulate Graeme Morrice and Alex Linkston, the chief executive, on their leadership, and does he agree that not only is Labour working nationally, but Labour works locally?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted to congratulate West Lothian council, the leader of the council and everyone who is part of it in my hon. Friend's constituency. It shows the important role that Labour local councils play up and down the country.

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Financial Statement

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Before I call the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it may be for the convenience of hon. Members if I remind them that at the end of the Chancellor's speech, copies of the Budget resolutions will be available in the Vote Office.

INTRODUCTION

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): It is a great honour and privilege to deliver a 10th Budget. Hon. Members may be aware that the last Chancellor to deliver 10 Budgets in a row was Nicholas Vansittart in 1822. In order to win the House's indulgence to be able to deliver so many Budgets, he did of course have to agree to abolish income tax. I regret to inform the House that that is a precedent that I do not intend to follow—at least this year. I can also tell the House that, for Mr. Vansittart, being Chancellor was preparation for his next important position in government: Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

The British economy is strong and strengthening. I can report that inflation is currently 2 per cent. and on target. From the latest quarter, the economy is growing at an annual rate of 2.5 per cent. and on target, as we enter the 10th year of growth under this Government—the only Government in British history to be entering the 10th consecutive year of uninterrupted economic growth. With the world's pace of economic change accelerating, this is a Budget to strengthen Britain further for the global opportunities ahead: to lock in stability, but also to lead the world in new industries and technologies, which will increasingly shape our future; for British people, higher skilled jobs with higher wages, but also new choices for parents to balance work and family life; to invest in and reform public services, housing and infrastructure; and, building on the climate change levy, to meet the energy and environmental challenges. Most of all, this is a Budget for Britain's future to secure fairness for each child by investing in every child—a modern Britain that leads on enterprise and prosperity, because we lead in opportunity and fairness.

For 50 years, Britain's economy was prone to high and volatile levels of inflation, and our first challenge was and is not just achieving low inflation today, but entrenching a culture of stability that allows Britain to invest for the long term. I can report that we have met our inflation target this year and every year since 1997; and looking five years and 10 years ahead, under current policies, inflation is still expected to be in line with our target. In just a decade, long-term inflationary expectations have virtually halved to 2 per cent., and today long-term interest rates are the lowest they have been for 40 years, at just 4 per cent.

Indeed, even when facing in succession the Asian crisis, the IT bubble, an American recession, euro area stagnation and, most recently, the challenge of the oil shock and house price inflation—challenges which in previous decades led to British recessions—our economic framework for stability has proved resilient, robust and prudent.

On Black Wednesday in September 1992—not so long ago, as the Leader of the Opposition will remember—interest rates reached 15 per cent. Since 1997, interest rates have averaged 5 per cent.

Mortgage rates, which averaged 11½ per cent. between 1979 and 1997 have since then averaged just half of that at 6 per cent. I have said before: no return to boom and bust.

In new measures, I propose to entrench stability today. We will continue to have the strength to take the long-term decisions that matter.

First, since 1997, my approach has been that day-to-day management of monetary policy be independent of Government and the same principled approach be applied in other areas: to competition policy, industrial policy, small business policy and the management of debt. Today, I am publishing a new remit for the debt management office. Last year, our stability enabled us for the first time in a generation to issue bonds with maturities of up to 50 years. I can announce that in the next issue, long-dated gilts will increase from just under half to just under two thirds, reflecting the benefits we now gain as a country from long-term stability.

Today, I am also publishing the detailed proposals, modelled on Bank of England independence, for official statistics to be the responsibility of an independent board, and for enhanced accountability to Parliament.

I am also publishing today the new memorandum of understanding between the Treasury, the Bank of England and the Financial Services Authority so that Britain has in place the most up-to-date early warning and response system to deal with any risk to financial stability.

We will continue to be vigilant over global imbalances and oil prices.

We will take no risks with inflation at home. The public sector pay settlements will show settlements this year averaging just 2¼ per cent., combining fairness in pay, with more for nurses, with vigilance and discipline in the fight against inflation.

It is Britain's new economic stability, and also our commitment to free trade, open markets and scientific progress, and our willingness to invest, that make our country better placed than ever to be one of the global economy's success stories. A year ago, some said that the doubling of oil prices would push our inflation far beyond target and that a recession was required to slow the increase in house prices. Instead, I can confirm to the House, as stated in the pre-Budget report, that growth will be 2 to 2¼ per cent., followed in 2007 and 2008 by growth of between 2¾ to 3¼ per cent.

Domestic demand is expected to grow this year by 2 to 2¼ per cent., strengthening to 2¾ to 3¼ per cent. in 2007 and 2008. As industrial production grows, exports are projected to rise by between 5 and 5½ per cent. and 4¾ and 5¼ per cent. in 2007 and 2008.

Since 1997, economic growth in the euro area has averaged just 2 per cent.—in France, just over 2 per cent; Germany, 1.4 per cent.; Italy, 1.4 per cent.; Japan, just over 1 per cent.—but in Britain, growth has averaged

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

2.8 per cent. a year since 1997. Britain stands with the USA and Canada as the fastest-growing economies of the G7.

This is the 10th successive year that we have grown faster than the rest of Europe.

In fact, we have not only achieved growth in every quarter of every year since 1997, but, averaging 2.8 per cent., our growth rate now is significantly higher than the 2.1 per cent. average of the period 1979–97. Before we came to office, Britain was seventh out of seven in the G7 for national income per head. Figures published today show that since 1997, as a result of stability and sustained growth, Britain has risen from seventh to sixth, then to fifth, fourth, then third, and we are now second in the G7—second only to America in national income per head.

The test of our monetary policy is that we are achieving sustained stability and growth not just for a year or two, but for the long term. The test of our fiscal policy is that we match a commitment to balance the current budget over the economic cycle with the ability to make the necessary long-term investments. Figures for the current budget from now to 2010–11 are minus £11 billion, minus £7 billion and then surpluses of £1 billion, £7 billion, £10 billion, and £12 billion in successive years.

So we meet our first fiscal rule—the golden rule—and we do so by a margin of £16 billion. This £16 billion surplus contrasts with a deficit in the last economic cycle from 1986 to 1997—a deficit of £157 billion under the previous Government, and we are well placed to meet our golden rule in the next cycle too.

The purpose of our second fiscal rule, the sustainable investment rule, to keep debt at a prudent and sustainable level of income, is to end the situation where, under Governments of both parties in the past, Britain was plagued, as everybody knows, not just by stop-go in the economy, but by stop-go in capital investment. So meeting our second fiscal rule allows us to combine stability with the necessary long-term investment in transport infrastructure, health, education and science. As a result of our success so far, total net public investment, which was just £5 billion a year in 1997, is this year £26 billion—five times as high.

Schools capital investment, which was just £600 million in 1997, is £6 billion this year, and even after inflation we have invested £32 billion since 1997 in modernising our schools in just nine years, compared with just £14 billion in the 18 years before. We have invested twice as much in half the time. To meet the infrastructure needs of business we have been able to double investment in skills, transport, and science, yet even with such levels of investment vital to our economy, we are still comfortably meeting our second fiscal rule.

Net debt is now 47 per cent. of national income in France and in America, 62 per cent. in Germany, 83 per cent. in Japan and 100 per cent. in Italy. This year in Britain it is 36.4 per cent. of national income. I can report that in future years debt will be 37, 38, 38, 38, and 38 per cent. of national income successively, so we meet our second rule over the cycle, and we do so by a margin of £26 billion.

Net borrowing, which was £90 billion just over a decade ago, will be £37 billion this year, £36 billion next year, then £30 billion. It will fall to £25 billion, £24 billion and £23 billion in 2010–11 as we borrow to invest, borrowing in that year 1.5 per cent. of national income, compared with 8 per cent. just over a decade ago. In line with what I said in the pre-Budget report, net borrowing adjusted for the economic cycle will fall in future years from 2.4 per cent. of national income to 1.9 per cent. and then in successive years it will fall to 1.6 per cent., 1.6 per cent., 1.6 per cent. and then 1.5 per cent.

For this Budget I received representations to increase investment in skills, transport, infrastructure and science. I also received representations that we should adopt a third fiscal rule, that over the economic cycle and regardless of the needs of the economy, infrastructure and services, public spending and investment must, as a matter of principle, always rise more slowly than growth. Having analysed this proposal against our published plans, I have found that it would require in the coming year public spending £17 billion lower than this year and £16 billion lower the year after, closing off the possibility of additional investment. I have rejected these representations.

We are consistent that facing the economic challenge ahead we still, as a country, need to invest more. Meeting our fiscal rules and in line with our published plans, public investment to meet our infrastructure needs will rise from £26 billion this year to £29 billion next year, then 31, 32, 34 and 36 billions in the years ahead. And gross investment will rise from £48 billion this year to £63 billion in 2010–11. That sustained long-term investment in our education and infrastructure and in our future is possible because of the stability that we have achieved. So, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we can meet our fiscal rules, support the needs of business and make necessary long-term investments in, first, science, innovation and enterprise, secondly, infrastructure and transport, thirdly, security and the defence of our country and fourthly skills and education.

I turn first to science, enterprise and innovation. With the right long-term decisions, I believe that Britain can lead in some of the fastest growing and highest value-added sectors—City and business services, education and health, creative industries and science-based industries. Once small, now one third of our whole economy and one third of our exports, soon those industries will have a much higher share of jobs and wealth. In each one of those areas, I am proposing today to do more to support the dynamism and enterprise of our businesses.

I start with the importance of Britain's leading in scientific invention and discovery. The Secretaries of State for Health and for Trade and Industry are today announcing that to strengthen medical science and excellence in basic research, Britain will in future have a single budget for the Medical Research Council and NHS research, which will be worth at least £1 billion a year. America has its path-breaking national institutes of health, and we will now build agreement on the right design and institutional arrangements for a British model. To make best use of the additional £1.5 billion a year we invest in scientific discovery, we are proposing today a change of policy. We are setting out plans for a radically simplified allocation of the research funding that goes directly to universities.

We are continuing our policy of making industrial policy more independent and at arm's length from Government. We will refocus around business's own priorities, and £180 million is now available for investment in cutting-edge technologies. Every advanced industrial country knows that falling behind in science and mathematics would mean falling behind in commerce and prosperity. So the Secretary of State for Education and Skills is announcing today a comprehensive programme for recruitment, retraining, retention and reward of 3,000 science teachers, a new entitlement to study the full range of science subjects at GCSE level and the funding of after-school science clubs starting in 250 schools. And to ensure that that investment is matched by performance in our schools, we will benchmark science results just as we now benchmark English and mathematics.

Britain's stability and our commitment to openness and free trade make us well placed to attract business investment from around the world. In the past 10 years, business investment has grown on average at 5 per cent. a year, compared with 3.4 per cent. in the previous 10 years. Ten years ago, British business investment was £77 billion a year; this year it is £113 billion. We expect that in the next two years business investment will grow faster than the economy at 4.5 to 5.25 per cent. in 2007 and 2008, rising to £126 billion in 2008.

Since 1997, there are more than 500,000 extra new businesses, and there are an additional 105,000 self-employed men and women. There is growth in every region, reflecting the dynamism and breadth of Britain's growing entrepreneurial culture. In the cycle that ended in 1997, productivity growth averaged 2 per cent. a year. In the current cycle, it is 2.3 per cent., which is a rate of productivity growth higher than at any time since the '60s—the result of our stability. After decades behind, Britain has caught up with Germany in productivity, is ahead of Japan and has halved the gap with France.

In total, there are now 4.3 million businesses and 3.7 million self-employed. To meet and master global challenges, it is right today to do more to back our enterprise culture.

To boost creative industries—soon to be 10 per cent. of our economy—as well as modern manufacturing, we are expanding the successful R and D tax credit by doubling the size of companies that can claim higher credit. With the aim of trebling our education exports, which will soon be £50 billion of our economy, we are signing new education partnerships with India, Russia and South Africa and China. To make Britain more attractive for overseas students, from May this year the Home Secretary will make it easier for those with specialist skills who graduate from English universities to work here for one year.

Alongside a new City of London taskforce to promote British financial services globally, and backed by a new British advisory board and council, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry are announcing a revamped UK Trade and Investment, which will set new targets for expanding trade with China, India and emerging economies, and for making Britain the location of choice for international business.

Growing companies need venture capital, so we will refocus tax incentives for venture capital, with a 30 per cent. relief for investments in venture capital trusts. From today, twice as much investment as before will be eligible for income tax relief in enterprise investment schemes.

Since 1997, corporation tax has been cut from 33p to 30p, small business tax from 23p to 19p, and capital gains tax for long-term business assets from 40p to 10p—a corporate tax system that we will continue to discuss with business and keep internationally competitive. I agree with employers who have suggested that for low-paid workers there is a case for better alignment of the national insurance and income tax systems, so we will conduct a review in time for a consultation after the pre-Budget report.

Small firms with high growth potential also need equity finance, so I can announce £100 million of new money to double enterprise capital funds. Modern manufacturing in Britain will benefit not only from expanding the R and D credit, but the growing role of the manufacturing advisory service and a smaller number of business services offering more targeted support.

Today I can announce the formation of a national enterprise network of more than 200 schools: new summer schools in enterprise, including scholarships to American business schools for young British entrepreneurs.

In the last Budget, I announced that Britain would pioneer risk-based regulation. Today, the Government publish our code based on a legal requirement for inspection only where there is risk. Risk-based regulation will work best if it is applied not only here, but in the European union. We are asking the European Council tomorrow to adopt the same risk-based approach in the interests of British and European competitiveness.

Incomplete liberalisation of energy markets is one factor in high gas prices. So, again at the European Council tomorrow, we propose that all energy and other sectors which fail to liberalise and open up to competition be subject to independent investigation and enforcement.

Nowhere does the current restructuring of the global economy impact more than on jobs and on skills. A Britain that thinks long term and thinks globally will not compete on low skills but invest in the higher skills. The new deal enacted the principle of an active labour market policy for any person out of work, and the economy has generated 2.4 million additional jobs since 1997. The claimant count, which was 1.7 million then, is today, even after recent rises, 920,000—800,000 lower. Britain has 75 per cent of adults in work, which is a higher rate than America or the European Union, and there are 170,000 more people in work than when I gave my Budget a year ago. If we had Euro areas levels of employment, we would have 3 million fewer jobs.

But while other countries have yet to succeed in the fight against mass unemployment, the new deal in Britain is now rising to a new challenge. Today, the British economy has just 9 million highly skilled jobs. By 2020, it will need 14 million highly skilled workers. And of 3.4 million unskilled jobs today, we will need only 600,000 by 2020. Employers rightly tell us that their greatest long-term need is a skilled, flexible labour force. With the typical worker changing jobs seven times during a working life, investing in skills and the ability to re-skill will make Britain the most flexible economy of the future. So this Government will not abolish the new deal, which has helped more that 1 million people into jobs—we will strengthen it as a new deal for skills and jobs. The Leitch review is now considering a far-reaching proposal under which Britain can lead in skills: how to bring together at a local level employment and training services for not only the unemployed, but all who seek new skills.

Thanks to the national employer training programme, 100,000 women workers are gaining skills for the first time. Following the recommendations of the women and work commission, I can today announce new help for working women who want a wider range of career choices offering higher earnings and to close the pay gap with men. We will double available training for women with low skills, we will increase the work credit, and from October we will increase the minimum wage to £5.35 an hour. And we will address the unacceptable discrimination in women's pay.

As the cities paper published today shows, our cities and largest towns are our biggest job creators, but they are also the home of most unemployment in our country. So the Ministers with responsibilities for communities and for work are setting out measures, first, to help 30,000 more lone parents into work and, secondly, to pilot partnerships with the voluntary sector and local authorities for thousands more jobs.

We are well on our way to meeting our objective of 2 million new homeowners since 1997. After 160,000 new homes built last year, there are now already an additional 1.8 million homeowners—something that has been possible because of low mortgage rates. But Government must also help to balance supply and demand. Our priority, as the Barker report recommended, has been: first, to speed up planning; and secondly, to release more public sector land, now and in the future, to build 100,000 more homes. To attract more capital into house building, we are now legislating to introduce for Britain the real estate investment trusts that are so successful in the USA. To help finance necessary new infrastructure, our policy is that local communities should retain more of the planning gains that are generated in their area.

Britain is pioneering shared equity to bring home ownership within the reach of first-time buyers. The Deputy Prime Minister is today allocating £970 million for shared equity that will help 35,000 new homeowners get their first step on the ladder of home owning in this country. The Minister for Housing and Planning is inviting housing associations, local authorities, builders and building societies to offer shared equity, and we will now pilot minimum holdings as low as 25 per cent. We will also pilot a new scheme so that instead of tenants continuing to have to use housing benefit to pay their rent, the same money is used to bring sites back into use and to build new homes.

The climate change levy, the resulting climate change agreements, and the Carbon Trust funded by it have cut carbon emissions in this country by a total of more than 28 million tonnes. That is why we are already able to meet our Kyoto targets. In each of the next five years, these climate change measures will cut emissions by more than 6 million tonnes, and, as the Prime Minister said, they will account by 2010 for 40 per cent. of our total carbon reductions.

Because of the climate change levy, 10,000 businesses have signed climate change agreements. Under the Carbon Trust funded by the levy, 3,000 businesses have reduced their emissions. Enhanced capital allowances have underwritten investment in 13,000 energy-saving products. So I reject representations to abolish the climate change levy. I can confirm today our resolve to continue to reduce emissions, including through the climate change levy. Having kept the climate change levy at its original level for its first five years, it is my intention that for 2007 we index the climate change levy in line with inflation. As before, we will continue to return its revenue directly to business, and we will consult them on the most effective way of doing more to support investment in energy efficiency and the environment.

Our supply of energy should be stable, secure, competitive and environmentally sustainable. With 98 per cent. of emissions occurring outside Britain, climate change is a global issue which demands global solutions. Our first ambition is an international framework, and I can tell the House that at the heart of this is this Government's plan to strengthen and extend beyond 2012, as the Environment Secretary has said, the EU emissions trading scheme.

The developed world has a responsibility also to help developing countries meet their energy needs, so at the World Bank meetings in April, we will propose a World Bank facility—a $20 billion fund—for developed economies to invest in alternative sources of energy and greater energy efficiency for developing countries.

We want also to be a world leader in the discovery and development of new energy technologies. Following a joint study with the Norwegian Government, we have found that carbon capture and storage in the North sea can reduce emissions from gas and coal power stations by 80 per cent. So we are today publishing proposals for industry-wide consultation to move this important environmental advance, which will cut emissions, from research to commercial development.

Britain also has a unique opportunity to lead the development of all low-carbon technologies to meet the challenge of climate change. After discussions in recent weeks with some of the world's biggest energy companies, they have agreed to work in partnership to create for Britain a new energy and environmental research institute. For it to become, for Britain, at the cutting edge of science and engineering, our aim is that the public and private sectors together raise finance of £1 billion.

Britain must lead not only in environmental research, but in the exploitation of new sources. So to help British companies to commercialise new environmental technologies, we are setting aside an initial sum of £20 million as seedcorn finance for the first enterprise capital fund for the environment.

The energy used in buildings accounts for nearly half of UK carbon emissions, so our next ambition is for Britain's homes and businesses to be the most energy efficient in the world. Regulations to take effect next month will improve the energy efficiency of new buildings by 40 per cent., compared with 1997 standards. But we will now do more. In the climate change programme review published next week, the Secretary of State for the Environment will announce additional incentives and cash support to pilot smart metering and a new labelling scheme highlighting the energy efficiency of consumer goods. And I can announce today, following an agreement reached this week with energy companies, a major extension of help for insulation—an additional 250,000 homes over the next two years. With every pensioner and low-income family eligible for special help, from 1997 to the end of this Parliament a total of 2 million more British homes will have been insulated.

I can also announce a fund, initially £50 million, for microgeneration technologies which make it possible for homes and businesses to generate their own renewable energy. The purpose of this fund is to show how we can make these technologies, from wind turbines to solar heating, affordable to schools, housing associations, including local authority tenants, and businesses. Initially, it will cover 25,000 buildings.

While half of carbon emissions come from buildings, a quarter come from vehicles. So today I want to do more to encourage cleaner fuels and cars. I propose to radically reform vehicle excise duty. I am introducing, to take effect tomorrow, a zero rate for a small number of cars with the very lowest carbon emissions, which will pay no duty at all. Instead of £75 for cars with low emissions, we will have significantly lower rates of £40. Duty rates from today will be zero, £40, and then £100, £125, £150, £190 up to a new band of £210 for the small number of new cars that are the most polluting—1 per cent. of all cars. This will help to pay for 5 million more fuel-efficient cars to have their duty cut. As a result of our decisions, and at an eventual cost of £10 million a year to the Exchequer, the duty paid on 50 per cent. of cars will be frozen or reduced from tomorrow. Instead of just 300,000 motorists paying £100 a year or less, 3 million will now pay £100 or less.

To reduce carbon emissions further, 5 per cent. of fuel will be made from biofuels by 2010, with support and incentives that will, with the 20p duty differential, be worth up to 35p per litre by 2008. It is our policy that each year fuel duties should rise at least in line with inflation, as we seek to meet our targets for reducing emissions and to fund our public services. But for the fourth successive Budget, because of high and volatile prices in the oil market, I propose to defer the usual inflation increase until 1 September. I will maintain the duty differential for rebated oils. And next week, when she publishes the climate change review, the Secretary of State for the Environment will set out her plans for a proposed annual carbon report. I can tell the House that the measures we announce today are essential for the progress in cutting carbon emissions that we all want to make.

The Budget task is to strike the right balance between tax cuts that are affordable, investments that are essential, and stability that is paramount. In striking the balance between tax, spending and borrowing, I am able to do more for hard-working families. Taken together, child benefit and the child tax credit effectively mean no income tax liability for a two-child family with earnings up to £425 a week. So 3 million of Britain's 7 million families with children have their income tax liability effectively wiped out by this family tax cut.

I have examined which tax decision could do most for families in future. We are raising the personal tax allowance from £4,895 to £5,035. One option would be to raise that personal tax allowance further. But spending £500 million on a family tax cut in this way would give a two-child family on median earnings of £24,000 a year £22 a year more, or 40p a week. However, using the same resources to raise the child tax credit will give that same family a family tax cut worth £140 a year more, over six times as much: £2.70 a week. So the best way to do most to help low and middle-income families with children, the best family tax cut, is to do as I will do today: to raise the child element of the child tax credit. Over the next three years, I will improve it by 14 per cent. For a family with two children, the child tax credit will be worth up to £88 a week in 2009, or £4,500 a year, a far bigger family tax cut than we could give if we used the same money to improve personal tax allowances or to cut the tax rate. Every one of Britain's 7 million families with children will gain as we raise child benefit on 10 April this year to £17.45 a week.

Since 1997, we have also recognised that a rising economic tide does not automatically lift all people's living standards, and that over and above securing economic growth, we as a Government have a responsibility to address and cut child poverty. Because of investing in the child tax credit, child poverty has fallen by 700,000 in our first seven years. But we want to do more. It is by raising child benefits, as we have done today, and encouraging more single parents into work—as we have also announced today—that 300,000 children will no longer be growing up in poverty. Instead, they will have better chances.

It is also our intention that every child born and growing up in Britain is not only freed from poverty but also has assets to their name. Since September 2002, every child born in Britain receives £250—for lower income families, £500—for their own individual child trust fund, to encourage savings. Today, with 1.5 million accounts already in being, I can announce that for these same children, additional payments of £250 and £500 will be made at the age of seven as well. This is an investment in the future, and in a savings culture among young people, that will in time allow all young people to have more of the choices previously available only to some.

I understand the very real pressures that mothers and fathers face in affording safe, high-quality child care. In 1997, there was almost no direct help available for child care at all, other than for workplace nurseries. From April, working mothers and fathers can receive help through the child care tax credit worth up to £240 a week or, with the support of their employers, through the employers child care vouchers. That means help is available for working mothers and fathers at every income level, and it is the first time in Britain that we have made an offer of universal help for child care.

The Childcare and Work and Families Bills will provide new rights to nine months' paid maternity leave and establish a new duty on local authorities to ensure child care places. But today I am also raising the value of the tax-free child care voucher from £50 to £55 a week. I am making capital grants available to medium and small employers to establish workplace nurseries, which will complement the rise from 6 April in the child care tax credit and the expansion of Sure Start children's centres from 700 now to 3,500 by 2010. Overall, that is an increase in child care places for families to 1.2 million—90 per cent. more than in 1997.

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

I am able to take further decisions on taxation. On insurance premium tax, the aggregates levy, air passenger duty and corporation taxes, I propose that rates remain unchanged. On cigarettes, my decision is, for public health reasons, to go ahead with the annual inflation rise of 9p a packet from tomorrow. I will freeze duty on whisky and all spirits for the ninth successive year—for whisky, the longest period without an increase for half a century. I will implement, from midnight on Sunday, only the normal annual inflation rise of 4p on wine and 1p on a pint of beer. But in anticipation of World cup success this summer, I am freezing duty on champagne, and on British sparkling wine. I will also freeze duty on cider.

On VAT, I will continue to help churches and faith groups by refunding VAT paid on renovation of church buildings, monuments and other sacred places. I will extend the special VAT scheme for horse racing. I hold to our pledge not to extend VAT to a number of items: food, books and newspapers, public transport fares, children's clothes and children's shoes, including flip-flops.

I am publishing today a full updated list of the goods and services now subject to the reduced VAT rate of 5 per cent, and measures to tackle VAT fraud and avoidance. Last year, I proposed that the European Union should raise the duty free allowance for bringing goods into this country from outside the EU. This year, the European Commission has proposed to increase it from £145 to £340, but I am submitting proposals today for a further increase to £1,000.

The tax-free limit for ISAs will remain £3,000 cash and £7,000 in total. I can report that £190 billion has already been invested by 16 million people. I can confirm as usual the tax-free winter allowance of £200 for pensioners and £300 for the over-80s. Further support for pensioners will be contained within the forthcoming pensions White Paper. I will raise the exemption on stamp duty to £125,000, which means, with the last Budget's measure and this, we have taken 400,000 homeowners out of stamp duty. I will raise the amount of inheritance exempt from tax over the next four years from £275,000 this year to £325,000—94 per cent. of estates pay no tax.

Meeting all our fiscal rules, I have been able this year to cut vehicle excuse duty, continue the freeze on fuel duty, freeze spirits duties, take more people out of stamp duty, extend the family tax cut, child tax credit, and give more employers and employees tax incentives to cut the cost of child care, while at the same time improving tax allowances for business research, development and investment. Because of the strength of our fiscal position, I could cut further taxes while still meeting all my fiscal rules.

In each Budget, instead of dogmatically imposing a third fiscal rule, I look at the merits of the case to get the balance right between tax, spending and borrowing. Therefore, in doing so, it is also right to consider the case for additional investment in the national interest. I turn to our priorities: finance for our important educational reforms; plans for the Olympics and sports; and, first, defence, law and order and national security.

This is the first Budget since the attacks and tragedies of 7 July, a day when the nation stood as one against terrorism. We will never forget those who lost their lives and those who were injured. Today, we are allocating funds towards a memorial that will reflect the wishes of the victims' families. We will also support with an initial endowment of £1 million the creation of a new charitable fund to support British citizens injured in or affected by terrorist acts at home and abroad.

Since 11 September, we have also doubled the budgets for security here at home from £1 billion to £2 billion. The country depends on the strength of our security services and our armed forces. To support our armed forces who serve us so well in Iraq, Afghanistan and other international commitments, I am allocating an additional £800 million. To promote peacekeeping in the most troubled countries of the world, I am today also setting aside an additional £200 million. I can also announce that the UN emergency relief fund, with starting finance of $250 million, will, at the instigation of the Secretary of State for International Development, immediately provide as its first major disbursement $30 million in famine relief to the horn of Africa, building on our own emergency contribution of $60 million.

To deliver on the promises made at Gleneagles on aid and transparency, to move forward our international finance facility, and as part of the doubling of aid to Africa, I and fellow Finance Ministers from the IMF and World Bank will set out in Mozambique next month a new initiative that will be launched by President Mandela—and we are grateful to him—to finance new, detailed 10-year plans so that we can meet the millennium development goal of free schooling for every child by, and if possible before, 2015. Those initiatives are founded on keeping our promises to increase development aid each year to reach 0.7 per cent of national income.

As the Prime Minister has said, 2006 must also see an ambitious outcome for the world trade round. To ensure that developing countries can both support the round and be beneficiaries of it, we will contribute to an aid-for-trade fund that will help build the infrastructure and capacity to trade in developing countries that are urgently in need of our support.

The 2012 Olympics will be a proud moment for London and the whole of Britain. Together, the Greater London Authority, the Government and the national lottery have already agreed funding of £3.4 billion. I am able to announce the next stages. We will invest now in our 2012 Olympic champions. Recent results in Melbourne—and today, again, in India—have shown the outstanding sports talent that exists in our country. For training and facilities for world-class athletes of the future, I can announce £200 million of public money to be matched by raising £100 million in sponsorship, and, with another £300 million from the lottery, over £600 million will be available in total as world-class funding for world-class athletes in our country.

The Olympics will inspire young people across Britain and we must open up to them new opportunities to take part in sports. So we are also announcing that each year, from now until 2012, there will be a schools Olympics. Starting in Glasgow this year, and in a different city each year, we will fund annual national competitions in Olympic events open to all schoolchildren throughout the United Kingdom.

The 2012 Olympics is for athletes to excel in, but it must also be an event in which all in Britain can share. Today, we are also announcing an Olympic trust fund for nationwide cultural and sporting events, which will take place alongside the Olympics. The games will end in 2012, but their legacy must continue, and it should benefit not just London but the whole country.

Because we want the 2012 Olympics and, beyond that, any English bid for the 2018 World cup to regenerate sports across our country, I want us to build in every area over the next decade public-private partnerships that can locally renovate and extend sporting facilities at the grass roots. We are today announcing initial funding of £34 million for a new national sports foundation. It will start next week, modelled on the Football Foundation's success, and will bring together public and private finance for new local sports facilities and grass-roots participation. I am also setting aside £2 million for a new venture between police, premier league football clubs and community groups, with the Football Foundation, to offer young people evening sports and to tackle antisocial behaviour.

Following the Russell commission which I set up two years ago, the new gap-year and volunteering scheme, youth national community service, will be launched in May with 26 company partners, a budget of up to £150 million and a target of 1 million young volunteers. It will be backed by youth community service on environmental projects, to be financed by an expansion of the landfill tax credit scheme.

But we must also do more to invest in youth and community facilities, both for the future—where banks and building societies have agreed, unclaimed assets will go to finance new facilities—and from next month, when in each local authority with budgets averaging half a million pounds, young people will for the first time decide on their own local services. I propose that we extend that with a new challenge fund open to all young people proposing innovative projects for youth and community facilities in their area—additional cash to reward innovation and spread best practice across the country.

Further to support that and the voluntary sector as a whole, which are at the heart of the life of every community, we will now set up in the Treasury an office for the voluntary sector, including faith as well as non-faith charities. It will advise on gift aid and futurebuilders, and will conduct a nationwide consultation with the voluntary sector to inform our spending decisions.

But as well as making these additional investments, this Budget will now start the process of setting out our priorities and plans for the next spending round and the years ahead. Our aim must be to ensure by our investment that hard-working families are the beneficiaries of this era of great change. It is right to have the fullest possible debate on spending priorities.

A decade ago, our first comprehensive review reflected the British people's priorities for education, health and public services. Today I am publishing plans to begin a public debate on our second comprehensive spending review. But there are already two areas in which, by setting out our direction now, we can best deliver our priorities in the future.

In order to release new resources for our priorities—central to which is building world-class schools and education—we are reviewing the use of assets in all areas. After asset sales reported at £6 billion last year, we plan total sales by 2010 of £30 billion, releasing finance for our front-line priorities. In addition, I can confirm that the sale of Westinghouse will be completed in the next year, and we expect it to raise £3 billion.

The Government will move ahead in the coming year with the sale of the Tote. To diversify risk further and after the energy review has reported, we are prepared to sell part of our stake in British Energy and related energy assets. We will publish plans for the sale and release of public spectrum. All those decisions will release new money for our priorities for the future.

Also published today are the figures for the first £6 billion of Gershon savings, including a reduction in civil service posts of 40,000. And I can announce today further savings in the years of the next spending round from 2008 to 2011.

The Home Secretary has agreed that we can invest more in priorities like policing and security, while making savings in other areas within a three-year budget at its 2007–08 real-terms level. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, the Treasury, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Cabinet Office have also agreed that necessary modernisation will be funded from an innovation fund, and alongside this the spending review for those four Departments will proceed on the basis of minus 5 per cent. a year in real terms below the baseline of 2007–08—efficiency savings that will allow us to focus new and additional resources on front-line priorities.

To meet and master the global challenge, the most important investment in our economy and our future and the most pivotal reforms we can make will be in the education of our children and young people. I, like so many people, am grateful for the inspirational teachers and the high quality of education from which I benefited. And just as I had the best chances, my aim is that all young people from whatever background have the best of chances.

There are two priorities where, in this Budget, Britain can speed up our progress and advance even more quickly towards our ambition of world-class standards and excellence. With China and India turning out 4 million graduates a year, we can no longer afford to write off the talent or waste the potential of any British young person. So the Secretary of State for Education and Skills is announcing today that those who have missed out on their first chance in education will have a second chance to make the best of themselves. We are setting aside resources so that, for the first time, up to the age of 25, further education all the way up the scale to A-level standards will be free of charge.

That new right to free learning will be backed by adult learning grants to help with costs of living. And with financial help also for school leavers who have fallen through the net—and whom we want to help make the transition into training and work—our aim is a Britain where all young people stay on in part-time or full-time education, and gain skills throughout their working lives.

But 80 per cent. of the 2015 work force is already in work, and to make a reality of second chances in education for all ages, we must also strengthen our further education colleges—centres of learning that have been neglected in the past, but must be at the forefront of future success. So we are announcing for each college a step change in employer involvement, so that we can match the demand for skills to the courses on offer. The Secretary of State is also announcing new powers to redirect resources from failing courses to the best courses, the ones that individuals, employees and employers want to use.

We will match these further education reforms that promote individual choice, increase local accountability and business engagement and reverse failure with £500 million of capital investment and an annual budget worth £7 billion by 2008. As with other allocations, separate announcements will be made for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

But while we have a duty to ensure that there are second chances, we also have to ensure for every child the best first chance. Even with a doubling of investment, Britain's share of national income spent on education is still behind America and other major competitors.

We know the educational benefits of more individual attention, small group teaching and tuition, and we know that they are easier to get when the overall teacher-pupil ratio is low. In private schools there is one teacher for every nine pupils, compared with one teacher for every 16 in state secondary schools. To secure better results, we have improved the pupil-teacher ratio and doubled the money spent per year for the typical pupil from £2,500 to £5,000.

But that figure of £5,000 per pupil still stands in marked contrast to average spending per pupil in the private sector of £8,000 per year. Our long-term aim should be to ensure for 100 per cent. of our children the educational support now available to just 10 per cent.

So to improve pupil-teacher ratios and the quality of our education, we should set as an objective for our country that stage by stage, adjusting for inflation, we raise average investment per pupil to today's private school level. And I can start immediately in the coming spending round by closing today's gap between capital investment for pupils in private schools and in state schools, so that all schools and all pupils have world-class IT and world-class equipment, teaching materials and buildings. So in the coming five years, investment in schools will rise from £5.6 billion a year to reach £8 billion a year—a 50 per cent. rise, making a total of £34 billion of new investment over five years.

By 2011, annual investment in the typical child's education will be over £1,000 per pupil, matching in state schools—in IT, equipment and buildings—what private schools spend today, and demonstrating, fully within the discipline of our fiscal rules, that by investing more in education and investing not a lower share of our national income but a higher share, we can make a practical reality of our goal that every child should have the best possible start in life. It is a goal we could not achieve if bound by a fiscal rule that cut investment, but a goal we can achieve if we build a national consensus around a rising share of investment in education.

I have further announcements to make. This Budget's choice is to invest more, not less, in schools and families; to strengthen the new deal, not abolish it; to maintain the climate change levy, not remove it; and instead of cutting investment, to hold firm and not waver on the principles that have given Britain stability and jobs, and now allow us to do even more for our priorities.

To tackle crime and the fear of crime, there are already a record 140,000 police officers and 6,000 community support officers. In 1,000 neighbourhoods, there are full community policing teams. But the Home Secretary and I want every community to have a community policing team as soon as possible. So, at an additional cost of £100 million, we will ensure by April next year that we more than double the number of community support officers from 6,000 to 16,000, and ensure that there will be neighbourhood policing in every community in England and Wales.

From 1 April there will be free local bus travel for every pensioner and for disabled people, but we believe that there should also be free national bus travel. So the Transport Secretary is announcing today, from April 2008, at a cost of £250 million, for every pensioner and for disabled people free off-peak national bus travel in every area of the country.

I have one further announcement. In 1997, there was no payment at all direct to primary and secondary head teachers. With £270 million extra from April, rising to £440 million next year, I can today put much more money than before direct to our schools for tuition, teachers and teaching support. There are those who say—as with the £1.5 billion that I have already found for law and order, policing, security, environment and the Olympics—that this £440 million for education should be used to cut taxes. I could, of course, afford to do so, but I say: investing in education comes first, and investing in education is this Budget's choice. So for the typical primary school, up from this year's £31,000, £44,000 will go direct to the head teacher. For the typical secondary school, up from this year's £98,000, from next week £150,000, and next year £190,000—twice what it is now. For the largest secondary schools with the greatest needs, from £260,000 to £365,000 next week, rising to £500,000 next April. Next year, £440 million more will go direct to schools, helping pay since 1997 for 30,000 more teachers.

Excellence in education, my priority; more investment and reform, not less; a strong and strengthening economy; this is a Budget for Britain's future and I commend it to the House

1.34 pm

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Well, we wondered today whether we would get a Budget or a leadership bid, and I have to say that we did not get much of either. One can tell how big the crisis in the health service is—the health service did not even get a mention. If we cut through all the rhetoric, what we have is a Chancellor who has taxed too much, borrowed too much and is the roadblock to reform. He is a politician completely stuck in the past.

Of course, there are some things in the Budget that we welcome—not least because we proposed them. I particularly welcome what the Chancellor had to say about independent statistics and youth volunteering. We will look carefully at the detail, but I like what is happening: I come up with the ideas and he puts them in his Budget. [Interruption.] Bye-bye.

The Chancellor made a lot of the changes to the climate change levy, but he still has not addressed the real problem: it is a tax on energy, not a charge on carbon, which is why carbon emissions keep going up.

The Chancellor has just announced a new environment institute, but this is the same Chancellor who is closing the very laboratories that do the research into climate change. This was not a genuinely green Budget, and that is not surprising, because this Chancellor has not made a single major speech on the environment in 11 years. In a carbon-conscious world, we have got a fossil-fuel Chancellor.

I congratulate the Chancellor on what he had to say about the Olympics. I do not want to overdo it, however, as he has just spent an hour congratulating himself.

The Chancellor told us that his borrowing forecasts were correct. Yes, he correctly forecast that the public finances are in a mess. He is borrowing £37 billion this year. He told us that his economic growth forecasts were correct. Yes, he correctly forecast that Britain would grow more slowly than the United States, Canada, the G7, Spain, Ireland, the countries of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, and Australia. [Interruption.] I know that the Chancellor and the Prime Minister get to talk to each other only once a year, on Budget day, but they ought to listen to this bit.

We will study the rest of the Budget carefully because, after 10 Budgets, we know that this Chancellor's Budget speeches bear very little relation to the Budget itself. He told us about the savings culture, but why did he not tell us that according to page 238 of the Red Book—or, in the Prime Minister's case, the unread book—the savings ratio is only 5.75 per cent.? That is half what it was when he took office. Why did he not tell us that business investment, at 9 per cent., is at a record low? And he did not tell us that today he has revised the figure downward compared with three months ago. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker, there are two central facts that tell us the real story of this Budget. [Interruption.] First—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman. The Chancellor was listened to with very—[Interruption.] Order. The hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) will be removed if he behaves like that. One expects a certain reaction to these things, but the Chancellor was heard in relative silence and the same courtesy should be offered to the Leader of the Opposition and to the leader of the Liberal Democrats afterward.

Mr. Cameron: There are two central facts that tell the story of this Budget. First, the tax burden is at its highest ever level in the history of this country: higher than when Denis Healey made the pips squeak; higher than when Ramsey MacDonald sat where the Prime Minister is sitting now.

People who listened to the Budget will have noticed the second fact: even with the highest tax burden in Britain's history, the Government are borrowing £175 billion over the next six years. I know that the Chancellor is a man in a hurry, but that is no excuse for belting out figures like a supercharged bookmaker. Let me go through the figures in turn. He is going to borrow £37 billion this year, then £36 billion, then £30 billion, then £25 billion, then £24 billion, then £23 billion. That is £175 billion over six years. This Chancellor is mortgaging this country's future. That is more than £6,000 of debt for every household in this country. Those are the facts. After all the years of spin about enterprise and prudence, we have finally got to the truth. He is an old-fashioned, tax-and-spend Chancellor, and that approach is completely out of date. The story of this week is of a Prime Minister and a Chancellor up to their necks in debt, making promises that they cannot keep and not knowing whether to work together or fight with each other as the ship starts going down.

The real challenge facing this country is competing in the new global economy. The Chancellor has given us the biggest tax burden in Britain's history, and cannot be the right person to meet that challenge. We used to have the 10th lowest business taxes in the developed world, but we now have the 10th highest. The Chancellor has had 10 Budgets to boost science, but science departments in our universities are closing. He has had 10 Budgets to improve transport, and some of our motorways look like car parks. He cannot be the change that this country needs, because he is the architect of the policies that have put us where we are.

This country also faces a huge challenge to reform public services. The Chancellor, who has squandered billions of pounds on unreformed public services, cannot be the right person to meet that challenge. He has doubled spending on the health service but this weekend one hospital sacked almost 1,000 staff. Deficits across the NHS have now reached £1 billion. The Chancellor has doubled spending on education, but more than half of our children leave school without attaining the required standard.

Billions of pounds have been raised and spent, but we have no idea where the money has gone. With a record like that, the Chancellor should be running for treasurer of the Labour party.

In his Budget, the Chancellor mentioned pensions. After everything that he has done, millions of people in this country will think that he has got a nerve. This is the Chancellor who took £5 billion out of the nation's pension funds, and whose means testing destroyed savings. No mention was made of whether his pre-election bribe of £200 would be continued: I expect that we will have to find that in the Red Book.

This is the Chancellor who caused the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field)—the Government's first pensions Minister, and the only one who was any good—to say:

"When Labour came to power we had one of the strongest pension provisions in Europe and now . . . we have some of the weakest."

The Chancellor who smashed up the pension system cannot be the right person to rebuild it.

Labour MPs may think that the Chancellor is their salvation from the mess that they find themselves in this week, but the big policy failures of this Government—as opposed to the sleaze and the spin—are his failures. The failure to spend money wisely, to reform public services, to protect people's pensions, and to prepare for Britain's future—those failures are made in Nos. 10 and 11 Downing street.

The Chancellor may see himself as the rock on which Labour can rebuild its church. Instead, he is the roadblock stopping Britain from meeting the challenges of the future. He is an analogue politician in a digital age. He is the past. [Interruption.]

1.43 pm

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): It is a fearsome task to follow such a constructive contribution as the one we have just heard, but I must begin by congratulating the Chancellor on the presentation of his 10th Budget. That he did so with great enthusiasm is hardly surprising, as he has a particular affinity for the number 10.

Let us look at the Chancellor's legacy. Levels of inequality are worse than under Mrs. Thatcher. Our pensions system is in crisis, and consumer debt is at £1 trillion. In spite of what the right hon. Gentleman has said today, there is complacency about the threat to the environment, and he presides over a Treasury that cannot manage even its own tax credit system.

Of course we welcome the changes in child tax credit and acknowledge the stability in inflation and employment, but we are entitled to remind the Chancellor that that stability is based on the independence of the Bank of England. The right hon. Gentleman derided that policy throughout the 1997 general election campaign, but he implemented it within 48 hours of entering the Treasury. Against that background, there is no room for complacency or time to tread water.

I return to the issue of inequality, to which our mutual friend John Smith would have attached the highest priority. The wealthiest 1 per cent. in this country owns 23 per cent. of the assets—more than in 1997—while the poorest 50 per cent. own only 6 per cent.—less than in 1997. The top 20 per cent. of earners pay less of their income in tax than the bottom 20 per cent., while the tax system remains unfair and complicated.

Why does the Treasury tinker with a tax system that is so fundamentally unfair and requires such radical reform? Every time that it does so, it adds layer upon layer of complexity and creates an incitement to, and opportunity for, fraud.

The most unfair and regressive tax of all remains the council tax. Having read the Red Book, we can confirm that it contains no provision for the £200 rebate made available last year. If there is to be no council tax rebate, we know that some of the most vulnerable will suffer. They will ask why they deserved help immediately before a general election, but not a year later.

The lack of reform to the council tax is not the Chancellor's only failure to act. Under this Government, green taxes have fallen as a share of overall taxation. The measures announced today will make little impact on that. If the Chancellor needs any external reference, he need only examine yesterday's report from the Environmental Audit Committee.

We need simplicity in environmental taxation, and a proper system of green economic incentives that encourages people to change their habits and the way that they live. Such a system should express and implement the principle that the polluter should pay. It was notable that, in the course of his observations about the environment, the Chancellor made no reference to the impact made by aviation, nor to the crying need to address the problems of continued expansion in the aviation industry.

The fact is that CO_2 emissions are higher now than in 1997. The additional vehicle excise duty to be paid by drivers of 4x4 vehicles applies only to new vehicles. By my reckoning, it is rather less than the cost of half filling the petrol tank. That is hardly likely to operate as a disincentive for people sufficiently well off economically to be able to afford such vehicles.

As for public spending, the Chancellor prepared the ground well in his pre-Budget report. He conceded the error in his growth predictions, changed the economic cycle, pointed out that he was going to raise taxes and acknowledged the slowdown in public spending. He got a lot of cheers today when his speech seemed to foreshadow increases in public expenditure. What many of those who cheered did not realise is that the spending plans pencilled into the pre-Budget report will mean that there will be announcements of real-terms cuts in many Government Departments next year.

Despite all the extra investment, public spending is still not reaching the front line. Treasury targets have led to NHS trusts, and to the drive to reduce waiting lists at all costs that has meant that care in other areas has been cut.

Of course, tough choices have to be made and spending prioritised. For example, the industrial subsidies that the DTI has been giving to the nuclear power industry could be cut, and the money going to what is colloquially described as the baby bond scheme—on which the Chancellor enlarged today—would be much better spent on early-years education now than on a bond in the future. In addition, the right hon. Gentleman could decide not to proceed with spending millions and perhaps billions of pounds on an identity card scheme that is unnecessary and unworkable.

The British people want better public services and are willing to pay for them. What they do not understand is how so much can have been spent with so little to show for it. Operations have been cancelled, wards closed, local hospitals threatened and nurses have even been made redundant.

It is clear that trust in fiscal policy must be restored. That could have been achieved by widening the remit of the National Audit Office so that it can provide transparent and independent scrutiny of all Budget assumptions and forecasts. Some progress has been made today in respect of statistics, but that is not enough. The Chancellor has a good record of listening to our advice, rejecting it, and then accepting it. Perhaps, on this occasion, we will once again prevail.

I welcome what the Chancellor said about housing and the shared equity fund. The question is whether any of that represents new money. We have to address the issue of those who simply cannot afford to make the contribution that is necessary to participate in a shared equity purchase of a house.

I declare a retrospective interest in the Chancellor's provisions for the Olympic games. It is essential that those games are a success for London and the whole of the United Kingdom. He will have universal support for what he announced in that regard. However, it is not true to say, as has been rumoured, that my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) is already positioning herself to make a bid for the British team.

One issue that the Chancellor said nothing at all about was that of personal debt. Consumer debt is now approaching £1.2 trillion—practically identical to the gross domestic product of the United Kingdom as a whole. Of course, consumer debt has underpinned the economic boom, but the legacy for many families will be disaster. Nearly a fifth of all income is being used to service debt. That means that it is back to the level that it was at when the economy crashed under the Conservatives in the early 1990s. The immediate signs of that stress are clear: rising bankruptcies and rising repossessions.

The other side of that is the poor recent record of private business investment. Under its current leadership, the CBI has been a great deal more supportive of the Government than in previous years, but I suspect that it will react to this Budget more in sadness than in anger—sadness at the way in which regulation and tax complexity are squeezing British business. The Budget does nothing to deal with that. Enlightened British companies understand the need to pay taxes for investment in education and infrastructure; what they do not understand is why those taxes do not deliver the goods.

The Budget failed to deal with the most glaring issue before us today: the crisis in pensions. Last week we learned—the Leader of the Opposition already referred to this—that the Government would not follow the ombudsman's recommendations and compensate those who were foolish enough to believe in Government information. The ombudsman said that the Government had provided information that was "inaccurate, incomplete, unclear and inconsistent"—

if I may jog the Chancellor's memory. If an independent report had made a similar judgment about the actions of the Tory Government when the Chancellor was in opposition, his wrath would have been wondrous to behold.

We know that there is a broad consensus of agreement around the recent report by Adair Turner and that there is an existing blueprint for pensions reform that is available and capable of implementation. It seems that it is only the Treasury that stands in the way. Of course, chairmen of commissions cannot expect automatic acceptance, but Adair Turner is entitled to a real sense of grievance. The problem of pensions is set to get worse as the demographic balance of this country changes.

The Budget was an opportunity. In a period of relative stability, with low inflation and stable employment, the Chancellor had an opportunity to show his worth. He could have tackled the unfair tax system; he could have made the environment a priority; he could have faced up to the pensions crisis; and he could have addressed the problem of personal debt. He has declined to do any of those things. This a legacy from which it will be difficult for him to escape. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Will Members who are leaving the Chamber please do so as quickly and quietly as possible?

1.53 pm

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): It is a pleasure to contribute to the debate. I congratulate the Chancellor on his 10th Budget. He spoke for about 60 minutes and enlightened us. Sadly, the Leader of the Opposition spoke for eight minutes, so he has an awful long way to go to give us an insight into what the Conservative party's thinking is on the economy. It must be the shortest speech on record. I think that that is rather disgraceful and a discourtesy to the House.

In 1997, The Times described the Chancellor's first Budget as a "common sense budget that deserves support".

We can echo that today, 10 years later. I note that he broke with tradition then. He held his Budget on a Wednesday and eschewed the traditional right of a Chancellor to drink Scotch whisky when he presented it. Instead, he favoured Scottish mineral water. I congratulate him, though, on being consistent on Scotch whisky and having a freeze on duty for all these years. That is good news for constituents in my area, where we have whisky plants. I also note that the FTSE 100 was 4,751 on the day of the Chancellor's first Budget and is now 5,985. That underlines a decade of economic prosperity and stability.

[Mr. John McFall]

I also note that the Chancellor described 2005 as being the toughest year of his chancellorship, with the virtual doubling of oil and commodity prices, as well as a slow-down in the UK's main export market, which is Europe, and the country having to adjust to a more sustainable house price growth in the UK housing sector.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that since 1997, our stock market has been one of the worst performing stock markets of any major industrialised nation in the western world? Does he think that the Chancellor should take some responsibility for that?

Mr. McFall: Only in the past week or two, I had the opportunity to have meetings with people from the London stock exchange and such comments never passed their lips. In fact, they said that they are on a high, that equities are good and that they are looking forward to keeping themselves independent and not having NASDAQ or Macquarie coming in. The vibrations from the City are very good. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman follows my example, goes to the City, speaks to people and gets an understanding of what the City is about.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): In addition to the Leader of the Opposition's speech being the shortest that any of us can remember, does my right hon. Friend agree that it was also the most feeble, because it failed at any point to respond to any of the measures that the Chancellor had outlined?

Mr. McFall: I would not want to be discourteous to the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), but what I can say is that I was left bemused about the future direction of the Conservative party on economic policy. We all found that. It is about time that the Conservatives came up to the plate and explained to us what their actual policies are. As one politician said in American, where is the meat? That is what we are looking for.

I welcome the investment in education that the Chancellor announced today. I did not hear about this from the official Opposition, but the fact that we have an ambition to match spending in public schools with that in private schools must be a good thing. I hope that they go back and, in their clubs and social events, mention that the country has made a great innovative move. There are other people in society who will benefit from their education in the same way as they have done. I can only commend that move by the Chancellor.

I also commend the extra investment in science and infrastructure. I speak as a former science teacher and I know that, as someone from a science and engineering background, I am in a minority in the House. If we are to tackle the competitive issues that face the country, which the Chancellor has outlined, we need to ensure that we increase the number of science and engineering graduates in this country. We should be mindful of the fact that the Chancellor said that China is producing 4 million graduates.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): I would be interested to know what the right hon. Gentleman feels about the Government not supporting Sussex university, which is to close its five-star chemistry department.

Mr. McFall: It is a matter for universities to decide what they do and on what particular issues they focus. What I would be concerned about is if the country as a whole—UK plc—was not facing up to and addressing the national shortage of science and engineering graduates. We must focus on the big picture.

As well as the science infrastructure, I welcome the investment in the Olympics, as the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) mentioned. It is important to give our young people opportunities and ambitions. That investment, as well as the investment in child tax credits and child trust funds, can only be well used. Inculcating the savings habit in young people is increasingly important, and ensuring that those on lower incomes enjoy being involved in the savings environment is also extremely important.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that as the Chancellor of the Exchequer inherited the strongest economy in Europe, he should have been in a position to deliver the first target for the reduction in child poverty by 2004–05? Does he join me in decrying the fact that hundreds of thousands of children remain in poverty when the Government had the means and stated the aim of doing away with it?

Mr. McFall: I am aware that in 1997 the Labour Government inherited an unemployment rate of 3 million. Since 1997, we have produced 2 million jobs, and that is the best antidote to poverty. I speak as an ex-school teacher, as I mentioned earlier, and one of the sad features of life when I was teaching in the 1970s and 1980s was meeting young people five or 10 years after they had left school who had yet to get a job. If people do not have a job, they are not fulfilled and they do not contribute to society—it is a spiral of decline. It is important to provide jobs, and I commend the Government on those extra 2 million jobs.

This was the first Government with the stated aim of reducing child poverty. The Chancellor mentioned the 700,000 who had been lifted out of poverty, and that can only be a good thing. Is there a bigger hill to climb? Of course there is, and I would like to think that we could all tackle it together.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): Would not comments from the Opposition about child poverty have greater credibility if they would make the pledge to eradicate child poverty in a generation and match our commitment to help the poorest families out of poverty? Is not the reason they do not do that because under their third fiscal rule they would not make the spending available to conquer poverty?

Mr. McFall: I agree that if we could achieve our aims and ambitions on a consensual basis it would be good. The Leader of the Opposition has still to flesh out his economic policy, and that is one suggestion that he could take on board.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): Perhaps we should be more understanding of the Leader of the Opposition's position. He has asked the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) to discover his economic policies for him over the next two years. Until the right hon. Gentleman has come up with the plan, it will be hard for the Leader of the Opposition to respond to any Budget. However, the third fiscal rule will make it very hard for the Conservatives to match our pledge on education spending. If they intend to cut spending as a percentage of GDP, it will result in lower spending on science and education.

Mr. McFall: I look forward to the recommendations that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) produces, because to use skiing terminology, he is exciting and he goes off piste a lot. I am sure that we may look forward to some innovative suggestions in the future.

The Treasury Committee is considering savings issues at present and recently examined the issue of tax credits. Tax credits are a good scheme, but they must be delivered in practice. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) gave evidence to the Committee and I know that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has read the transcript, but it is worth underlining what he said. I suggest that trying to modify the tax credit system runs the danger of it starting to perform like the Child Support Agency. The choice is between a flexible system or a fixed award. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead pointed out, if we change to the fixed award, Members of Parliament will be inundated with complaints about the unfairness of a scheme that does not quickly take into account changed circumstances. I suggest that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General stays the course.

The Committee visited Preston to examine the IT in the tax credit office. From our experience and that of our constituents, we know that not all the information is on the computers when they telephone that office. The IT system is in much need of repair, so I hope that my right hon. Friend takes up the comments made by the Committee on that point.

The Committee is also holding a short inquiry on the Turner report and the pension recommendations. It will be short because we want to be able to publish our report before the White Paper is produced. Our focus will be on the design of the national pension savings scheme and the role of financial services regulation.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am delighted that the right hon. Gentleman has raised, openly and transparently, the matter of pensions. Would he comment on the tens of thousands of people in occupational pension schemes who have lost their pensions, especially since the Chancellor took more than £5 billion a year from them, from his first Budget onwards, by the changes to advance corporation tax? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that it would have been a good investment, among the Chancellor's largesse today, to allow those people to benefit from the findings of the parliamentary ombudsman, Mrs. Abraham, in their favour, due to maladministration by the Government?

Mr. McFall: The hon. Gentleman has conflated two issues. On the first issue, I believe that some 85,000 workers are involved, including some of my constituency. One can have nothing but real sorrow for their plight. However, when it comes to macro-economic issues and Government commitments on public expenditure, it is evident that neither the Government nor the Opposition are willing to make a proposal. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister asked last week whether the taxpayer should pick up the bill for those schemes. I accept that point, but I hope that discussions will continue because it was only yesterday that many of those affected came to lobby us on that issue.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Does the right hon. Gentleman share my disappointment that pensioner poverty was largely ignored in the Budget? In particular, the opportunity was lost to introduce a decent state pension for all pensioners. Many of those eligible do not claim the means-tested pension credit, so should not the proposals by Adair Turner be implemented instead?

Mr. McFall: The hon. Lady and I share a constituency boundary: she represents East Dunbartonshire and I represent West Dunbartonshire—

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): West is best.

Mr. McFall: That may be so, but the hon. Lady's constituency is more affluent than mine. Irrespective of where I go in my constituency, including social clubs for pensioners, people are grateful for the pension credit that the Government have introduced. There is now much more money in pensioners' pockets. If the hon. Lady is suggesting that there is a case for examining the position in the medium and long term, I agree, but a short-term solution has been found to pensioner poverty. We may have to embrace the medium and long-term issues in the pension report.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that 1.7 million pensioners who are entitled to pension credit do not receive it and that that is a scandal that needs urgent attention?

Mr. McFall: I recommend that the hon. Lady does what I and several other hon. Members have done. In conjunction with the Pension Service, we have held meetings in our constituencies to encourage people to apply for the pension credit. The Department for Work and Pensions has been very helpful to me and other hon. Members in organising such open days.

The Turner commission report raised two or three other important issues, including industry regulation. We know that the industry's commission-based model has produced inherent conflicts of interest that successive Governments have used regulation to manage. The mis-selling scandals led to tighter regulation, which, while protecting some consumers, has increased distribution costs and made it uneconomic for the long-term savings industry to service consumers on below-average incomes. Embracing the needs of lower-income consumers is one of the issues with which Turner, the Government and others will have to grapple. As Turner pointed out,

"it is very difficult for the financial services industry to sell pensions to people of average earnings and below, working for small and medium size companies, or even to sell pension schemes to their employers, at annual management charges sufficiently high enough for them to make a profit but sufficiently low enough to represent good value for money for the person saving".

That highlights the need for two solutions: first, the Government need to make the pension system simpler, to reduce the cost of regulated advice; and secondly, the industry needs to develop and encourage the take-up of simple, low-cost stakeholder products for that larger market.

The Financial Services Authority has a role in that regard. It did not go as far as it could on simpler regulation for stakeholder products—we have to get regulation right before we start considering the management costs, which must be low. Turner recommended 0.3 per cent. and at the weekend Aviva became the first insurance company to propose a figure, which was 0.6 per cent. However, we should be striving to reach Turner's figure.

The fiscal policy framework has stood the test of time. The Chancellor mentioned that the golden rule had been met, but the Treasury Committee and the International Monetary Fund consider that current fiscal rules may need strengthening towards the end of an economic cycle, to reinforce the credibility of the framework. The Committee will reconsider that issue over the next few months.

Some of the challenges to the framework will come in the form of the spending pressures to which the Government will have to respond in the 2007 comprehensive spending review. Their capacity to do so successfully will be enhanced if their preparations are transparent and Members and Select Committees can both examine and contribute to the process, so I welcome the announcement about independence for the Office for National Statistics. I received a letter about the proposals from my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, which stated that the Government are "entrenching independence in legislation ... introducing direct reporting and accountability to Parliament, rather than through Ministers".

So I presume that it will be through the Treasury Committee. The letter noted that the Government were

"placing a statutory responsibility on a new independent governing board to assess and approve all National Statistics against the code of practice, also backed by statute" and

"making key appointments to the board through open and fair competition".

As the Minister knows, an open and fair appointments system is important. Next year will be the 10th anniversary of the establishment of the Monetary Policy Committee, which may be a good time look at openness and transparency in appointments to such bodies. Given our experience of the work of the MPC over the past 10 years, I want Ministers to anticipate issues and problems, so that if they come up in Parliament the appointments system can be seen to be open and fair.

It is important that statistics services are seen to be independent. In February, a MORI survey of public opinion on statistics for the Statistics Commission found that there was "little consensus on whether the statistical service is subject to undue influence from the Government. Many, in particular those with a connection to Parliament, are confident that the statistical service operates independently and with integrity".

I am sure that we would find that view in the House—but it is not the House that matters, it is the outside world. The survey continued:

"However, for those outside the 'Westminster sphere of influence', there is far more scepticism as to whether this is actually the case. While most still regard the ONS as an authoritative, trusted source of information, there are doubts over the validity of figures produced by individual Government departments."

As the Finance Bill goes through the House, it is important that Ministers take account of that point, which will also be of interest to Members in Committee.

The Chancellor was correct to stress the measures we need to adopt to enhance the UK's global competitiveness. That is welcome, not least for women. The women and work commission produced a report in February, "Shaping a Fairer Future", which set out 40 practical recommendations to tackle job segregation and the gender pay gap, which still exists despite 30 years of equal pay legislation. The only way that we will respond to global challenges on competitiveness is to ensure that we upgrade our skills, so I welcome the continuation of the new deal and the upgrading of skills, especially for women in low-paid employment.

The Treasury Committee has been seized by what globalisation will mean for the UK. We have undertaken an inquiry into globalisation, to which both the Governor of the Bank of England and the Chancellor have agreed to give evidence. Part of our inquiry will look at the role of the IMF. The Chancellor and the Governor—in a speech a month or so back—have both focused on the IMF, about which there are a number of fundamental questions.

What is the fund for? Do we need an IMF? Is there a role for a multilateral monetary system and, if so, what is it? In 1946, the international monetary system was built around fixed exchange rates and controls on capital investment, and each country met its international responsibilities by running a balanced current account. That is a world away from the situation faced by financial services in the 21st century. The IMF is increasingly seen as the lender of last resort, and until the repayment of loans by Argentina and Brazil, 70 per cent. of its outstanding loans were to only three countries. The IMF lending book is the lowest that it has ever been, and we can be sure that the Asian economies, including Japan, having built up their foreign exchange reserves, will not be coming back to the IMF. They were scarred by the experience of the 1990s.

The IMF has a number of tasks, especially at a time of such massive global imbalances. It should be a forum for transparent discussion of the way forward with national Governments about risks to the world economy. Recently, the Treasury Committee visited the United States where we had the opportunity to talk to a wide number of people. One issue relating to economic risk is trade protectionism, and the possibility of its being translated into policy change in the US should not be dismissed. It is a risk and a Bill proposing further protectionism is currently before Congress. However, it is important that we emphasise to our US colleagues that protectionism will not get us anywhere.

There is also a risk of sharp adjustments in US current accounts spilling over to sharp adjustments in assets, markets and energy prices. The high and volatile energy market remains a concern in a globalised world where new alliances are being formed in the global economy.

A new world order has been established, as people have indicated, and the US economic hegemony is being challenged by the rise of the new economic superpowers, so an understanding of global economic development no longer needs to begin in Washington—hence the Treasury Committee in its inquiry has already visited China and, in June, hopes to visit India, which has been labelled the new China. I will not go over all the statistics on China—most hon. Members are familiar with them—but the UK needs policy responses to them.

The Government have indicated that they have a UK-China task force and have identified five key issues, with which I agree—energy, financial services, water, health care and information and communications technology—but I suggest to Ministers that we should also take on board both education and legal services. On a visit to Hong Kong in September, at the invitation of the Hong Kong Government, it was obvious that there are opportunities in education and legal services, and Hong Kong is a good base for us to be involved in that exercise.

We have globalisation at a time of threats in the US and in Europe. We saw the almost xenophobic response by people in France and Belgium to the possible takeover of the steelmaker Arcelor by Mr. Mittal. We saw the US reaction to the P&O takeover by Dubai Ports World. Only in the past couple of weeks, we have seen the locking out of an Italian energy company by the French, who designated 11 sensitive sectors that must be safeguarded against foreign bids.

We must avoid a perilous collision between nationalism and globalisation. Therefore, it is very important to have a cross-party view on the issue so that we can respond to the long-term challenges, which have a habit of coming sooner than we expect. The Chancellor is right to focus on those long-term challenges, but we also have short-term challenges, on which the Treasury Committee will, no doubt, examine the Chancellor. Over two and half hours, all of us who serve on the Committee will have an opportunity to pinpoint those issues.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: The right hon. Gentleman is the Chairman of a very important Select Committee and he has just referred to international business takeovers. Does he think that the people and Governments of countries must take a view on globalisation and decide whether every takeover will be beneficial? Does he agree that they should consider not only the long-term survival of the company in question, but the impact on employment in the communities where the companies are being taken over and the benefits or disbenefits that the takeover might bring to those localities and countries? That is not just nationalism, it is good sense.

Mr. McFall: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. At the end of the day, globalisation has been a good thing. For example, consumers have found that electrical goods and clothing have been cheaper as a result. US consumers have been able to spend because China and other Asian countries are holding the dollar as their foreign exchange reserves. There are good aspects to globalisation, but there are drawbacks as well. Increasingly over the years, some of our communities will be affected by them.

Do we have a policy response to the trends that will take place in the future? It is important to have such a debate now. The Treasury Committee is looking at the issue now and we share our information with the House. There is no doubt that a number of us will experience the local effect of the downsides of globalisation, but I am sure that we can debate that as time goes on and consider those issues with a common view, so that we find both an understanding of what is happening in the world and an appropriate policy response for our country, which will help both its competitiveness and prosperity in the future.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I have declared my interests in the Register of Members' Interests, and I should like to remind the House that I am a director of companies in both services and manufacturing and I am a director of a pension trustee company of one of those companies.

It is a great pity that the Chancellor of the Exchequer presents his case in such a selective way. I certainly welcome in his remarks today the proposition that we should have a independent eye cast over how the figures are compiled, and I hope that that independent eye will also be able to give advice to the Chancellor, which we can know about, on how the figures should be presented on big occasions such as this. It makes for a much better debate if we have an honest and full account of what is going on in the economy. For our part, we can accept that not everything is bad, but we would like the Chancellor to agree that not everything is good.

It is extremely good that we are debating the economy yet again against the background of continuous months, quarters and years of output growth, since we righted the economy after the bad mistake of the exchange rate mechanism—a policy recommended by Labour to the then Conservative Government, but a policy that Labour seems to have forgotten that it was part father and mother to. Since we came out of that most unfortunate experiment and since the Conservative Government put in place the foundations of fiscal discipline and greater productivity growth, the economy has grown extremely well. The continuous growth under Governments of both parties is extremely welcome.

If we look at the Chancellor's views on growth, we must accept—I trust that Labour Members will accept—that we are reviewing a disappointing year. In 2005, the Chancellor tells us that output growth was down to only 1.75 per cent., compared with, as he helpfully tells us, real GDP growth that averages 2.5 per cent. in the major seven countries and 4.5 per cent. in the world overall. So that shows Britain growing not only at under half the world average rate, but at considerably below the growth rate of large, advanced countries.

If we turn to the Chancellor's forecasts, we see that he thinks that the economy will grow by between 2 and 2.5 per cent. this year. If we are charitable and say that he thinks that it will grow at 2.25 per cent.—I fear that he thinks that it will grow at 2 per cent.—that compares again with what he thinks will be a rather better performance by the major seven countries, with growth at an average of 2.5 per cent., and an overall world performance of 4.5 per cent. yet again.

The first question that we need to ask in reviewing the Budget measures is whether the Chancellor is now planning to put in place measures that are sufficient to get Britain at least up to the average growth rate of the major countries in the world, or even better, to get us above the average of the major countries of the world, because we have clearly slipped some way below them in recent months and recent quarters.

The Chancellor also gives us the latest projections on his borrowing. The Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) gave a superb response to the Budget, and its brevity was matched by its brilliance. There is no need for the Leader of the Opposition to give a very long speech if he has gone to the trouble of preparing an excellent short speech that makes all the crucial points. One of the crucial points on which my right hon. Friend immediately homed in, although he did not have very long to read the documents, was the way in which the Chancellor intends to borrow so much money over the review period set out in the Budget forecast that we have just received.

My right hon. Friend said that the Chancellor plans to borrow £175 billion, on the published figures, through the public sector accounts over that period. Like my right hon. Friend, I think that that is very dangerous. If we are going to live through a period of reasonable growth, surely that is exactly the point in the cycle where we should cut public borrowing rather more sharply than the Chancellor forecasts, preferably by the growth in revenues from faster economic growth, but also from pursuing the initiatives that the Chancellor always promises that he is taking to gain greater efficiency in the public services and public sector and to cut the public overheads.

The Chancellor suggests instead very slow progress indeed: £37 billion of borrowing in the year just finishing; £36 billion of borrowing in the year about to start; and another £30 billion of borrowing in 2007–08. If only that were the end of it, I suppose that it would meet the wishes of the Labour party, but of course that is not the end of it because we know that there will be an awful lot of off-balance-sheet borrowing, too. There is no reference in the stock of debt figures to the £20-odd billion of borrowings and guaranteed moneys that have already been pushed the way of the effectively renationalised railway company. Strange accounting procedures are followed for all the private finance initiative and public-private partnership projects in which the Government have indulged on a grand scale.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend agree that many British taxpayers will get a nasty shock over the coming years when they find that they suddenly have to start paying for hospitals that they thought that their new and extra taxes had already paid for?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point.

From rough mental arithmetic, the published figure of £175 billion represents about £3,000 for every man, woman and child in the country. The Chancellor is thus asking every one of us to sign up to an additional £3,000 mortgage. On top of that, there will be additional mortgages for PFI, PPP and off-balance-sheet items, including the railways, which will probably be another £1,000 or £2,000. There will thus be a substantial increase in the national mortgage per head on top of the billions that the Chancellor has already borrowed and accounted for and those for which he has not accounted. Given that there is already quite a lot of debt in the private sector, the Chancellor should be more careful when building up public debt. After all, public debt is tax deferred; we or our children have to repay all that money with interest.

Mr. Newmark: I would be interested to hear my right hon. Friend's comments about the fact that up to £800 billion might be held off balance sheet. Should not the Chancellor be far more transparent in his accounts? Is that not the issue with which we should be dealing?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right to extend my argument even further. He is pointing out that we should account properly for not only borrowings that are guaranteed but not in the documents, such as the railway borrowings, and the contingent liabilities of all the PPP and PFI projects, but the massive contingent liabilities in the pensions area throughout the public sector.

I will accelerate my argument because of my hon. Friend's question, although I was going to refer to this matter later. The Government have just said to all private businesses that they must not only have recent calculations of the deficits in their pension funds, but write those deficits on to their company's balance sheets. I understand the logic of that, and FRS 17 is the standard under the Government's requirements. My plea is not that the rule is changed for companies, but that the same rule is applied to the Government. It is obvious that the Government have a massive deficit on the pension account because they—Governments of all parties have done this over the years—have built up huge liabilities, but not provided any assets on the other side of the account to pay for them. We need honest public accounts that match the clarity and honesty of private sector company accounts to show us the contingent liabilities of all the pension funds.

The Government may well counter my point by saying that one can deduce, by reading carefully the Red Book and other sources, the annual payments under the PFI and PPP contracts. However, that is not sufficient because it is a flow—an income statement—for each year. We need to know the contingent liability, which is how many times the income must be paid to get rid of the contract, or how much would have to be paid to rescue the contract if the company went bust or the contract went wrong. It is how much would need to be paid to reinstate the service if there was a breakdown. We need an accurate figure for that kind of contingency.

We know that sadly such contracts go wrong from time to time. We can expect new Governments to be elected who would like to change the arrangements, but there would be a substantial price for doing so. For example, it might prove penal to get out of the London tube contract because it is very bad. We need on the face of Government accounts a clear statement of what the contingent liability costs of all the private arrangements would be, in addition to the guaranteed borrowings and the pension liabilities.

My concluding point on debt is simple and echoes the comments of my right hon. Friend. We are borrowing too much as a nation both through the public accounts and outside the public accounts under Government initiative and with Government encouragement. As a period of moderate to reasonable growth of the economy is forecast, we ought to rein back that debt more quickly.

Rob Marris: I think that the right hon. Gentleman has been drawing on the information in table 2.4 on page 31 of the Red Book. If he looks at the back of the Red Book, he will see a table on previous borrowings. The Conservatives were in office between 1979 and 1997, and during 11 of those 18 years, the percentage of GDP that borrowing represented was considerably higher than it has been in any year under this Government since 1997. I think that I am right in saying that in all those 11 years, borrowing was well over 40 per cent. of GDP. Does the right hon. Gentleman decry the past of his party, during some of which time he was in government.

Mr. Redwood: I have already said that an economic mistake was made during the Conservative years. The mistake was backed and encouraged by the Labour party, but I never supported it. Yes, we borrowed more than we would have liked because of that mistake. The hon. Gentleman makes a party political point while I am trying to give a sensible analysis of the true position, so I would say that quite a lot of that debt was incurred to clear up the mess that Labour left behind in 1979, when we inherited a grossly over-borrowed and overtaxed country. Of course, the borrowing was especially high because Labour did not want to confess just how much it had to put up taxes to pay for the spending on its accounts.

Mr. Newmark: Perhaps I can help my right hon. Friend in answering the question raised by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris). The problem goes back to the point about transparency that I made earlier. If one adds together the money that is off balance sheet and the amount that is on balance sheet, it comes to roughly £1.3 trillion, which is 105 per cent. of GDP, not 35 per cent.

Mr. Redwood: Once again my hon. Friend makes his point extremely powerfully. I note that the amount has gone up by several hundred billions while he has been sitting next to me. I have seen the figure of £1.3 trillion in public commentaries and the press. It must be right if it has appeared in the newspapers, must it not? Although I have not done the calculations myself, the figure feels about right. We can leave the House with the clear understanding that there is £1 trillion or so of liabilities, many of which are not stated in the figures. Such liabilities are serious for all taxpayers and our children, so a more honest recognition of the situation would be helpful.

I will make a final comment on the fiscal balances in table 2.4. It is a great pity that we do not have an honest account from the Chancellor of exactly what the cycle is. It is also a great pity that he does not stick to the same cycle each time he presents his figures because that would give far more cogency.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): I want to be sure that I have not misheard the right hon. Gentleman. Did he say that he thought that there was £1 trillion of off-balance-sheet liabilities?

Mr. Redwood: I am saying that there are about £1 trillion of liabilities, which are mainly pension liabilities. The hon. Gentleman should realise how expensive many public sector pensions will be and that practically all of them are without a fund. Fortunately, the House of Commons is not in that category because we have a properly funded scheme to which Members contribute and local government is also not in that position, although there are some deficits in local government schemes. However, there is nothing but deficits when it comes to all the unfunded schemes, and there should be a recognition of that in the accounts.

Mr. Newmark: Just to be accurate, I believe that approximately £436 billion is on balance sheet and about another £150 billion is off balance sheet, which is where we get the figure of £1.3 trillion from— [HON. MEMBERS: "What?"]

Mr. Redwood rose—

Mr. Newmark: Not £450 billion; £850 billion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Despite the enthusiasm of the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark), the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) has the floor.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for your usual courtesy.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) should do some more homework. I know that he has been busy losing the leadership of his party, but he should do a little bit of reading. If he reads the figures in the Red Book on the amount of outstanding national borrowing and adds to that the pension deficits of the funded public sector schemes, the PFI and PPP contingent liabilities, the debt that has not gone through the books that should have done so, and the very large figure for unfunded pension liabilities, he would not have change out of £1 trillion. It is a good round figure that should help to inform the debate. I will leave it at £1 trillion because I have not myself done the calculation down to the second decimal point. However, I have looked at the general arguments and I am satisfied that that is the order of magnitude to which the Chancellor needs to face up.

That brings me to box 2.5—a fascinating little aside in the Chancellor's rambles through the state of the British economy—with the catchy title "Low yields and the Government bond market". Normally, one's eyes would glaze over and one would pass hurriedly on, because it is usually a subject for anoraks only and I do not regard myself as being in that category. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I know that I have been regarded as an interesting skier off-piste, which I found fascinating as I have never taken to the slopes on the continent of Europe in that way.

However, I am interested in that box, and the House should be interested in it, too, because there is a serious danger that we are living through unnatural times in the bond market. Those unnatural times are already having a dramatic impact on the real economy, and they could have an even more dramatic and adverse impact on the real economy if the problem is not handled well.

[Mr. Redwood]

The problem began when the Chancellor, encouraged by the Prime Minister no doubt, thought that he had discovered that elixir of Labour Chancellors—a stealth tax that would raise a huge amount of money which would do no damage and which no one minded. He introduced a tax on the dividend income of British shares held through pension funds and other charitable funds. He has never published an accurate figure for how much that takes.

Chris Huhne: It is £5 billion.

Mr. Redwood: The general £5 billion-a-year figure is in common circulation. It started at rather less than that, to be fair to the Chancellor, but it is probably now more. It is growing. Let us take it at £5 billion, however, because he will not give us the accurate figure. He would, I am sure, concede that it is a large sum.

If we take £5 billion a year out of pension funds for, say, 10 years of the policy, before Labour loses power, that is £50 billion out of pension funds. That is £50 billion that has not been invested, so perhaps another £20 billion would have been made on that from investment gain in income if it had been available to reinvest. We should then factor in the obvious point, which I made at the time, that the change was bound to hit share values—share prices valued as a stream of income from a company—and that if we tax that stream of income more heavily, it is worthless. I did a back-of-the-envelope calculation when the Chancellor proposed the tax and said that with the market valuing income at 20 times its rate, as it did at the time, the £5 billion off the stream of company income would mean a £100 billion fall in share values. Compared with the fall going on elsewhere in the German, French and American markets at the time, the fall in London was about £100 billion extra for a variety of global as well as national reasons.

Basically, the Chancellor decided to hit the pension funds by about £170 billion over a 10-year period as a result of capital loss income and income reinvested forgone. We now see that the actual deficits may be a bit lower than that, I am pleased to say, because the stock market has started to pick up some of the lost ground that the hit and other factors caused originally, and companies have put a lot of extra money in to try to make good some of the losses caused by the Chancellor. I think that everyone agrees, however, that there is still a serious pension deficit problem.

Chris Huhne: Just so that I can follow the right hon. Gentleman's argument, perhaps he can explain something. It is curious that he should say that there was a fall unique to the UK market given that we do not have capital controls, thanks to a move that I am sure he supported. Surely foreigners would have been buying our shares if they were such tremendous value, and there would not have been such a fall in the UK market.

Mr. Redwood: The main holders of UK shares at the time the change was made were British people and companies, especially their pension funds. There was bound to be a weight of selling to adjust the market value of those shares which exceeded the appetite from abroad. Hon. Members should remember the background. A fall in the world market took place shortly afterwards, so there was not a great appetite for what foreign companies perceived to be higher-risk overseas shares in a foreign currency at the time when adjustments were made in British portfolios to reflect the diminution in share values.

Chris Huhne indicated dissent.

Mr. Redwood: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman understands the situation. It is obvious that share prices were going to fall. He does not have to believe me; he merely has to look at what happened. What is the explanation for the additional fall of the London market if it is not the Chancellor's tax policies, taking income out of the hands of companies and savers?

Chris Huhne: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Redwood: If the hon. Gentleman really wants to be knocked again, then fine.

Chris Huhne: Clearly, there would be some home currency questions, but the idea that it was one for one is simply absurd. There is no support for that in any literature or in what happened.

Mr. Redwood: The facts are clear: the London market fell rather more than other markets. I gave my sum. If the hon. Gentleman has an alternative sum to explain that decline, I look forward to hearing it in his speech if he catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, and if he has done his homework by then, but he has come here not having done any homework and is just hoping to tell his local papers that he is back doing the normal day job.

Justine Greening: I wonder whether one reason for the fall was the growing uncertainty over the Chancellor's performance and the fact that he will change his mind about policies, such as the inclusion of property in self-invested personal pensions. Increased uncertainty about regulation can only harm our economy.

Mr. Redwood: I am reluctant to disagree with my hon. Friend, but I am not sure that that was a factor when we had the major fall in the stock market. I have set out my views. Perhaps she can set out her views in her contribution.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: On pensions, the Government apparently exhort people to save, in particular for their retirement. Does my right hon. Friend, to whose speech I am listening extremely carefully, believe that withdrawing the dividend tax has helped and encouraged people to save for their future, because that is critical?

Mr. Redwood: I was going on to say that it clearly did not. In fact, it did the opposite. As a result of that, a large number of companies—well intentioned towards their work force—have said, "We can't afford this any more, so we are going to close our funds." In some tragic cases, as we heard recently in the House, funds have folded altogether because a company has gone bust or is unable to make the contribution, and the funds do not have sufficient money to meet the requirements. A new generation of people who are going into work or are in junior positions in industry or commerce no longer have access to a final salary scheme. They are probably saving proportionately less, with the help of their employers, than under the old regime.

Worse still, the regulators and actuaries now say that because those funds are very mature, they should be invested not in equities, but in bonds. They have triggered either a mass exodus out of shares into bonds, or they have persuaded or required funds to buy only bonds and not shares. We now have a huge build-up in bond commitments and a run-down in equity commitments. That has had two unforeseen consequences—I think that they must have been unforeseen; I should not think that the Government wanted them.

The first unforeseen consequence is that corporate Britain is up for sale because equities in Britain appear to be relatively lowly rated compared with equities elsewhere. Many great British companies are successfully bid for from overseas because the natural buyers of shares—the pension funds—are not there to take the values up to levels that overseas buyers would find less attractive. We have seen O_2, P&O, BOC and various others companies sold out, for premium, to overseas buyers because the UK equity market is relatively lowly rated—a direct consequence of the tax raid and the pension fund position. I see Labour Members getting uncomfortable. They obviously do not like corporate Britain being bid for, but they have no other explanation.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I am interested in what the right hon. Gentleman says about the balance between equity markets and bond markets. Surely the biggest blow to equities was given by the collapse of the market following the horrendous speculative piece of adventurism, which in 2001–02 saw £250 billion of UK workers' pension funds wiped off because money had been used in a cavalier fashion, pushing share values through the roof, well beyond any realistic price. As a result of that and the unregulated market, which we created, people have lost their pensions and seen the money pilfered by everyone apart from the brokers who made the money out of the transactions.

Mr. Redwood: The figures show that the tax rate was far more important, but I agree that value was destroyed in global capital markets around 2000. The high-tech sector had been bid up to levels that proved unsustainable. That was particularly true of companies that had little turnover and no prospect of a profit. There was a big blow-off in the United States of America, but a lesser one in the UK because the situation had developed less dramatically. A special factor in the UK led to the collapse in share values in telecoms and high-tech areas, and it goes right back to the door of the Treasury: the Chancellor's decision to target telecoms for another of his stealth taxes that would do no damage. If one takes £21 billion-worth of tax in a single go out of the lead sector—[HON. MEMBERS: "It is not tax."] We are now told that money going from companies involuntarily to the Treasury is not a tax. I do not care what Members wish to call it, but it looks like a tax and it feels like a tax.

Rob Marris: The right hon. Gentleman has just made an extraordinary statement. He used the adverb "involuntarily". The transactions to which he referred were not involuntary; they were bids in a free market by telecoms companies. In retrospect, most people would agree that they over-bid, but they made the bids. It was not a mandatory tax; it was an optional purchase.

Mr. Redwood: It was effectively a mandatory purchase. The companies were bidding for monopoly licences and rights to the airways, and if they had not done so they could not have stayed in that kind of business. Of course they had to pay. If one offers fewer licences than there are companies wishing to buy, one will raise a very large sum. Indeed, I pay full tribute to the Chancellor and his advisers for optimising the take for the taxpayer by the brilliance of the auction that they worked out. It just happened to do enormous damage to our lead sector, and therefore to share prices in companies such as BT and Vodafone, which happened to be the leading investments for pension funds at the time. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) is right that pensioners and future pensioners suffered badly from that, but the Chancellor once again played a prominent role, causing that problem.

We have undervalued companies that are now being subject to aggressive overseas bids, often when we do not have reciprocal rights in overseas markets, and bonds valued on tiny yields, which in turn increase pension fund deficits. That has created a virtuous circle for the Chancellor—take more money out of funds, damage the funds, get them to buy bonds, take the price of bonds up so that the Chancellor can pay for his borrowing more cheaply—and a vicious circle for pensions: get them to buy more bonds, value the bonds pessimistically, increase the deficits, demand they put more money in and pay more bonds. It is not a healthy situation.

I was very pleased to see the well known commentator, Anatole Kaletsky, this week at last putting that into the newspapers, explaining that the regulatory system could be creating a future large-scale crisis in pension funding. Therefore, my serious message to those on the Treasury Bench is: please look at the bonds spiral and the role of the regulators, and see whether there is a way of avoiding a future funding crisis. What if at some future date people decide that bonds are overvalued and yields go from, say, 4 to 5 per cent., which is not an impossible scenario? That would wipe out a quarter of the total value of pension funds. Is it true to say, at those levels, that bonds are risk-free, a safe investment and the right way to match future liabilities, given that the bond has a fixed income and liabilities have a rising price?

Mr. Graham Stuart: Does my right hon. Friend agree that at the end of that series of complex financial transactions, there is a human cost—compounding damage to those who put money aside for security in old age? There may be sniggering on the Labour Benches but there is a clear, logical link between the tax on pensions and the impact on companies and the drive on to bonds. That is why people are no longer saving for their old age and there is the horrifying prospect, about which Labour Members seem to be happy, of 70 per cent. of people in this country being dependent on means-tested benefits by 2050.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good and different powerful point, with which I entirely agree. It is a great worry. The lack of a proper savings culture, which has probably been influenced by all the uncertainty and damage to pension saving, is certainly not helpful.

I hope that those on the Treasury Bench have understood that there is a serious national problem. I put it to them in that spirit; I am not making a party political point. They need to tackle the matter urgently.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Before my right hon. Friend moves on to his next topic in what is proving to be an extremely interesting disquisition on the state of the British economy, may I invite him to underline in clear terms what is now a worrying apartheid between the public sector and the private sector? He has described what many companies have faced as a result of the perverse and iniquitous taxation policy of the Chancellor. Is it not disturbing that the wealth-creating sector has been so savaged, while the Chancellor has been unduly preoccupied with the creation of new jobs in the public sector, which is the sector for which the wealth-creating sector is obliged to pay?

Mr. Redwood: I quite agree and I shall come briefly to that very issue of public sector efficiency and productivity.

In chapter 3 of the report there are measures to meet the productivity challenge. The main issues seem to be addressed in the Chancellor's mind to the private sector, but if one splits the disappointing figures for productivity growth in the past year or two, one sees immediately that productivity growth in areas such as manufacturing has been pretty good—it has had to be, because it is an extremely competitive global world out there—whereas productivity performance in the public sector has been poor to abysmal. The Government think that the figures are so bad that they have decided to call them in for re-examination and re-presentation. That is how serious it is. The figures are beginning to hit them in the headlines so they will need to be recalculated or suppressed.

On the figures that we have had so far from the Government, it appears that productivity in the health service has been falling by 1 per cent. a year against the background of a massive increase in spending, which the Government rather foolishly call investment. There is a lot of investment going into the health service—that is in capital expenditure and it ought to be increasing productivity, but it does not seem to be working. There has also been a lot of increased spending, but much of it appears to be on unnecessary jobs and activities that are not related to front-line actions. That is one of the reasons why there are not more beds, more operations and more treatments. I hope that the Government will therefore regard productivity as especially a public sector challenge and that they will understand that merely presenting Gershon as a nice idea is not sufficient. They have not only to implement Gershon—we hear of stumbling progress; I think that they are a long way from full progress—but to introduce son of Gershon very quickly.

Justine Greening: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Department for Work and Pensions, for example, is to spend £500 million on voluntary and involuntary redundancy schemes over the next two to three years? Does he agree that that is clearly an ineffective way of running a Department?

Mr. Redwood: It is horrifying; what a waste of money. The rate of run-off and natural turnover in public sector employment is very high in most such departments. Surely it is possible for the Government to cut staff numbers in administration and unnecessary activities quite rapidly by ensuring that they do not replace staff and that where genuine vacancies occur for real jobs people are transferred from less important posts. It can be extremely good for morale in a department to have a staff freeze, because it creates promotion opportunities for those who remain. It is certainly better for morale in a department to try to run the change and to gain savings by a staff freeze and by transferring people to jobs that really matter than to embark on mass redundancy programmes. It clearly makes a lot more sense for the taxpayer than would spending the money on voluntary or compulsory redundancies.

The Chancellor understands that productivity also needs to be improved through working away on education. It is wonderful to share the Lobby with him in order to try to secure some reforms to our schooling system, which I hope he will want to take considerably further. It is a slight move in the right direction, but I am impatient to go a lot further and faster, and I always think that we are so much better when we are at our boldest. I would like my party to be much bolder on all those things.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): What about selection?

Mr. Redwood: Yes, selection is very important, which is why I support the view of the Leader of the Opposition that we should select on ability as well as aptitude. We should select across disciplines, as specified in our policy, and we should defend our very good grammar schools, of which people are rightly proud. Many hon. Members are here only because they went to very good grammar schools or direct grant schools, as I did. We are grateful for that opportunity, so we do not wish to pull up the ladder on such proposals.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Tell us more—the hidden agenda on selection is revealed.

Mr. Redwood: The Minister is heckling me, but he clearly has not studied Conservative policy carefully enough. The Leader of the Opposition is keen to preserve all the great grammar schools in this country and in Northern Ireland, as I am. He is keen to introduce sensible selection in our comprehensive system, and effectively to create a grammar school stream at the top of every comprehensive, which is a very good way of raising quality. Indeed, it is the Minister's own policy for certain disciplines, such as modern languages, where he does believe in selection on aptitude, which is another word for ability, as we all know. When I asked the Prime Minister what the difference was between aptitude and ability in modern languages, his answer was notably deficient. I am glad that the Chancellor, in the guise of the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, said that more needed to be done in further education. He said that we need to take skills education much more seriously, and we may find common ground in trying to achieve such improvements.

The Government could make an important contribution to improving our productivity and efficiency if they sorted out a couple of things for which they have prime responsibility. They have been in power for nine years, but we still lack an energy policy. They play an important role in energy, as they need to send the right signals in their tax and market-influencing policies, and they issue planning permission for new power stations. The Chancellor glided over the matter in his speech and in the document, but it is high time that we had an energy policy. If we wish to develop process industry in this country we need better answers on energy availability and price. In the past few weeks, there has been too much reliance on the spot price, which has gone all over the place because of the imperfections of the continental market.

The Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry have both said that the Government intend to push for proper competition inquiries in Europe to try to free the market so that we can achieve access to a good supply of gas and other power at sensible prices. When will the Government persuade their partners to do so, and when are things going to be open? This is an urgent matter—it is no good saying that it may happen next year.

The Government often play a lead role in transport. We have a 21st-century economy and a very good private sector, but we have a mid-20th-century transport system that is in desperate need of more capacity and modernisation—a word that the Government usually like but which they misinterpret. I hope that they will soon come up with a way of increasing transport capacity on both the road and the rail system, and I hope that it will harness private finance. I am not putting in a bid for extra public spending, as a huge amount of money is available for sensibly worked-out road schemes to expand transport capacity. The bipartisan project for the relief road around Birmingham offers a good model, and we need more of those projects. I hope that the Chancellor accepts that if we are to improve the country's economy and productivity we must tackle those road blocks, which hinder the movement of goods and people.

Finally, I would like to raise the issue of regulation. In his Budget statement and in the supporting papers, the Chancellor talked about the need for better regulation. Indeed, at times, he even talks about the need for deregulation. In the past, I have warmly welcomed his conversion and that of the Prime Minister to the view that we are a greatly over-regulated society. I welcome their conversion to the notion that certain regulations are unnecessary—some of them achieve the opposite of what they set out to achieve and other regulations are simply too expensive, given the aims that they set themselves.

We have heard fine words and speeches, and the first of two promised Bills on deregulation has finally been introduced. It is therefore an enormous disappointment that there are two problems with the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill. First, it does not include any provisions on deregulation. With the agreement of all my Conservative colleagues, I have proposed 63 things that we would like to deregulate immediately. Personally, I could cite another 100, and I may persuade my colleagues to back them in due course.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Would my right hon. Friend not like deregulation of European legislation as well?

Mr. Redwood: Of course, I would. There are some European items among the 63 in the agreed party programme, as it is impossible to deregulate in Britain without deregulating matters with which Brussels is involved.

The second big problem with the Bill is the inclusion of an offensive group of clauses that gives Ministers the right to legislate without reference to Parliament. The Bill does not even specify that it has a deregulatory purpose. We were invited to accept a Bill that could re-regulate Britain, taking more of our freedoms away without due process. I hope that Ministers accept that that was a gross error and a huge misjudgment. The country desperately needs proper deregulation, and a Bill is proceeding through Parliament that would allow us to achieve that. We would be delighted if the measure were subject to major amendments and surgery. We would be willing to co-operate if the Government dumped the clauses that give them too much power to legislate by the back door and included in the Bill some genuine deregulation.

John Bercow: My right hon. Friend will probably recall as well as I do that the right hon. Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers) talked about the case for sunset regulation as long ago as 2000, but little has happened since. Given that more than 99 per cent. of businesses in this country employ fewer than 100 people but account for approximately 50 per cent. of the private sector work force and generate two fifths of national output, does he not agree that it is time that the Government looked at, and learned from, the experience of the United States by studying the Regulatory Flexibility Act 1980 and the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act 1996? If they did so, they could learn a great deal.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point, and I agree with him. I would, however, like to go further, as I do not want to deregulate just one sector of trade or commerce, or one size of company. I accept that small companies are badly oppressed by too much regulation, but we could strip out some major regulations for everyone. Earlier this week, the Minister and I debated the regulation of financial services in Committee. I made the point that I agreed with the Government's rhetoric on the system of regulation for the European Union as a whole and the United Kingdom in particular. The Government said that competition was better at regulating than regulators and that greater freedom produced enterprise and flexibility. The Minister said that I did not need to tell him that competition was the best regulator, as the Government understood that intuitively.

I am delighted that we agree about what we wish to do, but the difference between us in our current roles is that the Minister has the power to do something about it, but I do not. Now that we have agreed on the remedy, I urge Ministers who have the power to put it into effect to get on with it. We all know that the country is crying out for less regulation and that far too much regulation comes from Brussels. Treasury Ministers say that they have a unique relationship with their European partners; they have enormous influence and Europe is going their way. They say that they want a less but better regulated Europe. When will those fine words translate into action? Since the Prime Minister last spoke about the need for a deregulated Europe, 2,000 new regulations have been introduced. Why did the United Kingdom sign up to all those regulations? Why did we not use our influence to say no? Why have we signed up to a 72-point action programme for financial services in Europe when the required regulation is either already in place nationally or will be put in place globally? When we know that we need to compete in a global marketplace, is it not much better that regulation is put in place globally, so that we are competing on a level playing field with the Indians, the Chinese and the Americans, as well as with the French and the Germans? There is no need for mezzanine regulation in big global areas such as financial services or some of the other leading globally organised industries. There may be some need for global regulation, and that surely is the level at which Ministers should concentrate their attention.

The Chancellor rightly said that the world is changing extremely rapidly. He rightly drew attention to the growing competitive challenge from India and from China. He may also have mentioned Brazil and Russia. The new large economies are growing very quickly. They are importing a great deal of technology and ideas, and in some cases they are exporting a great deal of capital because they are generating very large surpluses. The pattern of world trading is changing extremely quickly. We must understand that for Britain to have a prosperous future, as she has had a prosperous past, we need to turn our attention much more to countries of the size and pace of change of India and China.

Britain's great advantage in the next 30 or 40 years is that we have a special relationship with India. We have strong ties, a common language for business and political purposes, and quite a lot of common systems as a result of our shared history in the 20th century. We need to turn that to good effect and play the game in the spirit of the recent cricket exchanges, where India won one and we won one. We need to develop that relationship as strongly as we can, because it will help pay the livings of our children and grandchildren in the future.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I have followed the right hon. Gentleman's speech with interest. On the productivity challenge, which I accept, he has not touched on the conundrum of business investment. Companies in the UK are making what some would consider record profits. Interest rates are low. There is a crying need to improve our productivity, even in the private sector, although I take some of the points that the right hon. Gentleman makes about the public sector. How do we overcome that problem?

Mr. Redwood: That is a very good question. I have shortened my remarks because I know that other hon. Members want to speak. The point of my argument about pensions answers the hon. Gentleman's point about investment levels as well. The main reason that British companies are not investing more in plant, equipment and new ideas is that every spare pound they generate is likely to have to go to make good the deficit in their pension funds—deficits that are being exaggerated or made worse by the actuarial advice on and by the method of compensation of the value of assets and liabilities.

If the Chancellor takes the pension fund problem seriously and can find some kind of regulatory amelioration, the hon. Gentleman will find that more of that cash flow will become free for expenditure on improving the real assets of the country and generating more wealth. Similarly, more money will be available for equity investment through the stock exchange. There is not so much equity investment available from British sources through the stock exchange for exactly the same reason—people are told to put their money into bonds, not into new share issues by companies, which could otherwise finance new ideas, new technology and extended ideas for companies.

My concluding point is on the change in the world. According to the European Union's projections, which are a little out of date as they were issued in 2002, the 15 main EU economies, which represented 18 per cent. of world output in 2000, would represent only 10 per cent. of world output by 2050. I think that is a wildly optimistic forecast on the part of the European Union. If one looks at the pace of change, the relative decline of some of the continental economies and their populations, and the enormous success of India, China, Brazil, Russia and the other emerging countries, one realises that there is no way in which the EU 15 will still represent 10 per cent. of world output by 2050.

Mr. Cash: Did my right hon. Friend notice the way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech this afternoon distanced himself from the eurozone, but did not go one step further and say that the Government had made a terrible mistake in committing themselves to the euro, the ERM, the constitution and all that goes with it? For practical purposes, he is prepared to criticise the European Union but not prepared to go that step further and say that we will have nothing to do with that aspect of it.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. An honest Chancellor would have said, "The game is up. I now realise that joining the euro would be quite inappropriate for Britain and we would be much better off getting our regulations into line with the leading countries and power blocs in the world, not regulating at the mezzanine level in the European Union." This is the point. On its own figures the EU will almost halve as a proportion of world output. On more independent figures, it will not do that well. It will fall even more, and we will not be earning our living sufficiently if we hitch our wagon entirely to the European train or bus. We need, instead, to be aware that the life and growth in the world economy will be in America, India, China and the other emerging countries. Our foreign policy should be geared to that, and so should our economic and regulatory policy.

For the information of Labour Members, I have spoken as the Member of Parliament for Wokingham. I have not bound the Front Bench team by what I have said, nor have I bound my economic competitiveness policy committee. We will report, I trust, next summer and it will give me great pleasure then to speak for that. I am not backtracking on anything. I have expressed my views in my capacity as the Member of Parliament for Wokingham, the proudest capacity of all that I hold, and if they in due course are adopted by the committee, I shall be delighted. If the committee's recommendations in due course are adopted by my party leadership, I shall be delighted. I thought Labour Members should know that.

3.16 pm

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). He is right, of course. The world might fall in tomorrow. On present trends, I disagree with him. I shall give him a small example with a statistic that he used towards the end of his speech—the position of the EU 15 in 2050. He had severe doubts whether we would have 10 per cent. of world trade by then. It is difficult to predict, but on current population projections, the population of the 15 in 2050 will be approximately 5 per cent. of the world population. To suggest that as the rich west we would be batting double at 10 per cent. of world trade seems to me to be entirely credible. It may not happen. I hope I am here with the right hon. Gentleman to check. It is true that the world might fall in tomorrow, but I do not think it will. Nor does the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

The OECD last October, five months ago, stated:

"The UK is a leader in the quality of its monetary and fiscal policy frameworks amongst OECD countries."

It continued:

"The framework has played a key role in improving macroeconomic stability relative to both the past and to other OECD countries."

The International Monetary Fund last December commented:

"Macroeconomic stability in the United Kingdom remains remarkable ... This impressive record owes much to good macroeconomic, financial, and structural policies, underpinned by sound policy frameworks".

In its "Audit of Assumptions for Budget 2006", the National Audit Office, at paragraph 67 on page 14 in relation to the underlying growth rate stated:

"Over the four year Rolling Review period since 2002, the rate assumed for underlying or trend growth for the purposes of making the fiscal projections was 2¼ per cent. per year up to the end of 2006."

That is the rate assumed by the Chancellor and the Treasury. The NAO goes on to state that "the assumption was reasonable and cautious".

It continues:

"Looking forward, the Treasury assumption of 2¼ per cent. from 2007 onwards is at the bottom of the range of external estimates ... On this basis, the Treasury assumption currently appears reasonable and cautious".

Of course the world might fall in tomorrow. Past indications, like the stock market, provide only a limited indication of the future, but the indication is that the world—the roof—will not fall in tomorrow.

On borrowing, I share some of the concerns of the right hon. Gentleman, and I have done so for a number of years, as hon. Members know. I shall not recite the figures, but they were far worse under the Labour Government in the mid-1970s and under most of the Conservative Government through the 1980s and 1990s. There is a role for Government borrowing, but the focus should be either counter-cyclical or investment—I use the term "investment" in its commercial sense, and not in its somewhat devalued political sense, where it is used as a substitute for the word "spending".

Table C1 on page 250 of the Red Book lists net investment and public sector net borrowing. In 2003–04, net investment was 1.3 per cent. of GDP and public sector net borrowing was 3.2 per cent. of GDP, so there was less investment than borrowing, which is worrying for me. Similarly, in 2004–05, net investment was 1.8 per cent of GDP and net borrowing was 3.4 per cent. of GDP. The estimate for the financial year that is about to end is net investment of 2.1 per cent. of GDP and public sector net borrowing of 3 per cent. of GDP. The estimate for next year is net investment of 2.2 per cent. of GDP and net borrowing of 2.8 per cent. of GDP. In 2007–08, the estimate is net investment of 2.3 per cent. of GDP and net borrowing of 2.2 per cent of GDP. In 2008–09, the estimate is net investment of 2.3 per cent. of GDP and net borrowing of 1.7 per cent. of GDP. In 2009–10, the estimate is net investment of 2.3 per cent. of GDP and net borrowing of 1.6 per cent. of GDP. In 2010–11, which is as far as the table goes, the estimate is net investment of 2.3 per cent. of GDP and net borrowing of 1.5 per cent. of GDP. I think that that trend is healthy, and I welcome it.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is underpinning his argument with lots of forward-based statistics on debt and borrowing. What would happen to those figures if PFI borrowing were brought into the equation?

Rob Marris: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the exact figures. He has raised the question of PFI borrowing, and I think that in a commercial sense, which I am sure appeals to him, if one were to include PFI borrowing—I agree that we should have the full figures—it would to my mind, although perhaps not to his, be investment, because it goes on schools, hospitals and roads. Given my politics, I would call that investment, although I hasten to say that I do not know whether the Chancellor would include it in table C1.

John Bercow The hon. Gentleman has neatly elided into precisely the topic that I want to cover. Leaving aside both the sustainability and the cost of existing Government borrowing, is it not in any sense a source of concern to him that there is a huge disparity between the vast increases in public spending, for the purpose of which the Chancellor is borrowing so significantly, and the very poor increase in productivity? In the health service, spending has vastly increased, but, for example, the number of clinical episodes has not.

Rob Marris: I refer the hon. Gentleman to box 2.2 on page 22 of "Productivity in the UK 6: Progress and new evidence", which was released with the Chancellor's papers today. I will not detain hon. Members with the figures, but, as I think that he appreciates, it is notoriously difficult to measure productivity in the NHS. Turning to what I take to be his case—he will correct me if I am wrong—he has done himself a disservice. We should all be concerned about public sector productivity, and I am convinced, although he may not be, that the Chancellor and the Government are concerned about that, too. He has done his case a disservice with his comment about the NHS—I made a similar comment to this on the first day of last year's Budget debate. If the average time allocated for a GP to see a patient goes up from eight minutes a patient to 12 minutes a patient, it is a significant decline in productivity, which I wholly welcome, and I suspect that Conservative Members welcome it, too. In a commercial sense, that is one example of declining productivity in the NHS, but I think it fantastic.

Mr. Graham Stuart: One of the problems associated with longer GP times is the time spent using choose-and-book technology, which takes nearly twice as long to use as was originally expected when it actually works. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Prime Minister's policy unit reported in 2004 that it felt that there had been a 20 per cent. drop in NHS productivity. This is the great crisis: in the early '90s, NHS productivity was growing strongly; under this Labour Government—I think that the hon. Gentleman would agree that Ministers should take responsibility for this—productivity has fallen on normal stable measures.

Rob Marris: As I said to the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), I refer the hon. Gentleman to box 2.2 on page 22 of "Productivity in the UK 6: Progress and new evidence", which the hon. Member for Buckingham is avidly reading—the hon. Gentleman will probably seek to intervene on me again. Box 2.2 discusses and points out that it is extraordinarily difficult to measure NHS productivity—the report's authors are much more knowledgeable on public sector productivity than me. I have already said that I believe that the Chancellor and the Government think that public sector productivity is extremely important, but it is very difficult to measure whether an apparent decline in productivity in a particular part of the NHS is desirable in social terms.

John Bercow: The hon. Gentleman's prescience is impressive indeed—he foresaw that I would want to intervene on him again, and he was right to do so. He is an extraordinary parliamentary specimen, because it is commonplace for an hon. Member to refer other hon. Members to statistics that support their case, but it is relatively uncommon for an hon. Member to refer others to statistics that directly contradict it. He knows that in the box to which he has referred the figures show a decline in productivity of between 0.6 and 1.3 per cent. a year between 1995 and 2004, but in the same box the Government complain that the figures

"take no account of quality improvement."

In other words, if the figures support the Chancellor, the Chancellor is content, but if they do not, he tries to rubbish them. Does that concern or preoccupy the hon. Gentleman, because it should?

Rob Marris: I would be concerned, if the hon. Gentleman had not quoted selectively. I shall read out the whole sentence, which I dislike intensely because it starts with a conjunction:

"But these estimates take no account of quality improvement, as the Atkinson Review recommended should be the case."

The hon. Gentleman's implication that the Chancellor has adopted a pick-and-mix approach is not fair. I say to hon. Members in all honesty that I have no idea what the Atkinson review is, but it is presumably about NHS productivity.

Several hon. Members rose—

Rob Marris: I am not foolish enough to take interventions on what it is. Nevertheless, an apparently independent body that is dealing with productivity takes a view that is shared by the Chancellor.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) quoted with approval the increase in productivity rates in the health service in the period before 1997. However, it is a fairly well understood economic principle that when one brings into productive use resources that were unused on the scale that was the case under that Government, they are generally less productive, and therefore average productivity is bound to decline. It is the law of diminishing returns. There is nothing special about having high levels of productivity—that can be achieved by sacking the least marginal resources in any productive enterprise.

Rob Marris: I agree with my hon. Friend, who, as a cost auditor by background, is much more knowledgeable about these matters than I am. As regards what was going on in the NHS in 1997, I was a trade union solicitor working closely with the Unison branch at the main acute hospital in Wolverhampton, as well as the branch at the health authority which became the primary care trust. The hospital was doing what in industrial terms would be called sweating the assets, which was wearing out staff.

Mr. Graham Stuart: In response to the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), in private business it would usually be expected that if one invested more, particularly if one doubled expenditure in an area, one would expect a step change upwards in productivity rather than the opposite.

To try to take a little heat out of the debate, I think that it is generally accepted within the NHS—and even among health Ministers—that productivity is a problem. That is one of the reasons why the record investment that has gone in is not delivering. We can all move forward if we at least accept that there is a serious problem. Whoever is in government in the next five to 10 years, we must all work together in this House to support common-sense steps to increase that productivity.

Rob Marris: I would not agree with using the word "problem" about productivity in the NHS, but I completely agree that it is an issue that a Government of any colour need to address. All that I was saying—I did not want to get bogged down in this—was that it is very difficult to measure productivity in the NHS and that there is a social dimension because it is a public service.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Although this anoraks' debate between my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) is important and enlightening, does he accept that the main thing that my constituents are bothered about is waiting times? When I was first elected to this House in June 2001, the average waiting time for elective surgery was 18 months to two years—now, because of the extra investment that has gone in, it is down to four months.

Rob Marris: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. There is a similar situation in Wolverhampton at the acute hospital, New Cross.

John Bercow rose—

Rob Marris: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I should first say something that I should have said in response to his last intervention, when he kindly talked about my prescience. I thought that he might have acknowledged my prescience in terms of having been able to get as far as box 2.2 on page 22 of this obscure report, which was released only two hours ago.

John Bercow: I am happy to pay due—indeed, elaborate—tribute to the hon. Gentleman for that capability. I do not intend to probe him on the details of the Atkinson review, of which I suspect both of us are pretty ignorant. However, it will be a very sad state of affairs if at the next election the Chancellor is reduced to trudging around the marginal seats of this country in his campaign bus chuntering, in response to any protesting elector, the slogan, "The Atkinson review! The Atkinson review!" I think that in such circumstances he will be thought to be in need of some assistance or treatment. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the central issue—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I am conscious that interventions are getting longer and longer. Many Members are waiting to catch my eye, so I think that that is enough from the hon. Gentleman for the time being.

Rob Marris: I will not be tempted much further down this path save to say that as someone in a marginal seat, I will be more than happy during the next general election to welcome the Chancellor, whoever she or he may be.

Mr. Redwood: Is not the worry about the NHS that there has been such a large build-up in non-medical personnel at the time when all this money has gone in? Would not the investment be proving its worth if the new computer systems and administration systems showed that we could cut the number of administrative staff, where surely his quality objection would not come into play? We have more administrative staff than nurses or doctors, so should not we spend to reduce that burden?

Rob Marris: I suspect that the right hon. Gentleman comes from a more commercial background than I do, but I too come from a business background—I spent the majority of my working life in the private sector. One should not simply rely on a commercial model as regards NHS finances and structures, and I am not suggesting that the right hon. Gentleman takes that view, but it can be illuminating to use it for comparison purposes. Arguably, the NHS was for years unadministered. The statistic that the right hon. Gentleman cites, which is commonly cited by Opposition Members, is one of those that can be extremely misleading in certain hands. For example, in some statistical, taxonomic sense—to use the kind of word that the hon. Member for Buckingham would use—a matron could be counted as an administratrix, to use the proper Latinate originate, or an administrator, in everyday terms. But most people, including, I suspect, the right hon. Gentleman, would not consider a matron—we reintroduced them, of course—to be an administrator or manager when looking at the figures to determine who is front-line and who is not.

Alan Simpson: One example of the difficulty of setting productivity measures in the NHS is to be found in the parallel debate about productivity in health care that is taking place in France at the moment. There, people are arguing that it is productive to reduce bed occupancy rates because their measures of efficiency are to be based on reductions in readmission rates and hospital infection rates. So, to make the system less intensely used is to make it better, in terms of productivity in health care. To use strict numeric terms in regard to volume throughput might therefore miss some of the really critical health issues on which productivity ought now to be measured.

Rob Marris: Absolutely. My hon. Friend makes an important point. It is extremely difficult to measure productivity, particularly in the social or public sectors.

Another measure of productivity—which Opposition Members, especially those on the Conservative Benches, never cite, but which I always have to cite in Budget debates—relates to our work force, and its participation rate of 75 per cent. There is indeed a gap between us and France in terms of output per person-hour. That is true. It is quite a significant gap, although we have halved it in recent years, as the Chancellor pointed out in his Budget speech. However, in terms of output per person of working age, there is almost no gap at all.

Economists have traditionally used output per person-hour as their primary measure of productivity, for understandable reasons; it is an extremely valuable tool for a business that is planning investment, for example. For society, however, it is much more important to look at the output per person of working age, because that tells us not only about relative measures—as productivity per person-hour does—but about the absolute size of the pie to be divided up for public services according to the national wealth. Productivity per person of working age is an extremely important measure, given our labour force participation rate and our achievements so far on skills, about which I shall say more later.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): An even more important measure is the rate of growth of productivity, not just its absolute level. In each of the three terms of this Labour Government so far, the rate of productivity growth has fallen.

Rob Marris: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, because it illustrates the dividing line between his party and mine. Of course the rate of growth in productivity is important. I think that he said that it was the most important measure—he will correct me if I am wrong—but it is not the most important one to me. The most important thing for me is the size of the pie that we can divide up, as equally as possible, in our society. That is to do with the way people live, and their quality of life. To say that the most important measure of productivity is output per person-hour and to point to the slowdown in the rate of its growth are of course important, but that is not the most important thing to me. Those are dry statistics; I want to talk about people and the size of the social pie.

Greg Clark: Far from being dry statistics, these measurements go to the heart of the matter. I am not interested in the pie as it stands at present. I am interested in the future pie, and the growth in our productivity—compared with that of our competitors—determines the size of the pie to be divided up. The fact that the hon. Gentleman is concerned only with the past and the present is a poor comment on his ambitions for our country.

Rob Marris: I did not say that I was just concerned with that issue. This is to do with where my primary concern lies; that is all. Of course I am worried about the future. I also worry about the present more than the hon. Gentleman does, because it is my Government who have to deal with the present. It is his prospective Government who might have to deal with the future, although I hope not for a long time.

We need to bear in mind that, after nine years of this Government, we have 2.4 million more people in work, two thirds of them in the private sector. That is having a huge effect on people's lives. It does not mean that every problem is solved, but it is a major positive for our society that is not oft remarked on by Opposition Members—

John Bercow rose—

Rob Marris: But perhaps the hon. Gentleman is about to do so.

John Bercow: I am very worried about the drift of the hon. Gentleman's speech. He said a few moments ago that it was notoriously difficult to measure productivity in the health service. He then agreed that the rate of growth of such productivity was important, although not necessarily the most important factor. If productivity is difficult to measure, it is difficult to see why he would regard it, and particularly its rate of growth, as so important. May I put it to the hon. Gentleman that the advances in medical science are such that there will always be a new queue whenever there is a new cure? That increases, rather than diminishes, the importance of productivity growth, as we must ensure that we get maximum value for money for the finite resources that will be available.

Rob Marris: This will be my last word on this issue and I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not give way further on health service productivity. The hon. Gentleman says that there will always be a queue. With the advent of statins, there is no longer a queue for heart surgery, but there may be a queue down at the pharmacy for a few extremely important pills. Do we therefore say that heart surgeons are less productive because they are carrying out less surgery? That might be so, but I am not going to continue on the NHS.

We need to focus on the 2.4 million people who are employed, two thirds of them in the private sector, and on the quality of their lives in terms of public services and income, because obviously income, the size of the pie and growth in the pie are important. The relative position of the United Kingdom, a statistic mentioned by the Chancellor—which is not often remarked on, and perhaps not at all today—was that this country's gross national income per capita when we came into Government was seventh in the G7 group of advanced industrial countries. We are now second out of seven. That is not to say that everything is rosy, but it looks like a darn good trend to me. As far as I am aware, that change is not just because the income of the other five has suddenly been cut, but because it has not increased as much as ours. That is extremely important and, again, is connected with the labour force participation rate. I will give way on this point, before I move on to more micro-matters.

Mr. Graham Stuart: I thank the hon. Gentleman, who has been most generous in giving way. Earlier, he mentioned points about the Labour Government's record that do not often get the praise that they deserve. Will not he accept that when the Labour Government came to power, the UK economy was the most powerful in Europe, it had changed and had already seen significant improvements in the number of jobs? If he could accept that, we could at least view his arguments in a balanced way. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must not have shouting from sedentary positions when a Member is making an intervention.

Rob Marris: I will go so far as to say that some economic indicators, including falling unemployment, were positive on 1 May 1997. However, the suggestion that at that point the United Kingdom was somehow the economic powerhouse of the European Union—or the most powerful economy—would be questioned by 60 million west Germans, and probably 80 million Germans. I stand to be corrected, but many people would agree, without picking any other examples, that the German economy in May 1997 was stronger than ours. Our economy now is stronger than the German economy—because our economy has come up, not because the German economy has come down.

We have been talking about productivity and I very much welcome the statement on page 15 of the Budget 2006 "Budget Notes", dated 22 March, in relation to amendments to research and development tax relief schemes. It is important to companies in the west midlands and, I hope, to all right hon. and hon. Members, to encourage more research and development and consequently, one hopes, investment in our economy. Paragraph 2 states:

"In line with a key recommendation of the Cox review"—

I do not know who Cox was—

"the Government intends to provide additional support to firms with between 250 and 500 employees through R&D tax credits, subject to the outcome of state aid discussions with the European Commission."

That is extremely helpful. In previous years, the Government have gradually extended the scope and amount of R and D tax credits, which has not yet had as positive an effect as one would hope, but it is having a positive effect. R and D is creeping up, I would like it to increase further and that segment of companies with between 250 and 500 employees could be a real driver of that increase. I hope that that helps manufacturing around the country, especially in the west midlands.

To move on to the green agenda, I declare an interest as a member of Greenpeace since, I think, 1975. I have a feeling that I am also a member of Friends of the Earth. I will declare that because I think I am a member, although I am not sure.

I am pleased that the Government introduced, and are sticking with, the climate change levy. I am saddened that the Conservative Opposition seem still to be wobbling about it. In fact, as far as I can tell—perhaps a Conservative Member will elucidate—they seem still to be against it. Despite difficulties in what might be called the fine print, I think that it has had a positive effect.

The right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), the former shadow Chancellor, said in January that the climate change levy had not been a success. That followed his statement in July 2000:

"We regard the climate change levy as an aberration that should never have been brought before Parliament."—[Official Report, 18 July 2000; Vol. 354, c. 322.]

He was very clear about that. I think that he was also very wrong, and I urge the Government to stick with the climate change levy. It is a pity, however, that there has been no change in airport passenger duty. I think that we should continue to push within the European Union for some kind of excise duty and also duty on aviation fuel.

Adam Afriyie: I thought that I had better intervene before the hon. Gentleman stampeded over his own Government's policies. The Government's energy review is currently under way. I am stunned that they have already concluded that the climate change levy should remain, although the review has not been completed.

Rob Marris: The climate change levy is in place and it is accepted by many commentators, although perhaps not by the hon. Gentleman, that it has had a positive effect. There may be individuals, and the hon. Gentleman may be one of them, who think that the positive effect has not been sufficient to outweigh the negatives, but I think that it has had a positive effect and so do my Government. It is possible that the energy review will come up with a better way of achieving the objectives, but for the moment the Government—rightly, in my view—are sticking with the climate change levy, which many of us think has worked.

On green issues, I welcome the creation of the national institute of energy technologies, which will be in partnership with the private sector. According to page 151 of the Red Book, its purpose will be—unfortunately this includes a split infinitive—

"to better leverage the substantial public sector funding of energy research".

I think that that is very good.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is 10 years too late.

Rob Marris: Well, we are doing it. I would have liked it to be done earlier. I wish that Governments of all political colours had taken energy issues a little more seriously, particularly the issue of so-called alternative energy sources. However, we are doing it, and that is the mark of a Government who are listening and prepared to act.

Mr. Graham Stuart: The Government set clear targets. They accepted targets under Kyoto, although it is questionable whether the country will meet those minimal targets. No commentator thinks that there is any chance that the country will meet the target of a 20 per cent. reduction in 1990 levels of carbon dioxide. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the small—if, in environmental terms, arguably positive—role played by the climate change levy should not be used to excuse the Government's failure to lead a major campaign on energy efficiency, to listen to the various reports of the Environmental Audit Committee and others over the years, and to transform the country's performance? If this is the biggest issue facing the world today, why have the Government failed so completely, and why do Friends of the Earth say that today's Budget statement will do nothing to tackle the challenges that we face?

Rob Marris: Every little helps, which is why the Chancellor has announced what I hope is an initial fund of £50 million for microgeneration. That is how it works with energy: every little bit helps, whether people are driving fewer miles and cycling more, whether we have microgeneration, or whether we have a few more windmills. Hon. Members need to grasp that we are talking about a whole mosaic of measures. Any one measure will not sort everything out; we need an array of measures. That is what the Government are providing and what the Budget has provided.

Investment in energy efficiency for buildings, both business buildings and homes, is part of that array of measures. We have buildings—this applies, I have to say, to parts of this building—that are leaking energy all the time. Lights are left on, and there is insufficient insulation. We as a society need to invest in energy efficiency in the public sector, in the private sector and in our own homes. We are starting to do so and yes, I wish that we had done more earlier, but one has to have priorities in government and they were sorting out schools and the NHS, economic growth and so on. We have done pretty well on those and now we are moving on to energy matters.

Mr. Graham Stuart rose—

Rob Marris: I will not give way because I must make some progress; I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me.

One area where the Chancellor has made some progress in this Budget, although not nearly enough, is vehicle excise duty. There is a new band for vehicles emitting more than 225 g per kilometre of carbon dioxide, the duty for which will be £210. As I say, that is not nearly enough. In, for example, two to three years time, we should introduce a swingeing regime for such vehicles, although I stress that it ought to apply only to newly purchased ones. At one end of the spectrum is the Toyota Prius, which produces 104 g of CO_2 per kilometre. At the other is the Lamborghini Diablo, which produces 520 g. A Ferrari 575 Superamerica produces 499 g. I am not an expert on cars, but I suspect that the Ferrari carries only two people. A Toyota Prius carries five people and a Toyota Aygo, which produces 109 g of CO_2 per kilometre, carries at least four and may even carry five, although I do not know whether it has five seatbelts. One of the Maseratis produces, I think, 525 g of CO_2 per kilometre. We should have swingeing taxes on such vehicles.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I hate to disillusion the hon. Gentleman, but someone who can afford a Lamborghini Diablo is unlikely to be put off by the rate of duty, whatever it may be. People in rural areas who use four-wheel drive vehicles will be hit by this new band, particularly struggling farmers. Under the proposal, they will pay more even though many such people are on very low incomes. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Chancellor needs to look at providing extra relief, so that those for whom the use of four-wheel drive vehicles is essential—I am not talking about non-essential use—are not penalised?

Rob Marris: I am not an expert on rural areas—it may not surprise the hon. Gentleman to learn that in my constituency, periodically there are a maximum of 35 sheep on one very small part-time farm—but so far as I am aware, those for whom the use of 4x4s is essential, such as farmers, purchase red diesel, which is written off for tax purposes as a business expense. The Chancellor may be considering such a rural adjustment—I would not rule it out—but it is not a reason to back off from swingeing increases. I think that the hon. Gentleman broadly supports the direction of travel, to use the modern vernacular, of the swingeing increases that I am proposing.

Richard Younger-Ross indicated assent.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman said that such a rate of duty would not bother the owner of a Lamborghini Diablo, but it depends how swingeing it is. I am not seriously suggesting that it should be, say, £80,000 if the car in question is rated above 500 g. However, a duty of £1,000 to £2,000 would affect the resale value of some of these vehicles—perhaps not very fancy sports cars such as Ferraris—and that might influence people when they consider purchasing them. A Range Rover 4.4 V8—which is made in the west midlands by Ford, of course—produces 389 g of CO_2 per kilometre. That is a ridiculous figure. I suspect that few farmers use a Range Rover 4.4 V8 for anything other than taking their daughter to the gymkhana. Instead of introducing a rate of £210, the Chancellor should have opted for a considerably higher one.

I was going to discuss globalisation, but I shall leave that to others as I have detained the House for long enough.

Alan Simpson: I welcome the points that my hon. Friend is making about vehicles that are far more efficient in terms of reduced carbon emissions, but does he recognise that Britain also needs to play catch-up with other parts of Europe? France and Italy have already developed prototypes of vehicles that run on compressed air, which are capable of doing more than 100 miles to the tank and more than 100 km per hour. Does he agree that there needs to be a paradigm shift in how we think about low-impact transport? A punitive approach to what happens now is not enough—we need to be proactive in transforming our thinking about making lighter the footprint that our transport needs leave on the planet.

Rob Marris: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, but the Chancellor cannot use VED directly to introduce compressed-air cars, or whatever. What he can do is use R and D tax credits to that end, as I have mentioned. The UK is a world leader in automotive design, and although British-owned companies may not be great at building cars, our car industry is very big.

I think that Formula 1 lies at the rather silly end of the spectrum but, although it uses a lot fuel, it also produces a lot of technological development. I hope that some British companies are developing techniques involving stuff like compressed air, hybrid engines and hydrogen. That is going on in other parts of the world and I hope that the R and D tax credits will help.

In conclusion, the Government have been in power for nine years, during which time we have moved to what many people recognise is a more Scandinavian model of society. Britain is now more generous and tolerant than it used to be. True, people pay higher taxes for better public services, but I, for one, believe that that is a jolly good thing. The pot is not limitless and taxes cannot go on rising forever, but the increase in employment means that more people now pay tax—even though, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor pointed out, tax credits and other provisions mean that some do not pay the full net amount.

Today's announcement of free national off-peak bus travel for pensioners was slipped in near the end of the Budget speech and is a fantastic measure. It will improve the quality of people's lives, which should be one of the purposes of any Budget. A huge amount of new money is to go into education, and I was especially pleased with what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said about further education, although I wish that we could do more to fund adult courses for those who have gone beyond level 2. I know that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary takes a special interest in FE, but the Budget will make a difference in all the matters that we talk about—education, skills and giving every child a chance. It is designed for the future and as a way to help the young people who will look after us in our old age.

I salute what the Chancellor has done today, especially in respect of people-centred policies and education and skills.

3.57 pm

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): It is a truism in Treasury circles that it is very difficult to work out at first hearing the true shape of a Budget, but this Budget is more difficult than most. With this Chancellor, of course, one has to wade through the glutinous self-congratulation with which he always surrounds himself before one can work out what he has actually done.

One thing is already clear—that the expenditure that he has announced is enormous, and that borrowings will be vast. Over the next few days, the provenance of that borrowing and how the money will be raised will be the subject of much scrutiny. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) mentioned PFI schemes, and said that any such approach in the hospital and NHS sector would be an investment. I do not agree: the original idea behind PFI was created some years ago by the previous Conservative Government to bring the skills of the private sector into investment. This Government have lost the thread in respect of PFIs, and instead use such schemes purely for the purposes of off-balance sheet accounting.

One of the first things that one learns in the Treasury is that it does not distinguish between capital and income. A lot of work remains to be done before we know exactly where this Budget will lead us. However, I believe that this Chancellor has done three things right—he has not joined the euro, he has created the Monetary Policy Committee to control interest and inflation rates, and for a couple of years he followed the guidelines set out by the former Chancellor, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke).

The announcement that the Chancellor made today about giving some measure of independence to the Office for National Statistics may need to be added to the list of the three things that he has done right. In future years, I may well admit that he has done four things right. However, I maintain that he has done everything else wrong. How can that be? He has done it wrong because he is a socialist, his basic philosophy is flawed and he cannot resist social engineering. He does not understand business at all.

Does that matter? I will tell hon. Members a short story. I saw a cartoon once that showed two Egyptians in the desert looking at an architectural drawing of a pyramid. One Egyptian was saying to the other, "I know it may exactly agree with the plans, but I've got a funny feeling that there's something wrong with it somehow." What is wrong is that the pyramid is standing on its apex—it is upside down. We can think of the whole of the top of that upside-down pyramid—that huge structure—as being the non-productive parts of the economy. Those parts may be very valuable, and the people may be nice people doing useful jobs, but they are not productive. I am talking about all pensioners, all children, the armed forces, the civil service, Members of Parliament—all non-productive. At the apex—the tiny triangle at the very bottom of the pyramid—are the people who are actually producing for this country. Those are the areas in the private sector. The private sector should be cherished. It is crucial, unique and essential. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer and the present Government do not understand the need to cherish the private sector.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he just said that the armed forces and the civil service, per se, are not productive? Will he confirm that the business community said for years that the one thing that it wanted more than anything else was a stable environment in which to do business? Is it not true that this Government have created the most stable year-on-year environment almost in the history of our economy?

Peter Viggers: I will not allow the Minister to put me in the position of criticising the armed forces.

David Taylor: You started it.

Peter Viggers: Absolutely not. I yield to no one in my admiration for the armed forces, in which I have served, unlike most members of the Government. The fact is that the armed forces are not producing an extra benefit—they are not creating wealth for this country. All the people who are serving with great courage in Iraq and elsewhere are not producing wealth for the country. That is the critical point.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am listening very carefully to the hon. Gentleman. Is he really saying that if a part of the economy is not productive, it does not make any contribution? I have to totally disagree with him in terms of the armed forces. Surely by trying to protect the security situation in different parts of the world, they are helping the economy not just of this country, but of the parts of the world in which they are serving?

Peter Viggers: My point—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will try to drive me away from it, but I will not let that happen—is that it is the private sector that enhances the wealth of this country, which other sectors do not do. One simply cannot say that service sectors, or those working for the Government, are enhancing and increasing public wealth.

Several hon. Members rose—

Peter Viggers: I will not give way again, because the point is quite clear. Some Members may not like it, but the fact is that the private sector enhances the wealth of the nation, which other parts of the economy do not do in the same way. This Government and this Chancellor of the Exchequer have done the opposite of cherishing the private sector. That is not surprising, I suppose: they are an array of barristers, lecturers, social workers, research assistants, charity workers and a Marxist lecturer, who, of course, is at defence. They have all been dependent on the state and the public sector all their lives.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: He just insulted charity workers.

Peter Viggers: Dependency is the key to this Government's—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must not have these comments from a sedentary position, which do not contribute to the debate at all.

Peter Viggers: Labour Members may not like the points that I am making, but they are true. The Conservatives recognise the unique significance of the private sector, whereas the Government are united in the belief that socialism and the public sector can solve every problem.

Rob Marris: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Peter Viggers: No, I will not give way.

Under this Government, regulation and controls have increased. The size of the public sector has increased dramatically and many of my constituents point out that the advertisements for public sector jobs are offensive—including obesity advisers and five-a-day co-ordinators. The jobs section of The Guardian paints a very sad picture of the way in which public money is being spent, not all of it wisely.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify his remarks? Does he value in any way the contribution that public services make to the well-being of our society and the strength of our economy? He attacked a range of people and said that we were a collection of charity workers, as though working for a charity is making a negative contribution to society. Whom does he value in our society?

Peter Viggers: I understand why the Minister is trying to blow me off the point, but the fact remains that there is a complete difference between those who do not enhance the wealth of the country and those who do. That does not mean that those in the non-wealth producing sector are less valuable as individuals. Of course they are not. To say so would be to talk down ourselves, nurses, doctors, the armed forces and teachers, all of whom are among the most worthy people in our community, but they are not the wealth-creating members of it. The Minister and his colleagues are proving my point and demonstrating that they do not accept that there is a special virtue in the wealth-creating part of the economy. I shall move on.

Under this Government, the tax burden, excluding North sea oil revenues, will be 37.6 per cent. of GDP this year, 37.8 per cent. next year and 38.1 per cent. the following year, which will be the highest rate ever for taxation. Yes, there were 83 per cent. income tax rates under previous Labour Governments, but that does not mean that the rate of taxation overall then was higher than the rate of taxation now. We are being taxed on taxed income. The Cardiff Business School says that as a result a basic rate taxpayer is paying £48.50 per £100 of income in tax and a higher rate taxpayer is paying £57.10 per £100 of income. Each individual receives an income, on which he pays income tax and national insurance. With the net amount of his taxed income, he then pays sales taxes, VAT, fuel duty and excise duties. Out of his taxed income, he also has to pay fixed charges such as the council tax and television licence. Eventually, if he prospers sufficiently, his next of kin will pay inheritance tax of 40 per cent. on his estate. We are taxed on taxed income, and that is why the tax rates are so high.

High tax rates bring their own problems. We have heard reference to the Chancellor's impost on pension funds, and I have declared an interest in relation to pension funds. He taxed pension funds some £5 billion a year—I expect that he would maintain that it is £3 billion net—in his first Budget in 1997, and that has led indirectly, and together with other factors, such as increased longevity and the weakness of the stock exchange, to the closure of final salary schemes and the crisis in the pensions industry. The Chancellor caused – or, at least, contributed to—that problem.

Similarly, the increased taxes of £6 billion on North sea oil will, in due course, lead to higher prices at the petrol pump. During evidence to the Treasury Committee, the Chancellor denied that his duty on North sea oil will have the direct result of higher prices at the petrol pump, but it is true. His taxation of pension funds has affected pensions, and his taxation of North sea oil will affect petrol prices. The Chancellor does not actually believe that his increased taxation will have an impact on petrol prices at the pump or on pensions; he does not realise the implications of his actions.

The Chancellor is guilty not only of high taxation, but also of fiddling—he loves fiddling with people's lives. The tax credit system, which is much vaunted by the Labour Government, has done enormous damage, as well as good. The Government do not realise that although a family in modest circumstances will be grateful for a tax credit of £500 or £1,000, if the Government try to take back that amount it causes a major crisis in the family. The benefit of giving families money is far outweighed by the damage done when the Government try to recover it.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Is my hon. Friend aware that due to the failure to implement the tax credit system, some of my constituents had to rely on handouts of food parcels from citizens advice bureau staff—[Interruption.] Labour Members say that is not true. If the Minister would like to visit my constituency, I will introduce him to the CAB staff who were carrying food parcels in the backs of their cars as a direct result of the Government's failure to implement the system—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have this. If the Minister wants to intervene, he must stand at the Dispatch Box and intervene in the normal way. We must not have continued comments from a sedentary position.

Peter Viggers: I am not surprised that the Government do not like what I am saying.

It is quite difficult to obtain statistics about tax credits and of course statistics have a tendency to go both ways. The Treasury Committee has been carrying out an inquiry into tax credits.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Peter Viggers: Not at the moment.

At a Sure Start centre in my constituency, I talked to the 20 young mothers who were there. I asked how many of them had had some dealings with the tax credit system and all 20 put up their hand. Then I asked how many of them had had a problem with tax credits and 14 put up their hand. The Minister finds that amusing, but 14 of the 20 said that they had had problems with tax credits. In discussion, it became clear that my suspicion was true: the damage done when money is clawed back from families on modest incomes—

Edward Miliband: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Peter Viggers: I shall certainly not give way to the hon. Gentleman, who has only just entered the Chamber.

The damage done by clawing back money is far greater than the benefit that was originally given. The Government simply do not understand the strain and difficulty that that causes.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Peter Viggers: No, I want to move on to the Budget judgment—the hand on the tiller. What is the Chancellor's judgment, as seen in the Budget?

The Chancellor should be judged not by his own assessment but by the assessment of others. I have looked at assessments made by the International Monetary Fund, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the European Commission of the current state of the UK economy. Paragraph 14 of the European Commission's assessment, on 22 February—before the Budget of course—states that it would be appropriate for United Kingdom to "ensure that the deficit is brought below 3% of GDP by 2006/07 at the latest in a credible and sustainable manner".

Paragraph 9 warns:

"Given existing policy commitments, reducing the expenditure to GDP ratio implies significantly slower current expenditure growth, probably particularly marked in some areas."

The European Commission is warning that it will be difficult for the UK Government to return within the 3 per cent. limit. The Chancellor has done the opposite in his Budget. He appears to have decided to spend and to borrow—the very opposite of what the European Commission recommended.

To refer again to the European Commission document, paragraph 7 says of the UK economy:

"The primary balance, estimated as a deficit of 1 per cent. of GDP in 2005/06, returns to balance in 2008/09 and reaches a surplus of ½ per cent. of GDP by 2010/11. The improvement in the nominal balance is mainly driven by a pick-up of revenues, partly due to the projected cyclical recovery of the economy".

That refers to an absolutely classical economist's J-turn. The European Commission is saying that the situation in the United Kingdom will get a little worse, but it will get better—a typical J-curve.

The Chancellor, having been warned that he will come very close to the 3 per cent. limit—in fact, he is over it in certain ways—has taken the opposite view and decided to expand expenditure. He recognises that there are problems, but he has decided to trade his way out of them. It is certain that there will be curbs on expenditure, of which we heard nothing in the Budget, and that there will be higher taxation, which is inevitable, and that that will lead to lower productivity.

Under this Government, we have already fallen from fourth to 13th in the authoritative world productivity table produced by the World Economic Forum. We cannot afford to lose out in the productivity table; we need to consider the competition. Let us look just at China. In China, 26 cities are installing underground railways. China wants to build 50,000 miles of three-lane highway in five years—that is the same size as the American highway network, which took 40 years to build—and it is building 30 nuclear power stations. The competition is ferocious; we should be facing up to it—instead, with this Chancellor, we have more tinkering, more micro-management, more promises and more taxation: more of the same, and it will not help.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I clearly welcome much of what the Chancellor has said today about investment in public services and the development of a stable economic growth path. The Chancellor set the scene by referring to the economy's fundamentals and the balance between borrowing and taxation, which has been often mentioned in the debate so far, and competitiveness and elements of equity in the distribution of resources in the economy. I am grateful to him for that, because it was an excellent way to set up the debate for the next few days.

There are important factors to take into account in describing Britain in 2006 and in the economic policies that the Government must address. I want to set the scene somewhat differently by describing other elements in the equation that depict life in Britain today and that need to be addressed. I suggest that the 2006 Budget must place as much priority on addressing those issues as on those identified by the Chancellor in his macro-economic display today.

The Chancellor set his scene by describing Britain as viewed from the Treasury, the Bank of England, the City and, in my opinion, slightly too much as viewed from the CBI conference hall, but I want to describe Britain as we see it on the streets and in our communities—indeed, the Britain that virtually every Member of Parliament witnesses in their weekly advice surgeries and in the daily volume of their correspondence. Those are the institutions and people whom we meet, and those are the issues and the challenges that we face as MPs in our constituencies.

I regret that the Budget did not contain some measures that I would have welcomed today, as they have been debated for a considerable time not only in the Labour party, in particular, but across the country. I should like to outline some of those measures, and perhaps we can enter into a discussion in the coming months about how we can address them. I congratulate the Chancellor on the undoubted progress that has been made in lifting the poorest pensioners out of poverty, but we must bear in mind the fact that, first, pensioner incomes remain relatively low, with annual assaults, particularly from energy and fuel charges, on those limited incomes. The basic state pension stands at only 15.6 per cent. of the average wage at the moment.

Secondly, the Chancellor's strategy has increased the proportion of pensioners on means-tested benefits to just over 50 per cent, but each year £1 billion is unclaimed. I accept what my hon. Friends have said, and I have been working with the Pension Service in my constituency to try to ensure that benefits are claimed. I pay tribute to the Pension Service for its work on the ground. I also pay tribute to the support it has had from the Public and Commercial Services Union. Advice has been given and there has been co-operation with the union, and the service has worked with the union towards flexible working on the ground.

The Budget does not address restoring the link with earnings, which was recommended in the Turner report. Pensioners thus will still fail to share automatically in the growth and wealth of the country and the benefits of the Chancellor's policies on economic stability and growth. My straightforward recommendation is that we raise the basic state pension to the guaranteed credit level and restore the link with earnings. Unlike other hon. Members, I do not have a calculator that runs to trillions, but House of Commons Library figures suggest that my recommendation would cost £7.3 billion, which would be a fairly minimal sum to lift a large number of pensioners out of poverty and enable them to share the future wealth of the country.

Rob Marris: Is my hon. Friend aware that, according to the Department for Work and Pensions, pension tax relief has almost no effect on people's savings for pensions because they would save anyway. Almost all the tax relief goes to the wealthiest in our society, and it represents £18 billion a year of forgone tax revenue, which might go some way towards paying the £7.3 billion for his modest proposal.

John McDonnell: I am dealing with expenditure at the moment, but I will talk about the income needed to resolve these matters in due course. It has become an annual event that we prepare an alternative Budget on behalf of Labour representation in the socialist Campaign group and the left economic advisory panel, which is our shadow form of the Bank of England advisory committee. I want to outline several proposals that the Government might wish to consider in due course. The Government took up a number of the issues that we raised in previous alternative Budgets.

Rob Marris: We have a listening Government.

John McDonnell: A listening Government, but they are perhaps not as attentive as possible.

Mr. Newmark: I would like to lend the hon. Gentleman my support, as would members of the Braintree pensioners action group. It is important that we re-establish the link between pensions and earnings. What is the hon. Gentleman's view on abolishing means-testing completely, which the Chancellor promised back in 1993?

John McDonnell: There has been a long debate about means-testing over the past 60 years. Any Government will have to ration resources in some way. The best book to read on the matter was produced by Enoch Powell in the 1960s. It addressed health and welfare benefit reform. The language of Bevan is about socialism and the language of priorities, and Enoch Powell demonstrated in his own terms that there will always be a need for any Government to have some form of means-testing, but our job in a civilised society is to try to minimise it. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support, but given his past calculations I am wary of his mathematical ability on such matters.

Individual Members of Parliament must address elderly care. The main worry for many pensioners, apart from their income, is what will happen to them if they need care. They fear losing their homes to pay for such care, and the problem has been graphically highlighted by recent television programmes. In addition to restoring the link with earnings, the Government should thus consider abolishing all care charges, which, according to House of Commons Library figures, would cost £4 billion. That would give pensioners security in the future, but we should go further and consider again the high prescription charges that are levelled against pensioners and others. Abolishing prescription charges would cost the relatively minimal amount of £0.42 billion.

Rob Marris: That is £420 million.

John McDonnell: Yes. I did not mean to confuse my hon. Friend, who is attentive on all such matters.

At the other end of the age spectrum, we must also applaud the impact of the Chancellor's policies on reducing child poverty. However, we need to acknowledge that the Government have missed their target of taking a quarter of all children out of child poverty. They have managed to do that for 17 per cent. of children, but we have missed our target on the time scale that we set. That is not to carp. To get this far is a major achievement. However, we have missed our target by 250,000, and those children remain in poverty.

The definition of poverty is extremely limited. Many children living on the margins of what is defined as poverty do not enjoy the lifestyle that we would want for our own children. That is just an aside; I accept that we need commonly agreed mechanisms by which we measure poverty, but we also have to accept that the definition sets a relatively low target.

There is also the problem of non take-up of means-tested tax credits, high marginal tax rates and disincentives to work, which are associated with all means tests. We have debated that. It is why I propose a simple solution to tackle the failure to meet the full 25 per cent. target. A £5 increase a week on child benefit would cost £3.4 billion. According to Treasury figures, it would initially lift 350,000 children out of poverty.

For young people, my continuing concern is that introducing tuition fees and scrapping maintenance grants has depressed a generation with the prospect of starting adult life with high levels of debt. Tuition fees also serve as a disincentive to study, and I worry about the drop-out rates from some of our colleges and universities, which in some instances has reached 25 per cent. For that reason, we need dramatic and radical action to restore confidence among our young people in staying on, especially young people from working-class backgrounds. Hence I propose wiping out all student debt at a cost of £8 billion and scrapping tuition fees at a cost of £2.25 billion, wiping the slate clean of an overhang from past policy mistakes.

Despite all the Government's successes in investing on a large scale in public services, there has been a failure to recognise the significance of the impact of poor housing and lack of housing on the poverty and quality of life of many of our constituents. When I was elected in 1997, 40,000 families were homeless in London. There are now 50,000. A large number of my constituents suffer from terrible overcrowding and insecure accommodation, and they are living in abysmal housing conditions.

David Taylor: It is a real pleasure to hear the second shadow Chancellor outline the Budget that we may hear in years to come.

On housing, does my hon. Friend agree that two things would have been welcomed had they been announced today? The first is the restoration to local authorities of the power to build or acquire affordable housing. The second is to fund properly an option 4, which would allow local authorities that were good landlords to have their tenants stay with them, rather than being coerced away into stock transfers, PFIs and other dubious vehicles.

John McDonnell: I shall move on to that proposed solution in due course. However, I think that all hon. Members consider housing to be a critical issue that the Government need to address. Poor housing conditions, overcrowding and homelessness impact on all aspects of the lives of our constituents. They impact on their health, the educational abilities of their children and their overall environment.

Recent Government statistics show that more than 100,000 families live in temporary accommodation, and the figure has doubled since 1996; 2.4 million of our homes are below the decent homes standard; 1.5 million people are on council housing lists; and 2 million households containing pensioners, children or someone with a long-term sickness or disability live in fuel poverty. Society overall, not just the Government, should be ashamed of those statistics.

Mr. Newmark: Does the hon. Gentleman think that part of the problem with homelessness, particularly in many of our cities, relates to mental health care and that many homeless people have mental health problems? Surely we should be investing much more in mental health care so that we can treat those who are homeless and have mental health problems.

John McDonnell: Mental health care issues clearly impact on homelessness. I have some involvement in dealing with those matters in my constituency. I compliment the Government, because for the first time in a long time we have had significant investment in mental health care in my area. The hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) and I have opened new units in our constituencies. However, the key issue is not mental health but housing supply, repair and renovation. Unless we have a significant housing programme, we will not be able to tackle such matters, and they will have an impact—whether on mental health, families in poverty or children trying to get a decent education.

In response to a recent parliamentary question, the Minister for Housing and Planning said that it would cost £7 billion to bring all local authority homes up to the Government's decency standard. That would represent one of the best and wisest investments that the Government could make in tackling the housing nightmare that so many of our constituents daily face.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer today announced a new housing programme, which I welcome, but I have to say that it is not on a scale that will tackle the size of the need or the desperation. I urge hon. Members to examine the Shelter housing programme, which sets out the targets that the Government should be meeting year on year to tackle the plight in which many of our constituents find themselves.

To return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), success in delivery of housing improvements and building programmes can be achieved only if the Government work in partnership with local authorities, adopt the Labour party conference option 4 policy, end the discrimination against local authorities and invest directly in a large-scale council house building programme. I can find no other vehicle that could undertake the scale of investment and delivery that we need in this housing crisis.

Finally, on the expenditure side of my Budget equation, I suggest that the Government acknowledge the £800 million deficit that the NHS is facing. My primary care trust is facing a deficit of £30 million, which is unmanageable. No matter how good the management, we will not be able to tackle that in the next 12 months. It is clear from my experience that that has arisen from the rigidity and dominance of the national target setting approach to service improvement, which has undermined local management and local decision making. Therefore, central Government need to review not only local management but the central Government role. In addition, we need to recognise that the £800 million gap is not bridgeable in one year. My proposal would be to write it off and to allow the PCTs to start again in partnership with central Government.

The sum total of those Budget proposals is about £35.37 billion, give or take the odd £100 million. I mention that because my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) intervened on me last year to see whether the addition was correct—I hope it was.

Turning briefly to how we should raise the revenue to fund this programme, I welcome today's statements by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we will start looking at tax avoidance. I regret that in the merger of the Inland Revenue and Customs we lost 3,000 staff, but I compliment the new department's work on corporate tax avoidance. Let us consider the proposal made by the Tax Justice Network. Corporate tax avoidance on a scale of £9.2 billion could be tackled, and could reap an income to be invested in the future of public services and in reducing poverty.

I am delighted that a number of years ago the Chancellor introduced windfall taxes to tackle obscene profits in certain sectors of the economy. I urge him to revisit that policy and look at two particular proposals. First, a windfall tax could be imposed on the bonuses given before Christmas to many people who work in the City. We have heard that the stock market is having a difficult year, but national account data show that output in the financial sector has recently increased by 5 per cent. year on year. It is just shy of the 5.3 per cent. that is the highest recorded increase since the 1990 boom under the Lamont chancellorship. The bonus pool for investment bankers is estimated to be £7.5 billion, and some of those profits were distributed before Christmas on a scale not previously seen. Indeed, it is believed that 3,000 mangers could receive a £1 million handout. A windfall tax on 50 per cent. of a City bonus is therefore justified, and would bring in £3.75 billion.

Secondly, we must look at banks and oil, and we could impose a windfall tax on the incredible profits that energy companies have reaped recently. BP, for instance, had a profit of £11 billion or 25 per cent; Shell, 30 per cent.; and Centrica, 11 per cent. Of the banks, Barclays had a profit of £5.28 billion or 15 per cent.; Lloyds TSB, 10 per cent.; and the Royal Bank of Scotland, 21 per cent. The Chancellor has introduced windfall taxes before, and he should do so again on the same scale. The level of profits that triggered the previous windfall tax has been exceeded by those companies, and a new windfall tax could bring in £6.10 billion.

David Taylor: In his list of areas of the economy where unjustified profits have been made, will my hon. Friend consider including companies such as Laing, which is the midwife to many private finance initiative projects? Ten days or so ago, it announced that its so-called PFI investment quintupled in a relatively short period and that its profits had increased by 43 per cent. The income stream that it received from those projects was twice the base rate, so it is no wonder that 60 acute NHS trusts, to which he has referred, have commitments to PFI payments that exceed 10 per cent. of their revenue. Does he not agree that that is only going to get worse?

John McDonnell: I regret that the Chancellor appears to have launched a new PFI initiative.

David Taylor: It will cost £26 million.

John McDonnell: That is a significant roll-out of PFI. In the past, PFI schemes have wasted resources, and companies have been guilty of exploitation. In many cases, they did not deliver the goods or provide the public services required. We all have experience of such projects in our constituencies. In my own constituency, a new PFI school was imposed on us. Every year, the school has a deficit that it must make up. Jarvis was the PFI contractor, so when it was threatened with bankruptcy we had to set up a telephone tree in case we had to occupy the school to prevent the company from removing goods. In addition, kids in the local community cannot afford most of the sports facilities provided at the school via Jarvis, so the facilities stand idle.

Alan Simpson: Does my hon. Friend accept that his constituency was not alone in being saddled with problems after projects were administered by Jarvis? Will he confirm that in the year when the company's share price has collapsed it paid its executives a bonus of £807,000, which appears to be a reward for failure?

John McDonnell: There are numerous examples. I refer hon. Members to the work of Alison Pollock and to the publications by Unison in recent months, which contain example after example in the public services, health and education where PFI has been used to exploit the public purse, has failed to deliver and has delivered large bonuses and profits to individual company directors. That is why I regret that the Chancellor is going along that line. I would welcome a Government inquiry into PFI, which would probably echo the work done by the Public Accounts Committee on individual PFI schemes, which has demonstrated their lack of deliverability and cost effectiveness.

To balance our books, I refer to what was Labour party policy—that we should reduce our defence expenditure to European Union average levels. That would bring in £6.3 billion. In line with my views, which are shared by a large number of colleagues, withdrawal from Afghanistan and Iraq would produce £1.3 billion.

On income tax, we must consider the restoration of higher income tax levels for those earning more than £60,000, graded up to £100,000 and above. Figures produced by the House of Commons and recommendations from the left economic advisory panel suggest that we could have an income tax take of an additional £11.2 billion.

Overall, that would provide us with an expenditure of £35.37 billion and an income of £37.85 billion. Some of that expenditure would be one-off. The gap between one-off expenditure and ongoing income is about £9 billion. I refer to the proposals made by others to build on the Chancellor's message today that we need a huge investment in an environmental programme to ensure sustainability and tackle climate change.

I regret that today we have not made progress on aviation tax. I accept that there are constraints arising from international agreements, but, as we have demonstrated in previous debates in the House, that does not prevent us from moving on with regard to UK fuel duty and it does not prevent us from increasing passenger duty. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) has ingenious ideas for controlling emissions through levies on emissions at particular airports. That is one way in which we can increase duties overall, which will enable us to launch a comprehensive programme to investigate wind power, solar power, marine power, renewables, biofuels and waste minimisation. It will also provide a significant injection of cash for investment in our public transport system.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred today to the need to control public sector pay. I wish as much attention was paid to the private sector, especially the City. If attention is to be paid to public sector pay, let us consider some of the levels of pay that public servants receive, which raise the issue of poverty pay. Let me give some examples. For an administrative assistant in the Department for Work and Pensions, the starting salary, which many people are on because there is high turnover, is £11,750. In the Department for International Development, it is £10,947. When we increased the minimum wage last time, we discovered that some of our own staff were on the minimum wage. In the Ministry of Defence the starting salary for an administrative assistant is £11,220.

Many of those jobs are based in London. I do not know how people survive on such salaries in city areas. If we are to look into public sector pay, it should not just be in terms of restraint. We need to develop Government policies for coherence in national negotiations and tackle low pay. We must recognise that many of those people are dedicated public servants, without whom we would not be able to deliver our policies or the Budget.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): I remind the House of the business interests that I have declared in the register.

I hope that the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) will forgive me if I do not respond in detail to the alternative Budget that he has presented. He was honest enough to attach prices to some of his programmes, although I am afraid that my calculator overheated, so I shall leave it to the Economic Secretary to respond in detail. However, I shall make one point: he has said that he is against privatisation, but if he looks at table C4 in the Red Book, he will see that the spending programme that the Chancellor is currently planning depends on some £35 billion of privatisation—£7 billion a year over the next five years.

David Taylor: Those are asset sales.

Mr. Fallon: The hon. Gentleman calls them asset sales, but taxes are called "charges" for the same reason. The programme involves privatisation, and Qinetiq was the first of it. I wonder whether the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington will go through the Lobby in due course in favour of it.

John McDonnell: There are a series of proposals in today's Budget that are asset sales, and I expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce individual pieces of legislation on them. If the hon. Gentleman checks the record on issues such as the sale of air traffic control, he will find that I have opposed each privatisation.

Mr. Fallon: I do not doubt that, and I was half implying that I expect to see the hon. Gentleman rebel again. I do not know what he would call the proposed sale of Scottish Water—is it an asset sale or is it a privatisation? If it looks like a privatisation and it sounds like a privatisation, it almost certainly will be a privatisation.

Before turning to the Budget judgment itself, it is worth reminding hon. Members about parts of the fiscal process since last year's Budget that the Chancellor did not mention today. In the middle of the existing financial year, the Chancellor rushed to the Treasury Committee to change the economic cycle's starting date. He then fiddled the end date of the cycle, and he also started to correct some of his mistakes in the pre-Budget report.

The Committee had already warned the Chancellor that because of earlier misjudgments, he was likely to have to put up taxes, increase borrowing or reduce spending. As hon. Members know, he did all three of those things in December: he put up taxes quite significantly, especially on North sea oil; he increased his borrowing forecast; and he cut spending by reducing the original envelope that he had sketched out for the comprehensive spending review 2007.

Today's Budget was largely set by the pre-Budget report. Those who follow our proceedings may be puzzled by how the pre-Budget report has evolved into the Budget itself—today seems to be a tidying-up exercise with an awful lot of flannel in between. Today's course had already been set, which is a shame, because the Chancellor could have done very much more.

As other Conservative Members have said, the taxation system is far too complex, too burdensome and increasingly unfair. The Chancellor could have taken the opportunity today to introduce serious proposals on simplification, to make cuts rather than increasing taxes and to introduce measures to make taxation fairer. There is much more to be done on simplification than the minuscule target of reducing the administrative burden imposed by Revenue and Customs by 10 per cent. over five years. For example, although I admit that the figures show that the administrative cost of processing taxes is higher in Holland than it is here, the Dutch are cutting that burden by 20 per cent. over four years.

Much could be done on matters such as simplifying statutory sick pay for companies and company car schemes, and there is a range of such measures that are simply an unnecessary burden on our businesses. Instead, the Chancellor has continued to make life more complicated for business and to increase the burden, although I was hoping that he would decrease it.

I have heard nothing today about the plight of council tax payers, who are shouldering an increasing share of the cost of local services. When the Government entered office, council tax payers had to shoulder some 25 per cent. of the cost of local services, but the figure is now well over 35 per cent. Year after year, council tax payers must bail out the inefficiencies of central Government.

On income tax, the effect of fiscal drag means that people of quite moderate means, many of whom are inside the public services that the Economic Secretary has defended so eloquently, have been dragged into the higher rate of tax. Some of those people are in the front line of public service, such as senior police inspectors and senior hospital nurses, who would never have dreamed of being described as "the rich". They have been dragged into the higher rate of tax by the Chancellor's failure to index allowances. It is perfectly possible for a Chancellor to choose not to index allowances to suit any one year's particular fiscal judgment. However, the cumulative effect of refusing to do so is that more than 1 million people, many of whom are on relatively low incomes, are being dragged into the higher tax bracket.

[Mr. Fallon]

Business is paying more tax. Although, as the Chancellor reminded us, there have been welcome reductions in corporation tax, business is paying an increasing burden elsewhere. The key point about business taxes is that they are not stealth taxes—they are highly visible to business, and business is extremely mobile. I fear that white-collar jobs will follow blue-collar jobs out of this country overseas. The level and complexity of business taxation needs constant vigilance. We cannot stand still as other countries improve their competitiveness and the attractiveness of their tax regimes. I hope that the Chancellor will use his new all-star global advisory board to set himself a target of improving our competitive tax position. I have no magic bullet to offer him.

It is a mistake for people to think that the 15—not 10—years of economic growth that we have enjoyed were triggered by any single reform. They are not underpinned by any single employment Act, change in industrial tribunals, or change in tax rates, but by a raft of economic liberalisation and supply-side reforms that took place much earlier, in the mid-'80s. Because our competitive disadvantage is now slipping away, the Chancellor and the Government urgently need to look again at the supply side to ensure that our climate for business is as competitive as it should be. Instead, the Chancellor merely said that he would continue discussions on the rate of business tax and continue to review the level of national insurance against the level of taxation, and we are to have yet another report on business regulation. After nine years of the effects of this Government, the time for discussions, reviews and reports is surely over. It is time to do something serious about the situation.

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): Does my hon. Friend find it intensely depressing that the mood among Labour Members is not to take account of his remarks but instead to call for a windfall tax on some of our most successful businesses, and that profits are cited but the tax that those companies pay to the Exchequer is not? Does he agree that a windfall tax at this stage would drive many of our most successful companies overseas?

Mr. Fallon: As my hon. Friend probably knows, I am easily depressed when listening to speeches by Labour Members, but even more so today by those who do not understand that the companies whose profits they want to windfall tax—our major banks and oil companies—are world-class British companies bringing home to this country very substantial amounts of revenue as well as providing an important part of our financial and scientific base.

I turn to borrowing. Only this Chancellor could consider £35 billion of borrowing to be a small amount. Only this Chancellor could consider missing his revenue targets five years in a row as somehow irrelevant. That is serious, because the trend is now clear. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition so swiftly totted up this afternoon, the total amount of borrowing in prospect is some £175 billion. That is additional debt that must not only be repaid in due course but serviced by this generation.

The Chancellor has again been over-optimistic in his Budget judgment in regard to the amount of revenue that he is likely to get in, and he will end up depending—as many Chancellors have done—on indeterminates such as an attack on excise duty fraud or the latest initiative on tax avoidance. Those measures are all very worth while, and exactly the sort of thing that the Treasury should be doing, but their yield is always unproven and uncertain. I wish I were as sanguine as the Chancellor about the growth rate for the economy as a whole. To me, the high street still looks a pretty miserable place.

In urging the Chancellor to improve his forecasting record, I would like him to admit of a little humility, and perhaps allow a little more transparency in order to allow others—academics and external experts—more access to the Treasury forecasting model. I understand the difficulties involving confidentiality regarding individual and corporate taxpayers' details, but as the Chancellor and the Treasury have got their revenue forecasts so badly wrong year after year, I believe that we need an external eye to look at the matter. These processes need more external validation. I live in hope. I was roundly abused by the Chancellor in the Treasury Committee for daring to question the integrity and independence of the Office for National Statistics. Six months later, he announced that he was taking urgent measures to enhance the integrity and independence of the ONS. There is no reason why the Treasury's revenue forecasting model should not be opened up to a little more external scrutiny in the same way.

Finally, I turn to spending. The Chancellor has postponed the spending review by a year, in order to turn it into a fully comprehensive spending review in which every stone is turned and every detail examined. So I was quite struck by the way in which he pre-empted it today. He identified a whole series of Departments that will have no increase at all, then announced that the Department for Education and Skills would receive the lion's share of the increase. We welcome those additional resources, but, as several of my hon. Friends have pointed out, it has been this Chancellor's biggest single failure that he has not secured the reform that needs to accompany them.

Anyone who questions that judgment needs to come down to my constituency of Sevenoaks, where another 20 beds have been taken out of commission at Sevenoaks hospital because the primary care trust has run into deficit. They should come and talk to Kent police, whose so far successful investigation into the Tonbridge robbery has been distracted by the Government's ill-thought-out proposal to merge them with the Surrey and Sussex forces, which was finally postponed only yesterday. They should also come and meet the district and county councillors who want to deliver public services but who are now at loggerheads, wondering what the future bureaucratic structure to be inflicted on them will bring.

None of this bureaucratic tinkering with NHS trusts, ambulance trusts, strategic health authorities, police authorities and district councils will directly benefit patients, victims of crime or council tax payers. On the contrary, all that we can be sure of is that this top-down, bureaucratic, Whitehall-driven reform will impose extra cost and distract those local services from doing the job of servicing their local community.

Edward Miliband: I know what a well-informed expert on these economic matters the hon. Gentleman is, sitting as he has done on the Treasury Committee for a number of years. On the subject of depressing speeches, however, I am surprised at some of the things that he has said. Will he not concede that the extra investment that the Government have put in—such as the increase in investment in schools that the Chancellor mentioned today—has made a difference in his own constituency?

Mr. Fallon: Yes, I certainly concede that, and I welcome the extra spending on education—as a former Education Minister, I could do no less.

As I was saying, I get depressed listening to some Labour Members' speeches, and to quite a lot of the Chancellor's speech. Of course we welcome elements of public spending, and I particularly welcome the reform to channel more and more education spending outside local councils direct to schools. As someone who initiated local management of schools for all primary schools in this country, I welcome the increase in the direct grant to the head teachers concerned. The overall judgment needs to be questioned, however, and that it the Opposition's job.

Before I gave way, I was discussing the failure to secure real reform to match some of the welcome increases in public expenditure. We heard no more today about the necessary reform to public sector pensions. We hear that discussions continue behind the scenes with the different trade unions, driven through different Departments of State. But we heard no announcement today about how the balance will be redressed between current and future members of public sector pension schemes, and between those who benefit from public sector pension schemes, as we do in the House, and those who have to rely on private provision.

We heard little from the Chancellor about the general drive for efficiency savings. There was the odd mention of Gershon, but no substantiation of the savings that we can now expect, and no justification of some of the original targets. The Treasury Committee will look for much harder evidence that those efficiency savings can be captured, quantified and delivered in the shape of more efficient public services. We heard little today about more local empowerment. We did not hear about reforming working practices, more local pay, really sorting out the delivery of those services at the sharp end or helping to enfranchise police area commanders, hospital managers and head teachers.

This is the Chancellor's 10th Budget. My real regret is that he appears to have learned nothing from the failures of the previous nine Budgets. Whether or not this Budget will help propel him further into Downing street, I do not know. I do know, however, that the country will continue to be the worse off for the mistakes that he has made and the arrogance with which he refuses to recognise them.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): Budget debates are often conducted within a strange sense of time. The short term is about whether the Budget will survive the press headlines and analysis tomorrow. The medium term is defined as how the Budget will look in a month or a year's time. The long term is the end of this Parliament. Anything beyond that is infinity. The difficulty for our constituents is that they have a different sense of time, of the critical issues that face them today, and of issues that Government and Parliament must address in the years ahead, in their working lives and the lives of their children. Against some of those measures, I want to reflect on some of the matters that were not dealt with in today's Budget.

Sadly, the shortest of short-term considerations—fending off the press and seeing off the Opposition—has almost been dealt with by the Leader of the Opposition. I was astonished by his speech, which was lamentable. It was almost as though he had set out to send himself off. It was an apology for his existence rather than a bid for the intellectual leadership of the nation. In that sense, the challenge to the Chancellor's Budget from the Opposition petered out before it began.

Other challenges are waiting, however, beyond the Opposition Benches and tomorrow's press headlines. Those challenges are what Parliament must do to build a society and economy that will survive sustainably in the decades ahead and that will meet the current challenges and crises facing society. I make no apologies for saying that that is the entire focus of what I hope will be my Budget contribution.

The Tories made some interesting comments. They spoke of a Labour Budget disregarding wealth creation and being indifferent to productivity, and said that those were the cutting edges of the economy that they defended and we ignored. I refer Members to a book that will come out within the next week called "Rich Britain", by Stewart Lansley. It is an analysis of the current state of wealth distribution in the United Kingdom. Among its key observations is that 25 years ago Britain was one of the most equal societies in the developed world, but now we are one of the most unequal. In the years since 1990, the number of people sitting on assets of more than £100 million has increased fivefold. Twenty years ago, the income gap between the chief executive of one of our FTSE 100 companies and the average worker in that company was a factor of 25. Today, the earnings gap has risen to 120. That is the wealth divide that has opened up in our society.

Greg Clark: The Prime Minister famously said that he had no interest in the earnings of David Beckham. Does the hon. Gentleman share the Prime Minister's view?

Alan Simpson: No, I do not, and I think that it is a mistake to presume that earnings in the richest part of society are not a zero sum game. That is one of the great myths that is debunked in the book that I mentioned. It has always been argued that if the superrich are allowed to be superrich, they will somehow engender a dynamic in the economy that will drag everyone else's earnings along with theirs.

David Taylor: Trickle-down.

Alan Simpson: Yes, it is the trickle-down approach to economics, but the figures do not justify the claim.

[Alan Simpson]

Two studies paint a picture of the actual state of affairs. The Institute for Fiscal Studies recently produced a report showing that Britain has one of the lowest rates of innovation compared with our main competitors in the industrial world. We also rank 15th among the 30 richest countries in terms of productivity growth. There is little evidence to suggest that the freeing up of wealth acquisition among the wealthiest is delivering the productivity gains that Members would like to see, or to claim.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the countries that are being innovative and have the most dynamic economies have not adopted the Soviet-type policy that almost underlies his comments, but apply lower taxes? Ireland, for instance, wants to reduce corporation tax. Companies setting up there are now contributing in a major way to Irish tax coffers, and hence to schools and hospitals.

Alan Simpson: Other Members would say that what underpins the dynamism of the southern Ireland economy is the number of subsidies that it has received from the European Union. That is what allows such investment and relocation to take place. In many ways, those subsidies are merely relocation bribes—they are not necessarily about productivity gains. The notion that if taxes on the rich are reduced wealth will flow to society as a whole is pure mythology.

The other study that I wanted to mention was conducted by Manchester university and relates to our thinking about economics and productivity in this country. It reveals that the top company heads in the United Kingdom have enjoyed pay increases that bear no relation to any benchmark or cross-section of productivity measures against which they could be justified. The study refers to a culture of "value skimming" among senior management in UK industries. It says that "top managers in giant firms appear to be an averagely ineffectual officer class who do, however, know how to look after themselves".

They do not create wealth; they simply become incredibly skilful at pocketing it.

Nowhere is such a culture more apparent than in the management of the water industry, a critical issue to which I now turn. Today is world water day, which is an interesting benchmark for the House. No mention was made of it in the Budget. It comes at a time when 12 million households in the UK, mainly in southern England, have been told that they are likely to face hosepipe bans and water restrictions during the summer, and when the UK water industries—the companies responsible for water management—are haemorrhaging 4.7 billion litres into the drains through unrepaired leaks every single day of the year. That is enough water to meet the needs of 14.5 million households. The scale of inefficiency in the management of the water supply is breathtaking and it will certainly be neither welcomed nor understood by any of those who face hosepipe bans and water restrictions.

Despite that crisis, the rate of leakage reduction has fallen in the past five years. However, the rate of self-reward, profits and distributed dividends has risen. Dividend rates in the UK water industry are now four times higher than those of our European counterparts. Last year, executive pay in the water industry increased by 31 per cent.—at a time when leakages were becoming colossal. Now, the industry is asking the country as a whole for some form of restraint in order to manage its way out of the crisis, but such restraint has nothing to do with the rewards that those in the industry pay themselves. We have created a water service delivery culture in which companies are pouring water down the drain, and in which that rate of loss is matched only by the rate at which they pour money into their own pockets.

Richard Younger-Ross: I have a great deal of sympathy with the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. Does he accept that there is an inequality in this regard? In some areas, the price paid by people for so-called improvements to the water supply—improvements that they are not seeing—has risen exponentially. In areas such as the south-west, the water rates and the council tax combined account for more than 25 per cent. of some pensioners' income. That is unsustainable for the poorest in our society—those on fixed incomes and pensions—particularly given that, as the hon. Gentleman says, there are those who are making large profits out of the water industry.

Alan Simpson: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, and Members in all parts of the House who have long campaigned for recognition of the concept of fuel poverty are beginning to understand that water poverty could be no less a threat to the poorest and most vulnerable in our society.

It is obscene to have such a crisis of affordability and access at a time when the levels of self-reward in these privatised industries have gone through the roof. This is indeed almost a national obscenity, so it is indefensible for us, as a Government, not to intervene. We should say, for instance, that water companies can pay no bonuses until they have met the European average for water losses, which is 5 per cent. At present, we are losing almost 25 per cent. of our water supply. Why should we create a market that allows executives to reward themselves, but which cannot deliver a consistent water supply to the public?

David Taylor: My hon. Friend and regional near neighbour paints an accurate picture of water companies' incompetence in tackling water leaks, and of their directors' greed in filling their pockets. Does he agree that such behaviour sometimes tips over into the fraud and dishonesty exhibited by Severn Trent plc, the privatised utility that serves both of our constituencies, which provided fraudulent figures to justify very significant increases in water supply charges? Is not that an appalling thing to do to people in poorer circumstances?

Alan Simpson: I think that it is. As an observation, I want to say that the impetus to attempt to cheat the public and the regulator by providing false information is a direct consequence of the fact that responsibility for ensuring that services are of high quality and that accounting is honest has been pushed away from Government. We now express surprise that pushing that responsibility away to arm's length should have engendered a culture of cheating and dishonesty, but we are reaping the harvest of the mistaken belief that throwing assets out to the private sector would lead to that sector delivering social gain. What has happened, in fact, is that it has delivered social greed.

At the same time, hon. Members are lobbied, in the House and in our constituencies, by people who have been punished not for pursuing policies of greed, but for acting in a responsible manner. I am referring to the 85,000 people who have had their pensions stolen. I spoke earlier about the lack of wisdom of using pensions savings for speculative purposes, but the people who have suffered are the ones who did as successive Governments, of all parties, asked them to do. They put money into pension schemes so that their retirement years would be properly provided for, and we have a moral duty to ensure that that money is paid back. We need people to believe in saving for their pensions, but that has to be underpinned by a cast-iron guarantee that those savings cannot be stolen.

If people choose to cash in their pension savings and subsequently squander the money on speculation, that is their tough luck. However, I believe that it is a criminal offence to cause people to lose out after a lifetime of regular saving into a pension scheme. An offence like that must be redressed in full. How such redress is achieved is, in part, a responsibility for the Chancellor and the Government.

The cost of full repayment is put at £15 billion over 60 years, but the House will soon be asked to make a decision about renewing the Trident nuclear weapons system at a similar cost. I would much prefer the money to be used to redress the difficulties faced by people whose pensions have been nuked rather than to pay for a weapons system that is likely to be used to nuke the lives and prospects of other people.

That choice is the language of priorities. Aneurin Bevan always said that being in government required us to make key decisions of that sort. Restoring the stolen pensions is part of creating the platform of credibility on which we will restore people's belief in the sanctity and security of pensions and pension contributions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) spoke about the need to restore the value of the state pension and its link with earnings. That is another aspect of the matter, and would cost about £7.3 billion. On the figures that I mentioned in relation to the gap in terms of self-rewards among the corporate rich, if we were to have a windfall tax on executive bonuses and profits, that would bring in £3.75 billion a year. If we were to impose a similar tax on executive share options, that would cover the rest of the gap in relation to what is required to restore pensions and their link with earnings.

Mr. Graham Stuart: In a globalised world, which the hon. Gentleman may regret, the high earning individuals to whom he refers will simply go to another financial centre and set up in another country and none of the money will go into our coffers. Surely even he can see that that might be counter-productive.

Alan Simpson: No, I do not think that that is so at all. Let us consider what this country produces. I go back to a point made from the Conservative Benches. If we want to begin with the question of the creation of wealth, it is fair to say that there are a few dynamic entrepreneurs in the UK who have not only invented things to make, but have gone on to produce them. We ought to consider how to reconnect with support for domestic manufacturing. Many of the countries that are far more successful than we are at that are in that position because they have much more interventionist policies in their markets. There is a presumption that it is not enough to talk about inventions if one does not create the domestic circumstances in which those inventions have markets.

That is the point that I want to come to on the climate change challenge. One of the big criticisms that we hear from the parts of the manufacturing industry in the UK that are involved in the development of new technologies and sustainable energy systems is that we should look at what is happening in other parts of Europe. The Governments of those countries have created a market in sustainable energy systems and renewable technologies because they have changed the rules and financial subsidies in relation to those markets. Germany is streets ahead of the UK in doing that. It has captured 15 per cent. of the world market in renewable technologies because its firms have a domestic market in which to sell. In Berlin, 80 per cent. of all new buildings that are going up are generating their own energy. Is that just a foible of Berliners? The answer is no. The market rules about buy-back pricing of electricity were changed so that people get back four times the price for energy they generate in relation to the cost of energy that they take from the system. Of course, that transforms the way in which energy suppliers begin to look at the energy market.

I just happen to have completed my own eco-house, which will generate more energy than it consumes and which puts the surplus back into the national grid, but it is a crap deal. For every £1 of energy that I put into the system, it will cost me £7 to get it back. That is the nature of a rigged market. We can change the nature of that market so that there is less sense of theft and a dash for cash in the present and so that we have a market that genuinely invests to deliver in a sustainable way for the future. The rules are not God-given; they are Government-created. One can create competitive markets, but on a different presumption.

In that sense, when we talk about the need for liberalised markets, I would just point out that, in the UK, in a liberalised market mentality, we are currently paying more for our energy supplies than our European competitors. The best point of comparison is Denmark. In 1970, after the last oil crisis, it looked at the short-term pressures, realised that it needed to come up with long-term solutions and began to invest systematically in decentralised energy systems. It did so knowing what most people in today's UK energy sector know: we have a monumentally inefficient national grid energy supply system. Some 70 per cent. of the energy input is lost in energy production or transmission. In Denmark and the Netherlands, decentralised energy systems, using co-generation techniques of combined heat and power, are 90 to 95 per cent. efficient. Those countries recognised that they could meet their energy needs, and their energy security needs, through decentralised energy systems using the energy that we throw away.

[Alan Simpson]

Why do we not take the opportunity to change the fiscal rules relating to energy markets to allow a paradigm shift, not into the absurdity of a new generation of nuclear power stations or the presumption that we are under some obligation to prop up a grossly inefficient national grid, but in the way we think about energy generation and supply? The Dutch are building roads that incorporate solar power generation so that the energy needs of 400 houses can be met by every new kilometre of motorway. Why are they doing it, but we are not? It is because their Government intervene to structure the market towards renewables rather than short-term consumption or profit generation.

Mr. Vaizey: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman's speech with intense interest and, if I had the opportunity, I would reply to it in detail, not least because Thames Water is planning to build a reservoir in my constituency and because I have had the Thames Valley energy centre round to my home to reduce my emissions. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will put on his website the details of how he created an eco-home. I completely agree with him about fiscal rules. Will he congratulate Braintree council, a Conservative council that has reduced council tax for energy-efficient homes? Does he also agree that the Government could ensure that all new homes meet the highest environmental standards possible? It is in their hands to do that today.

Alan Simpson: The Government could do that and I would encourage them to do so. They could require new homes to meet not only the decent homes standards, but the standards that are being set for other parts of Europe, which are considerably higher than the decent homes standards. Those new standards make our requirements seem like the last generation.

The reality in the UK is that 80 per cent. of the population is likely to live their lives in 80 per cent. of the existing stock. The question is what we do about those who are living in existing housing stock. That position is profoundly affected by other changes. Since 2003, gas prices under British Gas have risen by 80 per cent., and its electricity prices have risen by 38 per cent. The incomes of the fuel poor have risen by nothing like that amount. I am proud of the fact that my Labour Government made the first legally binding undertaking to eradicate fuel poverty in this country. I am proud of the initiatives that have been adopted under the warm homes programme, but the recent burgeoning of oil and gas prices is taking people back into fuel poverty far faster than the programme is lifting them out of it.

By 2003, we had reduced the numbers of households in extreme fuel poverty to some 1 million. We were on track to eliminate fuel poverty in the most vulnerable households by 2010. As matters stand, the figure has risen to 2.7 million and is projected to exceed 3 million by the end of the year. The only way to reverse that is through a step change in intervention in the market, both to reward those who are able to adopt energy conservation measures in their own homes and to require standards to be met by those who wish to lease out properties and those who are building properties that are energy guzzlers, rather than energy generators.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Government could have effected energy efficiency in existing houses at the 80 per cent. to which he referred if they had decided to apply the new part L of the building regulations to house extensions? However, the Red Book confirms that they are not prepared to do that.

Alan Simpson: That is certainly one measure that could have been used, but not the only one. As has been suggested, we could tie such a provision to exemptions or reductions in council tax, to stamp duty or to licensing for rented houses of multiple occupancy, all of which could be conditional on energy efficiency. However, there is a cost involved. We need to be honest about that and take the cost on the chin now, because the cost of not using energy efficiently will be paid in people's lives. That is the real challenge against which this Budget and future Budgets will increasingly be judged. To what extent will we offer more than lip service to making profound, demanding, changes in energy costs or climate change that affect people's lives or their ability to stay alive? All future Budgets will have to be judged against those criteria.

I have a final observation about the experience of building my house. It feels morally uplifting to have done that—

Mr. Vaizey: Put it on your website.

Alan Simpson: The architect and I will have lots of fun doing just that.

One of the things that experience taught me is that there are no individual solutions. My contribution to energy generation would be infinitely more efficient if it could be fed into a decentralised energy system for Nottingham, in which co-generation—the interaction between the energy needs and energy generation of houses, shops and businesses—was part of an integrated whole. We shall achieve that only when fiscal measures make such a shift possible. That is an admission of the limits of the contribution I can claim in lightening the ecological footprint of my existence on the planet. My contribution would be much more significant if my footprint was lightened alongside others and in conjunction with them.

In budgetary terms, we need to look at the management of markets and the management and deployment of fiscal incentives on energy. Recently, we handed out a public, taxpayer subsidy to clear up the £85 billion waste management costs of the last generation of nuclear power stations. Soon, we shall be asked to believe that there will be no similar costs in future for a subsequent generation. I have to say to the Chancellor, his colleagues and colleagues on both sides of the House that the public, taxpayer subsidy for that next round of follies would run off with the budget for all the other interventions that would bring about fundamental change towards a sustainable energy system for the UK in the 21st century.

Mr. Vaizey: The use of that figure in relation to nuclear new-build is extremely disingenuous. That was a historic cost; there is no doubt that the generation and disposal of waste was shockingly bad 30 or 40 years ago, but that would not be the case now. Those who oppose nuclear new-build tend to compare what we could build now with what we built in the past, but in fact that would be the equivalent of buying a 1970s Ford Cortina, whereas nuclear new-build now is the equivalent of buying a Toyota Prius. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Alan Simpson: No, I do not agree; nor does the Sustainable Development Commission or Greenpeace. Those who consider the issue say that, as soon as we start to scrutinise the cost element of what the nuclear industry wants, we are back into the same old game. I remind the House that, when we were there first time, the House and the public were promised atoms for free. We have been paying for that deception ever since, and we would do so again. My caution is that, if we go down that path, all the money that the Chancellor would have to play with for a shift towards renewables and decentralised energy would be hijacked and put into the pockets of the nuclear industry once again. That will not meet our energy security or supply needs.

My final point on energy and the carbon consequences of how we run the economy is to echo the sense of sadness that aviation duties were not mentioned in the Budget. Some colleagues say that those duties are covered by international agreements and that we are pushing forward with the plans for emissions trading, but I would add a word of caution. We need to look carefully at what emissions trading is about. With all other aspects of pollution trading, the real danger is that a market in non-goods is created. Some of the greatest enthusiasts for emissions trading schemes are in the City of London, and they see themselves as making large fortunes out of their brokerage roles in the trade in non-goods.

In aviation, it is far simpler to consider non-tradable duties. It would be very simple to calculate the current carbon miles impact of flights from all UK airports in the past year. We could set that as a quota for them, and we could say that the UK regime will be to reduce every airport's quota by 5 per cent. a year. Airports could specify that priority will be given to higher efficiency aircraft or shorter flights, with higher passenger usage or shorter cargo trips, all of which reduce the carbon content of passenger miles and food miles. We must engage in that scale of shift in the next 10 years if we are remotely likely to manage our way through the climate change that will happen. We can do that if we intervene to set those climate change duties in fiscal terms that define a different shape of aviation market.

All Budgets are really expressions of solidarity, to a greater or lesser extent. They are transfers in society. They represent the extent to which a society will take elements of the wealth generated today by those in work and redistribute it to those out of work. They are transfers from one generation to another in determining how people in work today meet the pension needs of those who are retired and the needs of our children in the future. They are transfers from one region to another and from one section of society to another.

It would be possible for the House, in solidarity, to have a Budget that wrote off the NHS deficit and scrapped prescription charges, which would cost us £1.2 billion. We could do that if, for instance, we transferred the costs of our current military occupation of Iraq and Afghanistan, which currently comes to £1.3 billion a year. It would be possible for us to have a Budget that guaranteed that we delivered the decent homes standard, with a bill of £7 billion, by setting defence spending to the European average. We could change the fiscal rules of the energy markets to create sustainable markets and decentralised energy networks in the way that I have described. We could restore faith in pensions and pension saving by restoring the state pension and repaying stolen pensions with a tax on dividends and executive pay for gross inefficiencies in delivery.

All that would be drawing back the nation's wealth, not from those who have created it, but from those who have been involved in a process of wealth annexation. That, for me, is what Governments of whatever hue will be asked to do if we are to meet the needs of social cohesion and environmental stability in this country in the years and decades ahead. I hope that we have a Labour Chancellor who will not lack the courage to face up to that challenge and deliver those answers, if not in this Budget, in the Budgets ahead, regardless of whether he does so as the Chancellor or whether he aspires to do so as leader of the parliamentary Labour party.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. We now have little more than an hour for the debate. Hon. Members have patiently waited to deliver their speeches, so I hope that the remaining speeches will be brief so that they can all contribute to the debate.

5.40 pm

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): It is a privilege to follow the thoughtful speech made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson). Perhaps I should pay tribute to the Chancellor for his 10th Budget statement because delivering 10 Budgets in a row is not to be sneezed at. His statement seemed very familiar in some ways. Perhaps it is like an ageing rock star taking his greatest hits on tour year after year, albeit with a slightly dwindling audience, at least on the Labour Benches. I pay tribute to the Chancellor for his achievement.

When I started my career in business, I worked for the Boston Consulting Group. A few days after joining the company I was sent to south America to investigate the market for breathing apparatus among fire brigades in the Argentinean pampas—it was a fairly exotic mission. Owing to long flights and delays, I had little time after getting back before I was required to present my report to our client. Just before we were about to do that, the senior partner called me into his office and looked at my report. He jabbed an accusing finger at a number in the document that he chose at random and said, "Greg, how did you come by that figure?" I was required to explain how I derived the calculation and, fortunately, I passed the test because I was able to explain exactly where it had come from. The senior partner was making an important point because if I had not been able to give an explanation, no other figure in my report would have been of any worth whatsoever. If I could not explain every figure, there was no point presenting the report to the client at all.

When I came to the House, I assumed that there was a similar process when the Chancellor of the Exchequer presented figures in his annual Budget to Parliament. I assumed that there was an equivalent of the senior partner who went through the Budget figures. It might have been that the Chancellor himself asked his officials who are in the Box today how the figures were derived. If not, perhaps the Prime Minister had the papers laid out on the Cabinet table and, pointing to a figure, said, "Gordon, how did you get to that number?" Whatever the process, I assumed that if a report on breathing apparatus in Argentina could merit such scrutiny, anything presented to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the annual Budget should merit exactly the same treatment.

I was thus interested when the Chancellor said earlier this afternoon that savings of £6 billion had been secured from the Gershon efficiency review. That is extremely important because any Government have two duties: first, to advance new policies that will reform and change the country in which we live; and, secondly, to manage effectively the public services and administrative activities that are in the remit of the Government. Both duties are equally important, and the Gershon review goes to the heart of the second one. It is absolutely crucial that public services are run effectively and efficiently at the minimum cost to the public, not least because any savings that are made can be reinvested in services, can promote the greater quality of those services, or can be returned to the public through tax cuts. It is thus important that the numbers are right, and the work of the Public Accounts Committee, on which I serve, is very much geared to that end.

However, when the Chancellor announced his £6 billion figure, it called to mind an earlier claim that he had made about Gershon savings. The Committee examined that. The right hon. Gentleman made the same claim in his Budget speech last year when he said:

"I can report—ahead of target—the first £2 billion value-for-money Gershon savings".—[Official Report, 16 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 260.]

The trouble is that having looked into the basis of those savings, the National Audit Office found that they collapsed under scrutiny. The report published in February of this year said:

"we conclude that most of the efficiency"

savings

"announced in March 2005"—

in other words, by the Chancellor in the Budget—

"were not based on clear audit trails and, from our understanding of the process through which the gains were collated, were not subject to adequate challenge by the Office of Government Commerce."

That concerned me, and I was interested to find out what the exact process was that resulted in the savings.

The inquiries that I made shocked me. So disbelieving was I that they could be true that when the Public Accounts Committee examined the Office of Government Commerce and the NAO on its report, I put to John Oughton, who heads the OGC, what I understood the process to be. I said at the Committee's hearing:

"As I understand it, the process of collating this information involved the Treasury ringing round departments asking what savings they could offer up in time to be mentioned in the Budget with no checks at all."

John Oughton said:

"That is an accurate statement of the gains as they were reported in the spring of 2005."

I may have been naive in my illusions about the process, and perhaps I expected the equivalent of my senior partner to be there, jabbing his accusing finger at the numbers, but for the NAO to discover that only half the savings stood up to scrutiny, and for the head of the Office of Government Commerce to be forced to admit that, is shocking.

That is not the only basis for concern about the numbers presented in the Chancellor's speech. Just as my presentation on breathing apparatus in the Argentinean pampas collapsed if one figure was found to be wrong, how can we have confidence in any of the many figures that he presented if the history of their scrutiny shows that they fall away beneath our gaze?

The hearing also raised worrying questions about the substance of the Gershon review. I do not want to make political points about the review as an appropriate subject on which the Government should take a view. I genuinely think that it is extremely important, but the NAO advised us that commercial organisations might expect in an efficiency drive to identify about 10 per cent. of the relevant administrative costs as savings. The Gershon review proposed savings of only 2.5 per cent. I do not quibble with that; I merely compare it with practice in commercial organisations. However, it is important to achieve even that modest level.

Again, when the NAO looked closely at the Gershon review, it discovered that most of the savings accounted for in the £21.5 billion ultimate total from Gershon came from projects that had started before the review was conceived. It is stretching credulity to regard them as being Gershon savings; that is what the NAO found. When I questioned the Comptroller and Auditor General in the PAC on his assessment of the quantity of new money—the real savings that were being made under Gershon—I discovered something even more shocking.

The NAO established a sum of 20 projects under the Gershon review that it looked at in detail. That sample was designed—I asked Sir John Bourn about it directly—to be representative of the whole, as is any sample. Any auditor would choose a sample on that basis, and Sir John confirmed that. Of that sample, the NAO was able to say that, of the ongoing efficiency savings, only between one and three were in any sense new and engaged in subsequent to the commissioning of the Gershon review. On the basis of that sample, 85 per cent. of the funding improvements that the Chancellor presented last year and, indeed, this year as possible do not merit the flourish that he gave them. They were the normal, embedded efficiency savings that Departments were already engaging in. That again gave me great cause for concern.

The final point that I wanted to raise in this Budget debate, since the Chancellor chose to talk about having achieved £6 billion-worth of Gershon efficiency savings, is their reliability and robustness. The Office of Government Commerce helpfully makes an assessment of the deliverability of each of the savings by Department, and ranks them in four categories. Red means that there are grave concerns about deliverability, and green that there are good prospects that the savings will be delivered.

The NAO had access to that information and helpfully reproduced in a series of pie charts in its report how many projects fell into each of the four categories of deliverability. It was drawn to my attention that there seemed to be a misprint in the charts, because there were only three segments to the pie. It was only on looking at the small print to the key to the table that it became apparent that that was so because, as at December 2005, there were no projects in any Department that were rated green as having good prospects of being delivered. Therefore, far from the Chancellor's being able to bank on, boast about and flourish the £21.5 billion-worth of savings in his Budget statements, the truth is that there is extreme risk that they will be delivered. The evidence for that is reported by the Office of Government Commerce itself.

In reviewing the question, the NAO said:

"We have significant concerns over whether the adopted measurement methodologies can be relied upon to substantiate efficiency gains effectively . . . Only a few departments recognise the potential risks from double-counting, cost-shifting and additional operational costs."

Far from being numbers that can be relied on, that are cast iron and that have the imprimatur of the Chancellor, as I assumed if reported in a Budget, they are deeply suspect and so should be treated with the greatest of suspicion.

What is to be done about this? I would have hoped that the Chancellor might exercise the senior partner role and interrogate the figures. He could have taken them to the Prime Minister, who could have asked some searching questions—although the Chancellor might have asked some searching questions of the Prime Minister, so perhaps that conversation was not going to happen. In the presence of such difficulties, who better to certify that the numbers are above board and accurate than the Comptroller and Auditor General—the head of the National Audit Office, Sir John Bourn?

All Members would recognise that Sir John is an unimpeachable figure of great expertise and familiarity with Government figures. Indeed, he has published today an audit of assumptions on the forecasts in the Budget. The Red Book lists at great length the assurances that he has been able to give on factors such as the dating of the cycle, privatisation proceeds, the trend rate of GDP growth, UK claimant unemployment, interest rates, equity prices, VAT receipts and so on. Sir John Bourn rightly signed off those variables as above board and put them into the public domain. What more reasonable request could there be than to ask that he look at and validate Gershon efficiency savings before they are deployed by the Chancellor? I urged the Chancellor to do so at the last Treasury questions, suggesting that there was plenty of time before the Budget to ask Sir John to look at the savings. I raised the matter at a hearing of the Public Accounts Committee, and Sir John told me that he was ready, willing and able to conduct such an audit before the Budget. He said, too, that it would be a good idea to provide that assurance to the House.

The Chancellor cited £6 billion of Gershon savings today. I rang Sir John Bourn this morning to see whether the Chancellor had availed himself of his kind offer. I am afraid that Sir John is probably still waiting by the phone, as his invitation has not been taken up. Once again, the numbers that the Chancellor presented as definitive Gershon savings have not been signed off by the National Audit Office. On previous form, the House must regard them as provisional and treat them with grave suspicion.

5.56 pm

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): Listening to the Chancellor's Budget one would think that he was living in a parallel universe, not the real world. I became an MP last May, and the House will not be surprised that, as a business man turned politician, I will look at the Budget from the perspective of a business man. I draw Members' attention to my list of interests in the Register of Members' Interests.

While it is tempting to undertake a SWOT analysis of the Budget, I would prefer to look at it in a different context. How well prepared is Britain or UK plc to meet the competitive challenges posed by fast-developing countries such as India and China—an issue acknowledged by the Chancellor? Turning first to the economy, I assume that the Chancellor's heading for the 2006 Budget—"A strong and strengthening economy"—is ironic, because the evidence indicates otherwise. After he downgraded his growth forecast twice last year, UK growth was finally estimated to be 1.8 per cent., which is significantly below the growth rates of China, India and the United States. Moreover, we came a poor 19th among 25 EU member states.

In the World Economic Forum league of competitiveness, we dropped from fourth to 13th. Not surprisingly, we face a record trade deficit of £47 million. Businesses are voting with their feet, as they face increasingly inflexible markets, greater regulation and higher taxes. Google and Apple—the businesses of the future—have both chosen to set up their operations in Ireland rather than the UK. Productivity growth is now only 0.4 per cent.—the lowest in more than 15 years. Worse still, public productivity, as we have heard, is falling. Business investment, which fell to 9.1 per cent. of GDP in the last quarter of 2005, is now the lowest since 1965. Overall, the Chancellor is failing on all the long-term drivers of prosperity.

Rob Marris: I am listening with interest to the hon. Gentleman. Of course not all the economic indicators are as positive as we would wish, but I point out to him, first, that as I said in my speech, in gross national income per capita we have gone from seventh out of seven in the G7 to second out of seven. Secondly, on investment in Ireland and so on, I point out to the hon. Gentleman that last year the UK was the top in the world for foreign direct investment. That is encouraging as a reflection of foreigners' views about the UK as a place to do business, where, like the hon. Gentleman, I did business as a business person before I was elected.

Mr. Newmark: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's comments, but the indications are that businesses are voting with their feet. When they have a choice, they are not choosing to come to the United Kingdom. They are choosing to go to Ireland, and we can learn the lessons from Ireland. Because it is now a low tax economy and has a flexible labour market, it is attracting the new businesses. We should take that in hand.

If we are to prepare ourselves to face the competition posed by the Chinas and Indias of the world, we must, as everyone agrees, have a well educated work force able to meet the challenges of the 21st century. I congratulate the Chancellor on dealing with this aspect. The extra 1 per cent. that he has added to the education budget—I believe it is £440 million—is welcomed by the Opposition as well.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's remarks about education and the importance that he attaches to it. I know that he is new to the House, but can he tell me why, on every occasion that the Government have voted extra investment for education, his party has opposed it?

Mr. Newmark: I will answer that briefly. It is because of the use of the word "investment". Our complaint is directed largely at the expenditure on the bureaucracy that lies behind education, not at the infrastructure. The infrastructure is important, and I acknowledge that.

Perhaps the biggest indictment of all is that the number of adults without basic literacy and numeracy is not shrinking, as the Government would have us believe, but is growing by more than 100,000 a year, with almost a third of 16-year-olds still leaving school without achieving 5 A to C passes. We should be supporting our centres of excellence, such as the chemistry department at Sussex university, not abandoning them. We should be encouraging our children to learn languages such as Chinese, for that is where our future lies.

On savings and pensions, as far back as 1995 the Chancellor stated:

"We will never raise the levels of investment in our economy if we do not encourage savings", yet our savings culture has been eroded dramatically since Labour came to power. The savings ratio has almost halved since 1997. Worse still, the Chancellor has continued to undermine our pension system. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) mentioned, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) was kind enough to remind us that

"when Labour came to office we had one of the strongest pension provisions in Europe, and now probably we have some of the weakest."

Why is that? Because the Chancellor has insisted on taxing pension funds to the tune of £5 billion each and every year. That is almost £50 billion since Labour came to power.

Back in 1993 the Chancellor said:

"I want the . . . end of the means test for our elderly people", yet nearly half of all pensioners are subject to means-testing.

In any assessment of our relative economic strength we should look at the state of our public finances. The Chancellor continually spends more than planned, with the result that he has had to fiddle his own fiscal rules not once, but twice since the last Budget just to avoid breaking his own golden rule. Despite moving the goalposts twice, the Chancellor still went into deficit in the fourth quarter of 2005.

Part of the problem lies in the Chancellor's inability simply to budget, which means controlling expenditure, and accurately to predict money coming in and money going out. As Mr. Micawber said:

"Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure nineteen nineteen six, result happiness. Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure twenty pounds ought and six, result misery."

An example of that shortcoming is the Chancellor's varying predictions of the public sector net borrowing requirement. In 2001, he predicted the need to borrow £12 billion in the fiscal year 2005. In 2002, the figure was revised upwards to £19 billion. In 2003, it was revised upwards to £30 billion. In 2004, it was revised upwards to £33 billion. Finally, in 2005, it was revised upwards to £35 billion. Frankly, Mystic Meg would do a better job of forecasting than the Chancellor.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has not been in this House as long as me and therefore did not sit through the first Parliament of this Labour Government, in which the Chancellor consistently underestimated the state of the public finances. [Interruption.] That was another fault, but perhaps he would commend it. I ask him to reflect on public debt as a percentage of GDP, because I should have thought that he would commend the Government's record as being competitive compared with that of most other major nations.

Mr. Newmark: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his foresight, because I am about to address that topic. Perhaps most pernicious of all is the state of Government debt. The Chancellor has continued to hide extra Government debt off balance sheet in order to avoid breaking his own sustainable investment rule. The headline figure used for public sector net debt is £436 billion, which is 35 per cent. of GDP. That headline figure is attractive, but the reality is that each and every year the Chancellor is hiding more and more debt off balance sheet—up to £850 billion at the last count. The real public sector net debt figure could be as high as £1.3 trillion, of which roughly £450 billion is on balance sheet and £850 billion is off balance sheet. That is a staggering 105 per cent. of GDP. For every £1 that the Chancellor is willing to show on balance sheet, he is now hiding £2 off balance sheet.

Back in 1998, the Chancellor promised that he would "enhance economic stability by ensuring that fiscal and debt management policy operate in accordance with the principles of transparency, stability, responsibility, efficiency and fairness."

Although I would not go as far as to call the Chancellor's off-balance-sheet manoeuvrings Enron-style accounting, because they are technically legitimate, that form of accounting is patently not transparent, carries many risks and falls short of the standards required in the private sector. Only four weeks ago, London and Continental Railway's debt of £5 billion had to be reclassified as on balance sheet. Is this just the tip of the iceberg? I suggest that the Chancellor should heed the words of Dr. Johnson:

"whatever you have, spend less."

Rob Marris: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his usual generosity in giving way. He has discussed being in business, and I have discussed being in business: if my business were to sign a 21-year lease at £20,000 a year, we would not show it in our accounts as a contingent liability of £420,000, but that is what he is doing when he adds up all the liabilities that fall due over a long period of time—in particular, pensions—and produces a present-day figure of £1.3 trillion, which is not how it would be done in business. I agree with him about transparency, but I suggest that he is over-egging his case by putting 50 years of liability into one year, which is not helpful.

Mr. Newmark: I beg to differ from the hon. Gentleman, because the calculation depends on the rate used to discount public sector liabilities, particularly pensions. If one uses the long gilt rate—it does not matter whether one uses 1.2 or 1.8 per cent.—one ends up with a very big figure. I have used a discount rate to produce a credible figure, which is not cumulative.

In the 2006 Budget, the Chancellor has once again demonstrated that his forecasts cannot be trusted, his taxes are neither fair nor clear, his regulations are stifling business, his means-testing is placing a greater burden on the neediest in our society, his raid on pensions has undermined a savings and pensions culture that was the envy of Europe, and his accounting methods are disingenuous and opaque at best. This Budget bears all the hallmarks of new Labour. It lacks transparency, does not address the challenges that we face in the 21st century, and does not prepare Britain for the future.

6.10 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): At some points in the debate I thought that the Tardis was about to land in the Chamber, given so many reflections on economic policies that I last heard expressed 15 or 20 years ago. One or two Conservative Members evoked fond memories of the Thatcher years, which I do not remember so enthusiastically. The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) even referred to the disciplines of management consultancy. As a business consumer of management consultancy, I did not find his remarks particularly relevant. Indeed, having consumed offerings from the Boston Consulting Group, I wish that they had passed through the stern audit that he mentioned. Never mind—he has given me an opportunity to reflect on my past.

I look at this Budget primarily from the point of view of my own constituency, which has a much higher than average manufacturing base focused on companies such as Toyota and Rolls-Royce. One of my main concerns is therefore what this Budget does to help businesses of that kind. I welcome the inclusion of Sir John Rose in the Chancellor's taskforce to advise him on the future needs of business, which gives an input into his thinking from the most senior level at Rolls-Royce. I know that he has regular contact with that company in any case, and that he has been associated with the valuable initiatives in promoting enterprise in schools, including in my constituency, to which he referred in his speech. That is an extremely valuable contact.

One of the concerns that manufacturing companies raise with me is the state of the energy marketplace and the implications of higher energy costs, particularly for heavy energy users. I noted what the Chancellor said about action at EU level. I welcome that, but I have to say that we require urgent steps towards free markets. I listened with great enthusiasm to what my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) said about the micro level of the energy sector. It is vital that major businesses in constituencies such as mine can purchase energy at the most competitive rate. The long-term failure to invest in storage infrastructure in this country, together with anti-competitive practices elsewhere in Europe, has not assisted companies in doing that. I look forward to the Chancellor's achievements through his initiatives.

I welcome the examination of the fiscal and regulatory regime that businesses face. That has to be an ongoing process. I have noted the exchanges over the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill. I have a personal view, as a former business man. I welcome a process whereby needless regulations or regulations that are clearly time-limited can be changed rapidly to fit the requirements of the business community, but I also accept that there may be threats to the sovereignty of this place in allowing that to happen in an entirely unregulated way. I would wish the former argument to have the balance in any outcome that we produce through the two Houses in considering the Bill.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Would the hon. Gentleman care to reflect on the fact that, according to Government figures, the number of people employed in manufacturing increased by 200,000 during the last four years of the previous Conservative Government, whereas 1 million manufacturing jobs have been lost since 1997? Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on how that came about?

Mr. Todd: I could indeed do that, although that situation is not reflected in my own constituency's experience. Manufacturing employment has continued to rise in South Derbyshire throughout the period of this Labour Government, which I very much welcome. I tend to dwell more on the strengths that have caused that to happen, which relate partly to inward investment and partly to a focus on investment in high added value manufacturing rather than in manufacturing at the lower end of the value chain. Our experience is that, when we do things extremely well and add a great deal of value to our skills, we tend to succeed, even in manufacturing. However, when we do neither of those things, we tend to struggle. The support for research and development is a key subject for some of the businesses in my area, and I welcome the broadening of the scheme that the Chancellor had already put in place to support R and D.

I naturally welcome—as I would imagine every MP does—the support for schools. My constituency has benefited hugely from capital investment. Opposition Members constantly say, "Of course we welcome certain things." The response that I consistently make is, "Yes, but not at the time they were done." I well remember the debates in 1997 on the windfall tax, the proceeds of which led to the massive investment that has taken place in our school infrastructure over the past nine years. Virtually every school in my area has received substantial capital investment. I particularly welcome the additional sum of money that the Chancellor has correctly made available to heads and governors, so that they can decide on its use. That will increase the flexibility of local schools to respond to their individual circumstances.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): I am interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's observations on education in South Derbyshire. Does he see a link between the record expenditure on education and the fact that between a quarter and a third of children leave primary school at 11 functionally illiterate?

Mr. Todd: The first point to make is that that figure, though regrettable, is a great deal smaller than it was in 1997. Secondly, only by consistently continuing to invest in education will we make that figure as small as possible. We are all realists, and we know that there will always be a proportion of young people who will not be able to achieve the qualifications that we would like them to. The figure to which the hon. Gentleman refers is still too high, but it is about half the size that it was when this Government came to power.

I also welcome the additional support for the further education sector, which I do not think has been mentioned yet—

Rob Marris: I mentioned it.

Mr. Todd: I must have missed that. I was watching the clock during my hon. Friend's lengthy contribution, but I missed that particular element of his speech. Support for the FE sector, which is often relevant to the development of business skills, is particularly important in an area such as mine.

I want to conclude by briefly reflecting on an issue that is relevant to the speech made by the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark), namely the position of the UK economy in the world economy. We have no grounds for being complacent—I do not think that the Chancellor was, and I am certainly not—but we are now better placed than most other western European countries in that regard. That is partly for reasons of history, which I shall touch on briefly, and partly because of what the Government have achieved over the past nine years. The Opposition have naturally drawn out the fact that we have started to see a blip in productivity performance during the past 12 to 18 months, but, before that, an established performance of productivity improvement allowed us to move up the league table, certainly in western Europe, and to keep pace with the USA. I listened with interest to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South, who remarked on productivity performance. The best-performing country in productivity terms is the USA. I am not sure that he was necessarily commending that model to us, but I did not want to intervene on him to ask him to clarify that.

Secondly, we have had the longest period of consistent growth in my lifetime—I do not know about the time of Vansittart and the Napoleonic wars—and, I would imagine, in the lifetime of most other people in this country. Again, that has placed us in a much stronger position in relation to other economies than, say, France, as a comparator.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the major engine of economic growth was the decision in 1992 to leave the exchange rate mechanism, a scheme supported by the great and the good, including the Labour party and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer? Does he agree that that is why the economy has grown over the past nine years?

Mr. Todd: It is certainly entertaining to have 1992 raised when the current Leader of the Opposition was the ghostly figure behind Norman Lamont at that fateful time. I would not have thought that that topic would benefit from further exploration, so I will not venture into it. I will, however, make a European point towards the end of my remarks.

Our level of debt is low by international standards. I take the points about off-balance-sheet figures, which, to be honest, could apply to any nation in the world. If we attempt to use internationally based comparisons, our position is good. Few would dispute that. We have some other advantages, however, to which we need to play firmly over the next few years.

First, we have a reputation of being a liberal country with liberal markets and an emphasis on freedom of movement, freedom of expression and freedom of ability to establish businesses and prosper. My concern is that that is in a world in which protectionism is once again starting to rear its head. I have always been hostile to protectionism, whether in the European Union context—as there are concerning signs of the EU considering and being more sympathetic to protectionist measures than it should—or in the major threats in the World Trade Organisation process of countries stepping back towards protectionism all around the world. We should play to that fundamental advantage with all our strength, as it builds the skills and flexibility on which, as a relatively small nation, we can play well.

Secondly, the English language is a huge unsaid advantage in the global economy. I earned my living in the media industry, in which we play way above our strength as a result of that advantage. We have another considerable strength in the diaspora of our former empire, and many people trade freely with us partly because of the number of those on our shores who come from where they live. We have a large, prosperous and entrepreneurial Indian community. We have a Chinese community, which, again, has strong links.

If we can play to those strengths over the next few years, I think that we will compete more effectively than any other nation in western Europe, and I am sure that we can do so.

6.24 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): It is important to consider Britain's relative economic position, in terms of competitiveness, vis-à-vis the major countries with which we do business. Under this Government, according to the World Economic Forum, we have fallen from 4th to 13th in terms of competitiveness. Productivity in the private, wealth-producing sector of the economy, running at 2.6 per cent. under the last Conservative Government between 1992 and 1997, decreased under the first term of a Labour Government to 2.1 per cent., and today is only at 0.4 per cent.

Savings have also decreased rapidly. Between 1992 and 1997 the savings ratio was 9.7 per cent.; today it stands at just over half that—5.5 per cent. The World Economic Forum rates the United Kingdom 98th out of 117 countries, and says that our low savings ratio puts Britain at a "significant competitive disadvantage". That is obvious: it is the savings of the nation that go towards providing a decent savings system for our pensions and the business investment that we need to create wealth for the future. Business investment is also at an all-time low. At 9.7 per cent., it is at its lowest level since records began in 1965.

Last year British growth was below the G7 average, below the OECD average and, indeed, below the global average. This year, it is actually below trend growth. Then there is taxation, which is important when businesses decide where to locate in the world. As we have heard from Members today, many businesses do have a choice. When the Government came to power, this country had the 10th lowest business taxes in the developed world; we now have the 10th highest. A few days ago, the ITEM Club and the accountants Ernst and Young concluded that, excluding North sea oil revenues, the UK tax burden was higher than it had ever been. I understand that, on the basis of the figures produced by the Chancellor today, by 2010–11 it will be touching some 41 per cent. of gross domestic product.

Why is that important? There is evidence that other countries around the world that have taken a different tack in regard to tax rates have experienced significantly higher levels of economic growth. In Australia, John Howard's Government came into power in 1996, just a year before our present Administration. They promptly set about cutting taxes, and as a result the Australian economy has expanded by a third so far, compared with a quarter in the United Kingdom.

What the Government often miss is the fact that a cut in tax rates will lead to an increase in the total tax take as business activity increases and companies from around the world decide to locate here. Ireland has done the same: it cut taxes on business and now has a higher income per head than the United Kingdom. At the other end of the spectrum, Sweden—which has the highest taxes in Europe and possibly in the world—now has a pre-tax income that would make it the fifth poorest state in the United States, just behind Alabama.

There are important lessons to be learned from our relative global competitive position. If we want a thriving economy, we must secure a decent tax take with which to fund the public services that we all want.

Chris Huhne: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell us whether the figures that he is using have been adjusted for purchasing power parity.

Andrew Selous: In terms of pre-tax incomes, as far as I am aware the Swedish example has been adjusted. I think that there is a significant lesson for us to learn, whether we look at Australia, at Ireland or at Sweden. Overall, the evidence on relative economic advantage is pretty conclusive.

Rob Marris: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Andrew Selous: I will after I have made a little more progress. One or two other Members want to speak.

The borrowing that the Chancellor announced today has been described, quite properly, as deferred taxation. That is exactly what it is, because our constituents will have to pay it back in the years to come. The figures are £37 billion for this year and £175 billion over the next six years. Those are very large sums, equating to £7,000 for every family in the country—a figure that people can relate to slightly more easily. In addition, of course, there is the off-balance-sheet debt, be it from unfunded public sector pensions liabilities, Network Rail or, indeed, private finance initiative and public-private partnership schemes, all of which will bear very heavily on the public purse. I am not arguing that we should not, therefore, have gone ahead with certain PFI and PPP schemes, but we need to be honest and to take into account the impact of the payback costs on the public finances going forward.

This month, the CBI has estimated that the cost of UK regulation on business under this Government is approaching £50 billion. My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) told us that Google and Amazon have recently decided to locate in Ireland, rather than the UK; so has Oracle. At £47 billion, our trade deficit is the largest it has ever been. Our trade deficit with China increased by 20 per cent. during this year alone. I find it completely ridiculous, moreover, that Belgium is exporting more to India than we are, bearing in mind our historical and cultural links with that great country.

The Chancellor talked a lot today about education and he was absolutely right to do so. Business people tell us that one of the issues that they are most concerned about when deciding whether to locate here or elsewhere is this country's skills levels. As far as I am aware, Amazon decided to locate in Ireland in part because its work force has greater language skills than does the UK's. That should be a significant lesson to us. We need to increase language ability in our schools, because we do not do nearly well enough in that regard.

The Opposition welcome the money for our schools announced in today's Budget, but here I return to the issue of literacy and numeracy, which is tremendously important. According to the CBI, employers believe that one in seven adults in the UK is functionally illiterate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree pointed out, according to the National Audit Office the total number of adults in that category is increasing by 100,000 per year. The Department for Education and Skills told us in January that one in three 16-year-old school leavers do not even have five A to C GCSE passes. As a result of all that, we are ranked 33rd in the world in terms of the quality of our state education system. That simply is not good enough for the fifth strongest economy in the world.

What can we do about that? I am delighted that the Government have at long last agreed that synthetic phonics should be the basis for teaching children to read in our schools. Those of us who are familiar with the work of Melanie Phillips know that she argued for synthetic phonics many years ago in her book "All Must Have Prizes". I regret that this issue became a matter for party political debate. I salute the efforts of my own party, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), who has campaigned tirelessly on this issue. I hope that Members in all parts of the House are pleased that we have eventually adopted a position that should lead to an improvement in our children's reading ability.

[Andrew Selous]

On maths teaching and numeracy, I hope that the Government will take note of the many children throughout the country participating in the Kumon maths scheme, in which, I should point out, I have no financial interest whatsoever. There is a Kumon centre in Dunstable, in my constituency, to which many children from both independent and state schools go. A DFES study on this scheme would be useful. However, it is what goes on in schools that is crucial. The money is welcome, but it is hard for children to get the education that they will need in a competitive world when discipline and control are absent.

A lady in my constituency has been a teacher for more than a quarter of a century and she told me about an incident that happened in one of my upper schools only a couple of weeks ago. One class was being disrupted by a pupil and the teacher concerned was unable to handle it. He appealed for help from other staff, but nothing happened for half an hour. That was because the spare member of staff allocated to help in such situations was dealing with an incident in another classroom, where a different child was disrupting a lesson. As a result, the children in the first class to which I referred learned nothing for half an hour. Discipline is fundamental to education. The Government have launched a review into the matter, but some of our schools face very serious difficulties that we need to address.

More funding was announced today for further education, and I welcome that. Further education gives people the second chance that they desperately need and which they did not get at school, but the Government have adopted a very stop-go approach. Dunstable college in my area lost 25 jobs and almost 1,000 student places last year because of a budget cut. Why cannot we have a smooth progression? What is the point of cutting funding one year and increasing it the next? That approach has a very serious impact on the morale of both staff and students.

The Chancellor said that a link would be established between British students and American business schools. I am all for such schools, but why should taxpayers' money be used? The excellent Cranfield business school is near my constituency, and Luton university has very good business courses. I am sure that both institutions would welcome some of that money. No doubt American business schools turn out some excellent graduates, but I question whether taxpayers' money should be used for that purpose.

The same stop-go approach is evident in respect of science. We all know that the science base is essential for this country's future, but science departments up and down the country are being closed because they are so expensive. A couple of weeks ago, I had the privilege of welcoming one of my constituents to the Terrace of the House, where an exhibition of her work was being held. She came to my constituency from Exeter, where the university's chemistry department had been closed because it was so expensive, and she now teaches at the Open university. The same thing is happening all over the country. Why cannot we have a consistent approach? I welcome the money that the Chancellor is giving to science, but science departments around the country should not be closing.

Very little mention of health was made in the Budget speech. That was surprising, as all hon. Members know from their post bags that health is a very serious issue. My PCT is the Bedfordshire Heartlands, which has a deficit of £20 million. The Luton and Dunstable hospital has had to close an elderly care ward, and there is almost no prospect that Leighton Buzzard, the largest town in my constituency, will get any sort of community health facility.

Matters are likely to get worse next year. The managers at my PCT are very good, but they have to operate under such severe constraints, in the form of directives and targets set by the centre, that it is very difficult for them to exercise good financial stewardship.

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): Does my hon. Friend think that there is a contradiction between the Chancellor's emphasis on stability and prudence and the way in which money was showered on the NHS a few years ago? That money was taken out of the service as quickly as it went in, with the result that many hospitals have had to close.

Andrew Selous: My hon. Friend is correct—there is no point in making money available and then taking it back. A smooth transition is the only fair way to treat people working in the NHS.

I come now to pensioners. I agree with the comments made earlier that it is scandalous that the ombudsman's report into the 85,000 people whose pension schemes have collapsed has not been honoured. Some of my constituents worked for Dexion in Hemel Hempstead and so fall into that category. The Chancellor was happy to talk about the unclaimed assets going into youth services. We all support those services, but the 85,000 people who were forced to save for pensions as a condition of employment, and who now find that the money has gone, should have first claim on those funds. It is reprehensible that they do not and I hope that the Paymaster General, who is sitting on the Front Bench listening to the debate, will urge the Chancellor to reconsider the use of those unclaimed assets. As I said, the 85,000 people who have lost their pensions should have first call on them.

What of the £200 payment for pensioners to help with their council tax? We had it last year, but not this year. We will all have constituents who are counting down the number of years that they can stay in their own homes. They run down their savings every year just to pay their council tax. That is simply not acceptable. Had we had a Conservative Government there would have been a halving of the rate of council tax for people over 65, up to a maximum of £500. It is deeply regrettable that the Chancellor has not given that £200 rebate this year and that we have not had a proper reform of council tax, which is long overdue.

I welcome the emphasis on shared ownership in housing. Like synthetic phonics, that is another Conservative idea that the Chancellor is bringing in. In 1995, only 10 per cent. of young people buying their first home needed help from their parents—now 46 per cent. of them do, if they are lucky enough to have parents who are able to help them financially in the first place. Looking at my constituency, we need the right homes in the right places. The Government's approach to the housing needs of London and the south-east is to ram all the housing into five areas around London. Housing should be spread across London and the greater south-east, and across the country as a whole. Two days ago, the Financial Times contained damning evidence about the fact that regional disparities in the UK have got worse. If that situation was slightly better, it would relieve the housing pressures on London and the south-east. The infrastructure for that housing is not there either, which leads to great worries.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): I may forgo a lifetime's obsession with macro-economics and look at some of the micro-economic aspects of the Budget, focusing on the environmental impact. I welcome the fact that the Chancellor has announced that he will index fuel duty in September and that he is indexing the climate change levy, but we have to put that in the context that was admirably spelled out in the Environmental Audit Committee report, "Pre-Budget 2005: Tax, economic analysis, and climate change", which came out yesterday. If we update for today's announcement, figure 6 in that report makes it clear that, on fuel duty, there has been a revalorisation in only two and a half of the past seven years—if we count the current period as a half year. On vehicle excise duty, we are looking at one increase in revenue over the past seven years. On the climate change levy, we are looking at one year out of the past seven years. On air passenger duty, we have had a freeze over all the seven years, with a steady decline in yields.

If we look at the detail of what the Chancellor announced today, we can see, for example, that it is extremely unlikely that we are even going to see an increase in yields from the green taxes overall, given that he admitted that vehicle excise duty, although restructured, would raise less. The restructuring is actually extremely mild. On the increase for those at the top end, in terms of emissions, we are looking at a cost that will be less than the cost of filling a full tank of the average 4x4 gas-guzzler that he says that he is aiming at. The Energy Saving Trust recently came up with research that suggested that, if there is to be a genuine shift in the pattern of car-buying behaviour, there could be a need for a tax at the top end of more like £2,000 a year than £200.

Lest there be any doubt among Treasury Ministers—as there seems to be among Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Ministers—that taxation through the price mechanism has an effect on behaviour, it is worth pointing out an extremely useful article in the latest Fiscal Studies from the Institute for Fiscal Studies, which cites a number of academic research studies, from Finland, Denmark, Sweden, Austria and Belgium, all of which clearly suggest that increased taxes and prices have positive impacts on behaviour when it comes to dealing with climate change. However, the Chancellor's record since 1997 shows a peak in green taxes of 3.6 per cent. of GDP in 1999, but that has fallen steadily so that the latest figure is only 3 per cent. of GDP, or a lower share than in the last year of the Conservative Government. Given the policy announcements today, there is no prospect of a rise either.

The result is clear. The Government constantly remind us that they are set to meet our Kyoto target, but that is an exceptionally complacent spin on the reality, which is that the only reason we are meeting our Kyoto obligations is the felicitous shift from coal-generated electricity to gas-generated electricity, which had a sharp impact on the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions. The Chancellor has included a chart in the Red Book, chart 7.1, which usefully shows that carbon dioxide emissions have risen by 2.9 per cent. since 1997. The Government cannot be confident that they will continue to meet our Kyoto obligations or their target for carbon dioxide emissions unless they take a much more radical view of the need to change behaviour.

The issue is a test of seriousness for the Government and for the Opposition, who are strangely silent whenever anybody mentions the possibility of using the price mechanism or taxation to direct behaviour towards a more sustainable pattern for the future of the planet, our children and our grandchildren. It is a basic economic point that such a change does not necessarily involve any overall increase in taxation. If £10 more is taken in green taxes, it can be handed back to the same people through a reduction in taxes elsewhere, thus leaving incomes unchanged but ensuring that the price incentive bears down on people's behaviour.

I hope that Ministers will consider the policies that they have announced in the context of the longer run since 1997 and see how weak a reed the Chancellor has produced in this Budget. I hope that that spurs them to greater radicalism in dealing with what is, after all, the pre-eminent policy challenge of our time.

Debate adjourned.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

36 Engineer Regiment (Maidstone)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

6.47 pm

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to have this Adjournment debate tonight and I also wish to record my gratitude to the usual channels on the Government side who ensured that I knew that I had to be here somewhat earlier than I might have predicted.

I am raising this matter tonight because it is an extremely grave one for the 36 Engineer Regiment and for the town that I represent. It is an irony that 19 years ago I had to fight exactly the same battle when it was proposed to move the regiment from Invicta barracks in Maidstone to, at that time, Thorney Island. It was a bleak prospect and the town and regiment rebelled. I am pleased to say that we secured a reversal of the policy.

It would seem that yet again we are threatened with the removal of the 36 Engineers from Maidstone. I am sure that the Minister will accept that it is very important that morale is kept as high as possible in an Army that is stretched as badly as it is at the moment. Part of the maintenance of good morale is ensuring that families are happy, especially when the forces have to serve overseas for any length of time.

The 36 Engineers is a sapper regiment, so almost by definition it spends a large amount of time abroad and has one of the highest rates of separation from spouses and families in the entire Army. It is thus essential for recruitment and retention that the soldiers can go away feeling that their wives and families are happily integrated in the local community. In turn, the wives have considerable influence over whether their husbands decide to stay in the Army. It follows that if there is general unhappiness with the serving conditions, the soldiers will not give a particularly happy account to potential recruits.

In Maidstone, the 36 Engineer Regiment is based near the centre of a large town, which offers not only good shops but extremely good schools, including the envied grammar schools, and many opportunities for wives to work. The Gaffney report described the regiment's relationship with the town as "ideal" for a major unit. It is. Super-barracks are no substitute. They would need to be built and maintained, and would be costly. The regiment currently enjoys the freedom of the town, and the citizens of Maidstone and the surrounding areas regard the Army with immense gratitude following its intervention, first, after the 1987 wind storm when we had to clear roads urgently and, secondly, during the floods which, the Minister may recall, devastated parts of my constituency a few years ago.

The Minister appears remarkably unmoved by all that, however. I shall quote from a recent letter from the Secretary of State for Defence. He said:

> "I should tell you that the Army is committed to consolidating its estate into fewer and larger sites. As a result, a singleton site such as Invicta Park Barracks will be kept under review for possible disposal in the longer term. I should stress that no specific time lines have been established for this process but the points you make regarding the presence of 36 Engineer Regiment in the area will be taken into account."

We should look at the context for that proposal to dispose of sites. On 21 July 2004, the then Secretary of State for Defence announced to Parliament what he described as a "radical change" in the future force structure. Since 1997, the trained establishment has actually declined by about 6 per cent. at a time when the reserve has fallen by nearly 68,000, including a fall of 20,000 in the Territorials.

The cuts make no sense at all, given what we require our armed services to do. We should have taken notice of the recent situation when we wanted both to deploy troops in Iraq and to keep them on standby during a firemen's strike. From talking to members of the 36 Engineer Regiment, I know that that placed considerable strain not only on their resources but on the ingenuity necessary to manage both operations.

The cuts should be reversed. We should be making sure that we have a properly manned force rather than a reduced one that is operating with a reduced reserve. In the last 12 months, the outflow from the Army has exceeded the inflow by about 3,500, which led my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) to tell the Prime Minister that as our forces were so overstretched it was hardly the time to cut four battalions from the Army.

Since the last time we went round this course, that proud regiment has fought in both Gulf wars and has been involved in every other conflict. The Secretary of State for Defence has said that there is no specific time scale, but I think that he means by 2012, which is the time to which the Army is operating in considering the creation of super-barracks and the disposal of sites. Of course, 2012 is a mere six years away. The loss of the regiment would be a severe loss to Maidstone. Although I appreciate that this is not the Minister's direct worry and that it is more properly the concern of the Deputy Prime Minister, it would be a very great worry to Maidstone if that site were replaced by development.

Our infrastructure is already extremely pressured. We do not have enough water. We do not have sufficient roads. Our schools and certainly our health services are stretched and, of course, we have to face up to the huge extra developments being foisted on us by the Deputy Prime Minister. If we were also confronted by a major site, such as Invicta barracks, being covered by housing development, it would be a great deal more than Maidstone could stand.

Quite apart from those worries, we want to keep the regiment in Maidstone, as we wanted to do in the late 1980s, when we faced the same threat of removal but for different reasons. We want to keep it because we are proud of it. We are particularly proud of the Gurkhas. We want to keep it, because it makes a major economic contribution to Maidstone and because we believe that we, in turn, provide the Army with a very good background against which troops can go abroad satisfied that their families are fully integrated into the local community. Our schools would be regretful if those children were suddenly to disappear to super-barracks somewhere else.

The creation of vast Army sites is not a substitute for a major unit in close association with the town in which it is stationed. I ask the Minister to think again. It would be very optimistic of me to think that he would give me every reassurance that I have sought tonight, because that is rather unlikely, but I hope nevertheless that he will, at the very minimum, agree to visit the 36 barracks at Invicta and talk to the officers and men and, of course, the Gurkhas who are involved there. I hope that he will also consent to hold conversations with Maidstone borough council about the impact on the town if that Army site is disposed of and the force sent elsewhere.

The 36 Engineers have been associated with Maidstone for more than 60 years—a long association that has been fruitful both for the regiment and, indeed, for the town. I therefore very much hope that some singleton sites will not be disposed of—a few must survive—and I should be grateful to the Government if Invicta barracks were among the few that survive.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on securing this debate and providing me with the opportunity to speak on the issue. I did not know that in the past an attempt was made to close the barracks. I was not advised of that, but it is now received wisdom.

We are now attending to the reorganisation and better definition of our armed forces because previous Administrations did not seize the reality. They did not face up to the harsh choices that had to be made in restructuring the Army overall. I do not necessarily comment on Invicta barracks in saying that, because I do not know the details of what happened at that time, but we are addressing the problems of that legacy. That is not driven by cuts or financial imperatives, but because the Army and the chiefs of staff have determined that there is a better way to organise the armed forces. That is what we laid down both in the future infantry structure and the future Army structure generally.

I pay tribute to the right hon. Lady for the interest and support that she has shown for 36 Engineer Regiment at Invicta Park barracks and, more generally, the Gurkhas, which she mentioned—

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Mr. Ingram: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I take it that my words will still be on the record.

I was congratulating the right hon. Lady on her deep interest. When I asked those who were briefing me how closely engaged she was, I was told that she is a very good friend of the regiment. We value such close engagement of Members of Parliament and their local Ministry of Defence interests, whether they are military or civilian, or, indeed, both. I also know that she has the best interests of the regiment, the Gurkhas and her constituents at heart.

As the right hon. Lady knows, the Royal Engineers has a considerable and noble history. Its construction activities are as relevant today as they have ever been. Recent events have seen Royal Engineers soldiers providing disaster relief and humanitarian assistance to the earthquake victims in Pakistan. A small team of sappers has been involved in bringing fresh water to the villages of Kpalusogu and Koshibu in northern Ghana. I recently visited Ghana to open the second phase of an internationally supported peacekeeping training centre and was briefed on the work done by Royal Engineers personnel in Ghana and the contribution they were making. They were performing a non-military role in one sense, but clearly building on the defence diplomacy that is essential to keep our partners and allies supportive of us.

Such innovation has continued through to the present day, and 36 Engineer Regiment, in particular, should be proud of its contribution. Today, soldiers from 36 Engineer Regiment serve all over the world in Iraq, Afghanistan, Belize, Norway, Gibraltar, Kenya, Brunei, the Balkans, Nepal, Cyprus and Canada, as well as Northern Ireland. I am really grateful for the part that 36 Engineer Regiment played at the beginning of current operations in Iraq and subsequently in two further squadron deployments. The entire regiment was deployed for the initial conflict phase of operations. I pay tribute to the men and women of 36 Engineer Regiment, who truly show what it means to be part of the best trained and most professional Army in the world.

The regiment has developed a significant attachment to its current home, Invicta Park. Its links with Invicta Park stretch back to 1949, when it was stationed there for two years. It moved away for eight years—first to Ripon and then to Osnabruck—only to return in 1959, since when Invicta Park has remained its home. I recognise the importance of the historical connection and the links that have been developed with the local community. I also recognise the need for our soldiers—those brave men and women—to have decent homes. It should be noted that over the past five years we have spent around £2 million on maintenance, upkeep and improvements to Invicta Park.

Contrary to the somewhat unhelpful speculation in the local media, there are no plans to close the Invicta Park site. The right hon. Lady correctly referred to the letter that she received from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that observed that the Army is examining the possibilities for consolidating its estate into fewer and larger sites in line with the Defence Estates strategy of developing and rationalising the MOD's estate holdings. The logic of doing that must be sound. The armed forces must examine their real estate and its quality all the time. It must examine the prospect of building new facilities—super-garrisons, if that is how they are to be described—for our personnel. If that means that we must examine the existing estate and determine what can be realised by way of assets, it is a sound approach. It is nothing new. It has been the consistent approach of previous Governments. We are, admittedly, taking another big step forward.

Again, the logic of looking at disparate barrack sites is sound. An estate that is spread out costs a lot of money to maintain. The purpose is to get money to the front line. The armed forces benefit greatly from close community links. We very much value looking after personnel in the ways that we do in the areas that we are in, but it is an imperative of the Ministry of Defence to rationalise and get the best use of the taxpayer's pound, and to ensure that it is invested in equipment and support for the front line. Those are difficult equations to balance, because there are many aspects to consider.

[Mr. Ingram]

I do not want to make a party political point, but a decision was made in the 1990s not to invest in real estate. There is now a massive catch-up, the scale of which is truly phenomenal. We are already committing about £1 billion over the foreseeable number of years to complete that catch-up, although a lot of the estate has not been maintained, no new build has taken place and large parts of it were sold off. The assets realised from the sums that were received when the right hon. Lady was a member of the Government did not all come back to defence. We are operating on the basis that all the rationalisation and efficiency measures will be retained for the defence purposes that I mentioned. A qualitative change has taken place.

The point of building new super-garrisons is to give greater continuity to people overall and to provide them with better accommodation, probably on new sites, although sometimes existing sites will be developed. They will allow people to integrate properly with the civil community.

The right hon. Lady mentioned how our armed forces are stretched and the pressure that they, and in particular the Royal Engineers, are under. I recognise that. It is one reason why we have defined the new way forward in terms of the future Army structure. As a result of rebalancing, 2,400 posts have been reallocated to what would be defined as the key enablers. Engineers fall into that category. We understand that we have put a huge strain on those key enablers, and the Royal Engineers have been part of that. We are therefore reinvesting 2,400 posts.

The right hon. Lady also mentioned in passing the important role of the TA. I do not want to get into the detail of that, because I am due to announce shortly our approach to TA rebalancing. However, the Royal Engineers will benefit from that as well.

We cannot achieve everything overnight. It takes time. We have to let things grow. However, we are on the case.

We have not established firm timelines for the work on which we have embarked. There is no particular focus on Invicta Park. It is not as though a work stream is saying, "Let's look particularly at a range of barracks, of which Invicta Park will be one." Nothing is in the machine at this stage and nothing is immediately coming over the horizon. That is why I say that the speculation about the threat to Invicta Park is a bit premature. I do not deny the right hon. Lady her entitlement to raise the subject and to take the arguments forward. I would do the same in her position. However, Invicta Park is in the same position as other barracks of equivalent size on the Army estate and no plans to relocate 36 Engineer Regiment are on the stocks.

I cannot be more precise because of some of the arguments put about the way in which we are assessing the situation and investing in the future as those plans develop and evolve.

Miss Widdecombe: I sense that the Minister is on his last couple of pages, so may I ask whether he would agree to visit the barracks and talk to the men?

Mr. Ingram: I make a lot of visits—

Miss Widdecombe: One more.

Mr. Ingram: Yes. I am more than happy, time permitting, to do so. I benefit a lot from such visits, and I hope that those whom I visit benefit too. It allows them to tell me what they think and to put their views. On such a visit I would be able to say to them what I have sought to set out today. No doubt the report of these proceedings will be disseminated. I just hope that the arguments that I am advancing get a fair shake in the local press.

There are no plans for closure. We have invested over recent years and we are looking at ways in which we can invest to meet our commitments under the Gurkha married accompanied service rules. The Government have taken a major step forward and we are having to address some very important issues about the Gurkhas who are based at Invicta Park. I have set out to make it clear that there are no plans that put Invicta Park under immediate threat, and there are no timelines. At one point, there was a timeline of 2012, but that no longer applies, and for a very good reason: funding. It takes a lot to invest in infrastructure, and when we are doing so we are not investing in equipment and personnel. We must balance the priorities across the various resources.

I am happy to visit, but I cannot say that I will do so immediately. The right hon. Lady will be notified if I visit. I hope that I will not be met by a demonstration at the gates. I know that she would not operate in that way. I genuinely like to engage with our people and to hear what they have to say, because it allows me an opportunity to put across our point of view.

I hope that has helped the right hon. Lady's understanding of where we are coming from and of the overstretch issue, which she mentioned. I recognise that there are pinch-point problems, and we are addressing them. She has just to wait a bit longer for clarity on TA rebalancing. Investment is going on and will go on for the Gurkhas once we can find the resource allocation to enable it. We will continue to maintain Invicta Park for as long as the 36 Royal Engineers are there. We are proud of the regiment and of what it does. I know that the right hon. Lady is a great advocate for all that it does.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twelve minutes past Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Supermarkets

1. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): What powers and responsibilities the Office of Fair Trading has in respect of supermarkets; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): The OFT has responsibilities for enforcing UK competition and consumer protection regimes, which include supermarkets. The OFT has announced its decision to consult on a proposed referral of the grocery market to the Competition Commission for a market investigation. The statutory consultation, as required be section 169 of the Enterprise Act 2002, will close on 6 April, and I trust that hon. Members will take part. The OFT is also responsible for monitoring compliance by certain supermarkets with the supermarket code of practice, which was put in place after an earlier investigation by the Competition Commission.

Bob Russell: I thank the Minister for that reply. He will be aware of the recent report by the all-party small shops group, of which I am secretary, which refers to the growing dominance and near-monopoly powers of the four big supermarkets, which mean that there is not so much an un-level playing field as a huge slope. Will the Government take any measures to protect community stores, especially if they believe in sustainable communities?

Mr. Sutcliffe: First, I congratulate the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues on the all-party small shops group on the report, which has highlighted the issues and helped the debate along. It is clear that competition issues must be dealt with through the procedures of the Competition Commission and the OFT, and we look forward to that process. However, the Government will continue to monitor and consider issues relating to consumer policy. We have regular meetings with the British Retail Consortium and small shops groups, and are concerned about what is going on in that sector.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister will know that the powers and responsibilities of the OFT extend to credit cards. The latest report indicates that the late payment ruling is an important landmark. Will he engage with the OFT to ensure that late payment charges are reduced so that the consumer feels the benefit?

Mr. Sutcliffe: My right hon. Friend chairs the Treasury Committee, I have had the pleasure of appearing before him, and I am sure that I will have the pleasure again soon. He is right that the issue is causing a great deal of concern, and we are considering the matter with the OFT. All party spokespeople on these issues have met APACS representatives to consider how the banking code applies to those matters.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Do the Government have a view as to the share of the grocery market that supermarkets might reach? Does the Minister have a view on how many convenience stores can be owned by supermarkets in a particular town without affecting competition significantly?

Mr. Sutcliffe: That is why it is important that politicians and politics are taken out of this matter. The competition authorities must consider it in great detail, which is one of the reasons for the referral. When the OFT completes its consultation process, it will decide whether to refer the matter to the Competition Commission. The share of the grocery market will be one of the issues considered.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend ensure that the work done by the Competition Commission on this matter is tied up with his review of Sunday trading liberalisation. If Sunday trading is extended for large superstores, small stores will suffer a further impact. Will he ensure that those two matters are dealt with together?

Mr. Sutcliffe: Co-ordination is important, but the two matters are separate. The OFT is considering supermarkets' share of the grocery market. On Sunday trading liberalisation, the Department of Trade and Industry is going through the process of asking stakeholders for their view. A cost-benefit analysis has been undertaken, the detail of which will be fully transparent. We hope to have a stakeholder event in May, and I am already receiving requests for meetings from bodies with a view on the matter.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): Further to that point, we welcome the OFT's investigation. As the excellent campaign by the Evening Standard has shown, however, small independent shops are facing multiple threats—certainly from supermarkets, but also from over-regulation, rising crime and the internet. Given the limits of the OFT's powers, will the Minister accept his responsibility and organise a national debate on the future of retailing, and particularly on the future of small independent shops?

Mr. Sutcliffe: As I said, we have that discussion with retail bodies, whether it is the Association of Convenience Stores or the Rural Shops Alliance. I am pleased about the Evening Standard campaign, which is a step in the right direction. What it says to consumers is, "If you value your small shop, spend money in it." That is the basis of the campaign. We should not get into supermarket-bashing. Clearly, consumers will vote with their feet—if they feel that they will get a better deal from supermarkets, they will do so. The whole purpose of the OFT investigation will be to consider the future, such as how to deal with planning matters, and to set the scene for what consumer policy should look like in the next 10 to 15 years.

Mr. Prisk: I note the Minister's cautious words, but he knows as I do that the OFT's inquiry will take place in two years. Small shops cannot wait that long. Given that, and the excellent evidence produced by the all-party group, will the Minister—as I said—accept his responsibility, and not follow the discussion but lead it? Will he turn his words into actions?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am already doing that. It is clear that there must be a division of the process. The competition issues need to be dealt with by the OFT and the Competition Commission, as provided in the Enterprise Act. However, I have already been meeting representatives of the supermarkets and the Association of Convenience Stores, and I am happy to meet officers of the all-party small shops group to keep the issues under review. The referrals are about specific matters; we need to examine the overall issues relating to the future of shops, and I am continuing to do that.

Nuclear Power

2. Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the nuclear industry on preparations for new nuclear power plants. [60672]

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): There have been many discussions with a wide range of stakeholders, including the nuclear industry, as part of the energy review consultation process, which runs until 14 April. Responses to the consultation will be available imminently on the DTI website.

Dr. Kumar: What discussions has the Minister had with the nuclear industry, and do they suggest that once the review has been completed and if the Government decide to go further down the nuclear route, we shall have the nuclear scientists and nuclear engineers who can design, build, commission and operate plants for the future, given that since the 1980s there has been a great drop in nuclear research and given the fragmentation of the skills base?

Malcolm Wicks: I have had many discussions with the energy industry, including the nuclear industry, about skills and the scientific base. The United Kingdom is a centre of excellence in terms of nuclear science. I recently visited colleagues at Manchester university, for example. There are ideas about establishing a national nuclear laboratory. That is an interesting issue, which is under active consideration.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Is not the Chancellor's announcement yesterday that he hopes to raise £2 billion by selling shares in British Energy yet another clear indication that Ministers have already made up their minds to build more nuclear power stations? Rather than attacking those who are suggesting credible non-nuclear energy strategies, why are the Government closing their mind to all the other alternatives?

Malcolm Wicks: The Chancellor did not give a figure.

Mr. Davey: It was in the Financial Times.

Malcolm Wicks: I regard the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not the pink pages, as my authority figure when it comes to these matters.

The energy review is considering the advantages and the disadvantages of a new generation of nuclear reactors. They are finely balanced: some issues weigh on one side, and some on the other. The Chancellor's announcement yesterday has no relevance to the decision that we will make in the summer, whether it be yes or no.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Can my hon. Friend confirm that the building of nuclear power stations is already totally permitted, and any company could apply to build one tomorrow? Fears that have been expressed that following the energy review the Government will somehow go nuclear are misplaced, because the regime is already in place. However, it is not financially viable to build nuclear power stations, and that is the problem with them.

Malcolm Wicks: My hon. Friend is right. There is nothing to stop someone from applying to build a nuclear power station—but people do not do so. I think that that is because, in practice, the Government need to give a green or a red light. I believe that that has been the case in all nations. As for the economics of nuclear power, we hear different opinions. We ourselves are conducting a cost-benefit analysis of different technologies as part of the review.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The Minister must know that we have made absolutely no progress over the past 20 years in disposing of nuclear waste. We are no further forward on the question of how we dispose of it than we were when I was doing the job that the Minister is doing today. The Government abandoned the recommendations of the Nirex public inquiry at Sellafield. Can the Minister explain to the House and the country how the Government intend to dispose of nuclear waste? Until they have an answer to that question, any suggestion of future nuclear power stations is simply irresponsible.

Malcolm Wicks: Until recently, over several decades, the record of Government and Parliament on the issue was very poor indeed. In fact, I would go so far as to say that it was irresponsible. I do not know whether that included the hon. Gentleman's term in office. Under this Government, however, we have a two-part strategy. Part 1 involves the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority, with a substantial budget and a remit to clear up the waste on the various nuclear sites. It has begun its work. Part 2 will follow the recommendations of the expert Committee on Radioactive Waste Management, which will publish its work by the summer. That will involve making a judgment about a repository—a long-term or medium-term one—in which to put nuclear waste. So we have a strategy in place—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman shrugs, but being the Government who find a solution to this very difficult problem is a key test for this Government.

National Minimum Wage

3. Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the impact of the national minimum wage since its introduction; and if he will make a statement. [60673]

8. Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the impact of the national minimum wage since its introduction; and if he will make a statement. [60678]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): The minimum wage has made a real difference to around 1 million low-paid workers each year, particularly women, who make up two thirds of those benefiting. The latest increases, which we announced on Monday, will benefit 1.3 million workers from October 2006. The adult rate will increase by 6 per cent. to £5.35 per hour.

Mr. Anderson: I welcome this news from my right hon. Friend. As someone who originally gave oral evidence to the Low Pay Commission, I am filled with pride at what my party has done. When I recently visited Israel, its Labour party asked me whether we could inform it of our progress with the national minimum wage, because it wants to use our success as a model for Israel. Will my right hon. Friend help me to provide that information?

Alan Johnson: I certainly can help my hon. Friend. A number of countries are interested in our experience, and it has to be recognised that when we proposed the national minimum wage, there were predictions of doom and gloom not just from the Conservatives, but from the Liberal Democrats, who advocated a regional minimum wage. Incidentally, as recently as 2003, they were saying, in the person of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), that "Making a commitment to a two-year deal, at levels significantly above inflation and at nearly double the current level of average earnings growth, sets a dangerous precedent at a time of almost unparalleled uncertainty".

Now, all the parties agree with the national minimum wage, but every time that we propose increasing it, we once again get these doom-mongers. The way in which the Low Pay Commission has approached the national minimum wage has led to its success—one that countries such as Israel wish to replicate.

Mr. Brown: As someone who served on the Committee that considered the National Minimum Wage Bill, I am delighted with the progress that we have made in recent years. My area was badly affected by low pay, and the regional variation proposed by the Liberal Democrats would have done no good whatsoever. I do have anxieties, however, about unscrupulous employers. How many telephone calls have been made to the Government's helpline to report unscrupulous bosses, and how many prosecutions have come off the back of those calls?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend raises an important point about enforcement. I do not know off the top of my head the number of such telephone calls, but I do know that the vast majority of employers are complying with the national minimum wage. There is, however, an irresponsible minority, and since the introduction of the national minimum wage, there have been 38,000 investigations identifying more than £22 million in minimum wage arrears. My hon. Friend the Minister for Employment Relations, Consumers and Fair Markets announced last year a new concept of targeted enforcement, whereby we examine those sectors of the economy that our evidence suggests there is a particular problem with. So enforcement is very important, but the encouraging news is that, as I said, the vast majority of employers happily comply with the national minimum wage.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that, in his obsession with the minimum wage, he has taken his eye off other low pay issues? Why are women in the civil service earning 25 per cent. less than men?

Alan Johnson: May I gently chide the hon. Lady? We are not obsessed with the national minimum wage, which is important in tackling the very issue that she raises. As I said, two thirds of those benefiting from the increase in the minimum wage will be women. Since its introduction, that gap to which she refers has closed—by some 4 per cent.—but not by nearly enough.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made several important announcements yesterday, including measures to double the number of skills coaches, which was a specific recommendation by the women and work commission; to use the national employer training programme, train to gain, to focus on low skilled women; and to spend £20 million in doing so. A number of other measures will be taken in accordance with other recommendations.

The hon. Lady is a very decent Member of Parliament—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am in that kind of mood today. However, she should stop attacking the national minimum wage, which is what she was trying to do in calling it an obsession, and celebrate it and the contribution that it is making to low pay in this country.

Renewable Energy

4. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): What measures his Department is taking to ensure that the UK meets its target of 10 per cent. of energy being generated from renewable sources by 2010; and if he will make a statement. [60674]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): In 2003, the Government established the renewals obligation to support renewable generating capacity to help us to meet a target of 10 per cent. of electricity generated from renewables by 2010. In addition, we have invested £500 million in capital grants between 2002 and 2008 to encourage research and development and installation of renewables and low-carbon technologies. We are making good progress with more renewable generation in the UK than ever before, but in order for us to go even further the energy review will look at the potential role of a variety of low-carbon technologies, including renewables, in helping the UK meet its medium and long-term energy policy goals.

Mr. Allen: Sweden is working towards an oil-free energy policy over the next 15 years, which incidentally will not require any nuclear power stations. My right hon. Friend will know that that topic has potential for immense social division in this country. Will he close the options down when we get to the conclusions of the review and, when the decisions are made this summer, will he take great pains to build a national consensus on the issue so that we may all go forward together?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the experiences of other countries. In the energy review we will look closely at Sweden, and at Finland and other countries that have come up with different solutions. We would very much like to build a consensus. The first part of that is to have a proper review, based on all the evidence available, and then to publish the results, which will determine the future of nuclear energy in this country and will also be focused on other areas, such as renewables and technologies such as carbon capture and storage. We will seek to reach a consensus, not least because those are long-term issues and there needs to be certainty for business that we will carry on in the same direction over the years to come.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): The Carbon Trust has estimated that up to 20 per cent. of the UK's energy needs could come from marine energy sources. Can the Secretary of State explain therefore why so many tidal power projects have been rejected by the Department, and in particular the Swansea bay tidal lagoon project, which the Department has condemned out of hand as prohibitively expensive?

Alan Johnson: I do not accept that we have not supported wind and tidal power. There has been a focus on wind, both offshore and onshore, but the technologies for both are more at the drawing board stage, compared with some of the others. We have announced a £50 million contribution to wave and wind power, and the marine Bill, to be introduced by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, will tackle some of the planning issues that have emerged. I do not accept the criticism that the hon. Gentleman makes, but I do accept his point that wind and wave power is a crucial aspect of our energy future.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will know that a debate is taking place at European level about whether the EU target for renewables should increase to 15 per cent. by 2015. Can he assure the House that the British Government are actively seeking that higher EU target and will they press for an even higher target in the future?

Alan Johnson: That would cause us no problem whatever, given that our aspiration is to reach 20 per cent. in the UK by 2020. Because businesses need to see the long-term future of their investments, the further away we can set realistic targets the better. I congratulate my hon. Friend on his private Member's Bill, which will make a significant contribution to that whole area of renewable energy, if we can remove the blockage from the Opposition.

Hon. Members: Where is he?

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The Budget announcement yesterday is good news for microgeneration. Does the Secretary of State accept that there are three issues relating to microgeneration? The first is to encourage research and production, the second to make it economically viable for the consumer, but the third is to remove the obstacles of regulation, whether through licensing or planning, that prevent people from installing sensible microgeneration schemes. Can he do something about that?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman mentioned three obstacles and I agree with him, but he could have added a fourth—the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

Next Wednesday, we shall be publishing our strategy on microgeneration, which will include the very issues that the hon. Gentleman raises, especially about renewables. I agree that yesterday we heard good news: another £50 million on microgeneration, with the £30 million already provided, really puts serious money behind that important aspect of our energy policy.

Manufacturing

5. Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of the state of the UK's manufacturing sector. [60675]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): Manufacturing contributes a sixth of our national wealth, employs more than 3 million people directly and supports a further 2 million people in the service sector. In a tough competitive environment, our manufacturing industry shows many success stories based on high value-added, high skills and high technology.

Vera Baird: The Tees valley economy is more dependent than most on manufacturing and processing. The new chair of our local chamber of commerce regards our economy as robust, and up to 10 investments are proposed in manufacturing and processing in my sub-region. However, the short-term problem, which faces the chemical manufacturing industry in particular, remains high energy prices; indeed, one plant in my constituency, at Wilton, has had to close temporarily due to that problem. Has my right hon. Friend any advice for that important industry about better prospects in the near future?

Alun Michael: I agree about the importance of the sector, and it is good to hear optimism from parts of the industry in my hon. and learned Friend's region, which very much needs the strengths of our modern, manufacturing industry. Energy prices are certainly an issue for many parts of our industry, including, as my hon. and learned Friend says, the chemical sector. That is why it is such a high priority for the Government to tackle both short and long-term energy needs and why the energy review was set up. The situation is hitting industries in other parts of Europe, too, so the best advice I can give is, "Hold your nerve."

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I declare a non-pecuniary interest as chairman of Worcester cathedral council.

Does the Minister agree that one of the problems facing British manufacturing industry is the unintended consequences of regulation? In that context, will he look at the impact of the European Union directive on the restriction of hazardous substances on a small but important British industry—organ building? Does he understand that the regulation will have the effect, if implemented as currently intended at the beginning of July, of destroying the industry, making it illegal to build new organs, such as the one we are planning for Worcester cathedral, and actually making it illegal for Durham to reconstruct the cathedral organ, which is currently lying in pieces in the cathedral?

Alun Michael: One of the great problems is the pessimism of people such as the hon. Gentleman. The directive to which he refers will not have an impact on the refurbishment or maintenance of existing organs, whether or not they have electronic components—the issue that has been raised. The pipe organ industry can apply for an exemption for new electronic organs and the Government are happy to continue to provide information to help it to do so. DTI officials have been in regular contact with those concerned and will be meeting the sector soon, so I trust that the hon. Gentleman will now become more optimistic about the future.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware of the concern about the lack of investment in manufacturing skills and research and development in the west midlands, and we have seen the motor car industry in Coventry diminish greatly. Can he enlighten us about what is happening regarding Peugeot in Coventry?

Alun Michael: As my hon. Friend knows, I have been in contact with the company and have met Mr. Folz, who heads it. We maintain regular contact and hope very much indeed that its engagement and production will continue in this country. Indeed, at the meeting that I had with Mr. Folz, he went out of his way to reassure us. Clearly, we are aware of the rumours and the concerns in my hon. Friend's constituency and in the wider region. That is why we maintain close contact with the company and will continue to share and communicate with Mr. Folz and his colleagues on these issues.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. May I just point out to Ministers that, if they turn their heads to their Back Benches, they go off microphone, which makes it very difficult for the Official Report?

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): According to the Federation of Small Businesses this morning, the scheme that operates for the manufacturing companies in the United Kingdom, whereby they can claim up to a 50 per cent. reduction on their rates, does not apply to Northern Ireland, although it is part of the United Kingdom. Can the Minister explain why?

Alun Michael: The simple answer is no. I leave matters that relate to Northern Ireland to colleagues who are responsible for them. However, support for manufacturing industry—for example, with the R and D tax credit—is generally available. There are many levels of support for manufacturing industry in every part of the United Kingdom, and I am afraid that questions of anomalies that relate to Northern Ireland are matters that the hon. Gentleman should take up with the relevant Ministers.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): When I speak to manufacturers, I find that most of them are aware of the climate change levy and red tape, which could hold them back, but fewer of them seem to be aware of the R and D tax credit and the existence of the manufacturing advisory service, which could be of great benefit to them, and both of which the Chancellor announced were being extended yesterday. Does my right hon. Friend agree that he, his Department, ourselves as Members of Parliament and local chambers of commerce could do more to raise awareness of those two helpful benefits for manufacturers?

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I try to give such encouragement—I did so yesterday when the FSB published its review of its members responses, which demonstrated, for example, that 4 per cent. of its members make use of Business Link, which is an interesting statistic, given that 96 per cent. of the people who use that service are satisfied with it and would advise others to use it. The benefit of the manufacturing advisory service is that it has put £213 million into the bottom line of manufacturers in this country, whereas the R and D tax credit has provided £795 million of support for small and medium-sized enterprises, apart from the support for large businesses. Anything that my hon. Friend and hon. Members on both sides of the House can do to help the success of our manufacturing industry by indicating the support that is available would be very welcome.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): Is it not undeniable that the number of jobs in the public sector has increased by more than 600,000, which is more than the population of Sheffield, while the number of jobs in manufacturing, which helps to pay for public sector jobs, has fallen by well over 1 million? Many companies have massive pension fund deficits. They face ever more burdensome regulation, and their corporation tax liability was not even inflation indexed in yesterday's Budget. Does the Minister agree with the Leader of the House, who said that "Metal-bashing is no longer a vital national asset", or with the Prime Minister, who said that

"A robust manufacturing base is a crucial element in a modern competitive economy"?

Alun Michael: Funnily enough, I agree with the Prime Minister. The hon. Gentleman seems to see a contradiction between those two remarks; I do not think that there is one. Where it is necessary for our industry to compete—and it is competing—is at the high-level, high-skill, high-value-added end of industry, and in that context, the Leader of the House is right. The hon. Gentleman talks down British industry. About two thirds of the new jobs in this country have been in the private sector, and we have seen considerable success in our manufacturing industry, despite the fact that the number of people employed in it has fallen, as it has in every developed country.

Mr. Duncan: The climate change levy was supposed to be revenue-neutral on the grounds that it also reduced employers' national insurance contributions. Since its introduction, both NICs and the levy have gone up. If the levy is genuinely to be a tax on climate change, not just a tax on energy use, surely all logic should compel the Government to design a system that constrains emissions, rather than just clobbers manufacturing. In what possible sense does the climate change levy distinguish between those who use energy that does produce emissions and those who use energy that does not?

Alun Michael: That sounded like an essay, rather than a supplementary question. The fact is that about 40 per cent. of the reduction in carbon has come from precisely the approach that the hon. Gentleman criticised, which is why we have succeeded in relation to the Kyoto agreement. It would be good if he pointed to the way in which the Government are supporting manufacturing industry and pointed industries in the direction of the help that is available to them, rather than seeming to want to undermine the success of manufacturing industry in this country.

Gas Prices

6. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): If he will make a statement on gas prices in the UK. [60676]

9. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on domestic gas prices. [60679]

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I take the recent increases in gas prices very seriously and the Government are very concerned about their impact on industrial competitiveness and vulnerable households. I therefore welcome yesterday's announcement by the Chancellor that there will be an extra 250,000 subsidised installations of home insulation over the next two years. In the past year, global fossil fuel prices have increased, which has fed through to the UK. Prices have been particularly volatile this winter because of tightness in the market.

Mr. Illsley: My hon. Friend must feel like the character in the film "Groundhog Day" in that every day he wakes up to increasing gas prices. Gas prices recently have been at a level that is a threat to industry, particularly in my constituency. Companies such as the Carlton brickworks and two glass companies, Potters Ballotini and Redferns, are seriously under threat because of the level of gas prices. Although I welcome the fact that the European Union is now considering energy and our Government are undertaking a review, will he do something in the short term to investigate why prices here are so high and why the differential between the UK and Europe is so great?

Malcolm Wicks: I do look at gas prices and gas supply every day, but the sun is shining, soon there will be a host of golden daffodils and we will be out of the worst of this winter. The heavy users of gas and electricity, who use energy as part of the manufacturing process, have been hit very hard. For that reason, we are doing many things. We are pushing forward with the argument for market liberalisation in the European Union and I welcome strong reports from two European commissioners about that and the Chancellor's statement yesterday. Over the next year or so, there will be more infrastructure to bring liquefied natural gas into this country. The Langeled pipeline will bring a great deal of gas from the Norwegian fields.

Andrew Selous: Before the Minister waxes too lyrical about daffodils, perhaps he would like to reflect on the fact that many pensioners and low income households use pre-payment meters to pay for their gas. I have had complaints from many of my constituents that they not only pay more for their gas than direct debit customers but have not been able to take advantage of the recent price freeze offered to direct debit customers. Given the recent huge price rises, will the Minister take action to ensure that all customers are treated fairly?

Malcolm Wicks: The issue affecting vulnerable people, particularly the older elderly community, is a subject close to my heart and one in which I am very interested. I could write a book about it—indeed, I did. We need not be complacent, which is why I was so pleased by the Chancellor's announcement yesterday. We must attack the issue in different ways: first, through income maintenance proposals, such as winter fuel payments, and by targeting pension credit on the vulnerable; secondly, by making sure that the homes of the vulnerable become energy efficient, hence the warm front proposal; and, thirdly, by working with supply companies so that their social tariffs are intelligible to customers. I am talking to the supply companies about whether there could be some rationalisation so that the tariffs could be better explained.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I am not sure that the host of daffodils will come as a great comfort to the 2 million people in Britain who have been thrown back into fuel poverty as a result of the 80 per cent. increase in gas prices since 2003. I welcomed the Chancellor's announcement yesterday about the 250,000 people who will get additional help under the warm homes programme over the next couple of years, but what discussions is the Minister having with the industry so that the 2 million people who have been thrown back into fuel poverty can be taken out of the equation and the Government can thus meet their commitment of removing all vulnerable households from fuel poverty by 2010?

Malcolm Wicks: We are discussing that with the industry and social policy on energy is a key feature of the energy review. As I said earlier, the issue is crucial, but we need to think about the threefold strategy that I instanced. At the moment, the oldest among the elderly are still the most likely to live in the poorest homes for energy efficiency, but it is especially important that through the warm front initiative and the so-called EEC obligation—energy efficiency commitment—on the industry, we ensure that good insulation, draught-proofing and decent boilers and heating systems become a right for the most vulnerable in this country.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Minister might be wandering through hosts of golden daffodils, but in parts of Scotland there is still snow on the ground and freezing weather. The Chancellor yesterday pegged the winter fuel allowance at £200, and the Minister will be aware that the recent Trade and Industry Committee report on gas prices expressed disappointment about the lack of progress to deal with other vulnerable groups. Does the Minister accept that £200 is totally inadequate, given the recent huge rises in gas prices, and will he press the Chancellor to increase the allowance and extend it to other vulnerable groups in society?

Malcolm Wicks: I accept that there are no grounds for complacency because even in mild winters too many of our elderly people suffer from cold conditions. There is no room for argument about that, so we cannot be complacent and have to move forward. However, I also accept that the Government have done more than any other Government to tackle the problem. The number of people in fuel poverty was reducing until the worldwide increase in fuel prices hit domestic consumers and industry. We are working hard to find out what can be done about that. It is a crucial aspect of the energy review, and it remains a stain on our society that we have not fully tackled the problem. I am pleased about the progress, but there is much more to be done.

World Trade

7. Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the progress made at the recent London meeting on the World Trade Organisation Doha round. [60677]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): At the meetings in London between 10 and 12 March, negotiators from the EU, US, India, Brazil, Australia and Japan engaged positively on the substance of the Doha development agenda, but failed to make a breakthrough in the talks. The Government remain committed to seeing an ambitious, pro-development outcome to the DDA by the end of the year and will do their utmost to bring that about.

Ann McKechin: The Minister will be aware of growing pessimism about the prospects for success in the current WTO round. Does he agree that if we are to correct the imbalance in world trade, EU Ministers should seriously consider increasing their offer when they meet this weekend, rather than simply calling for concessions from developing nations?

Ian Pearson: I know that my hon. Friend takes a great interest in these matters. Indeed, she was in Hong Kong, so she will appreciate some of the difficulties with the dynamics of the negotiations. There is growing recognition that we have perhaps gone as far as we can by taking incremental steps. What is needed now is the political will for us all to jump together. It is quite clear, from a European perspective, that countries such as Brazil, India and others in the G20 need to move on non-agricultural market access and services. It is also clear, from the UK perspective, that if they move, Europe should be able to move further on agricultural market access than it has done. We all need to choreograph this and jump together. We also need movement from the United States, Japan and others if we are to get a successful pro-development outcome to the round.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): As the Minister knows, the EU has proposed steep tariff increases on imported shoes from China and Vietnam. That will raise the price of shoes in this country and damage Clarks Shoes, which is based in my constituency. How did the United Kingdom representative vote in the committee that considered those tariff increases?

Ian Pearson: I am certainly aware of the problem. Indeed, I met the chief executive of Clarks Shoes only recently to discuss the situation. He was very pleased that the UK Government had lobbied on behalf of Clarks and other manufacturers to exclude athletic footwear and children's shoes from the increases. We judged it best to negotiate with the Commission rather than oppose the increases from the outset so that we can secure improvements. It is very much a tactical issue, and we abstained from voting.

Sub-post Offices

10. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): How many sub-post offices have closed since 1997. [60681]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): Under Post Office Ltd's urban reinvention programme, 2,475 sub-post offices closed on a wholly voluntary basis, thereby strengthening the viability of the remaining urban network while ensuring that at the end of the programme over 99 per cent. of the population nationally still lives within one mile of their nearest post office. Outside the urban reinvention programme, 2,248 post offices closed between April 1997 and December 2005, as sub-postmasters retired or sold their premises but were unable to persuade anyone to take on the running of that post office as a viable commercial venture.

Matthew Taylor: The Minister is presumably aware that across the country tens of thousands of pensioners are trying to support their local post offices and keep them open by using the Post Office card account. He may think it is right to close those post offices in 2010 and to write to pensioners urging them to change to a bank account, but I do not agree. Does he condemn the fact that the Pension Service is trying to frighten vulnerable pensioners into closing their accounts by sending them a letter that says that "If Pensioners carry large amounts of cash they are vulnerable, and over 100 are mugged a week for their benefit. Most of the Post Offices pay customers all the benefit and therefore if the customer only wanted part of it they cannot pay it back into the account. With a Bank account they can draw as little or as much as they want"?

That is an attempt to scare pensioners, and a Government service should not tell people who are trying to support their local post office that they might be mugged as a result.

Barry Gardiner: The move to direct payment was absolutely right, as it has cut crime and benefit fraud. Since 1993, the percentage of pension and benefit recipients using direct payment has risen from 43 per cent. to 97 per cent., suggesting that it is people's preferred method. The saving for the taxpayer will be £1 billion to 2010. The Post Office card account was intended to help people without bank accounts to make the transition from order books to direct payment. More than 4 million people, as the hon. Gentleman suggested, still use a Post Office card account, but 70 per cent. of them have bank accounts too. Given that it costs the Government 100 times more to pay benefit through the POCA than by direct payment the taxpayer is entitled to expect us to examine it very closely indeed. As for the hon. Gentleman's question about whether—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Answers are becoming far too long.

Emerging Technologies

12. Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): What support his Department gives to companies developing emerging technologies. [60683]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): If I gave the full list, I would exceed the time available and test your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker, which I would not wish to do. The Department provides a range of grants and manages the technology programme. We promote knowledge transfer, we provide practical advice through the business link network and we help UK experts to visit overseas centres of expertise. I shall write to my hon. Friend with full details, and place a copy in the Library of the House.

Laura Moffatt: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's response, as companies such as Ceres Power in my constituency are developing fuel cells. The company is working hard to make sure that we develop new technologies, but it is not attached to a university, so it finds it difficult to access certain grants. I welcome the Chancellor's statement yesterday on further support, and I hope that many such companies become much more aware of what is available. However, I look forward to receiving my right hon. Friend's letter, so that I can tell them about those opportunities.

Alun Michael: I am happy to expand on those points. The grant for research and development provides the type of response that is appropriate to the individual company—for example, micro projects with simple low cost development projects; research projects involving a range of planned research; and development projects involving the shaping of industrial research. Exceptional projects involving technology developments that have higher costs and a more strategic focus are also available. At every level there should be a product that would assist the firm to which my hon. Friend refers.

EU Gas Market

13. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): What discussions he has had with European ministers on liberalisation of the gas market in the EU. [60684]

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I will not add to what I said earlier about gas prices, except to say that they have increased across the whole of Europe. There is a huge global demand for energy and, in addition, we have a tight situation in the UK as we wait for the new infrastructure to bring in liquefied natural gas—the pipelines that I mentioned earlier from Norway, and so on. It is a difficult time, not least for heavy users of gas and electricity that choose to buy on the spot market, short term.

Mr. Crabb: As regards taking action in Brussels, is the Minister not concerned that current trends on the continent point not to further liberalisation, cross-border mergers and greater transparency, but to the rise of national monopolistic giants, which have proved to be roadblocks to investment in transnational infrastructure, greater liberalisation and lower gas prices in the long term?

Malcolm Wicks: The hon. Gentleman puts it well. Market liberalisation is European Union policy. Competition will bring lower prices. It is good for the German consumer and for the British consumer. The two commissioners have issued strong reports on the subject. They are determined to take legal action to bring about market liberalisation, and the hon. Gentleman will have noted the Chancellor's statement yesterday that at the European Council we are pressing for independent investigation and enforcement.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

The Minister for Women and Equality was asked—

Positive Role Models

18. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): What steps the Government are taking to provide positive models of the role of women in society. [60691]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): We have used positive role models very effectively, notably in science, engineering and technology. I recently spoke at the UK Resource Centre annual conference, which unveiled portraits of six inspirational women in science, engineering and technology, creating a legacy for future generations.

The centre has also launched the GetSET Women database, providing access to thousands of female role models and mentors.

Tony Lloyd: I welcome my hon. Friend's positive comments. Does she agree that a necessary part of providing positive roles for women is getting rid of the negative images of women, especially those portraying women as willing or at least acquiescent victims of domestic violence, violence and rape? Will she make it clear that our Government will have no truck with those who suggest reduced sentences for the perpetrators of violence against women, particularly rape?

Meg Munn: The Government are playing an active role in tackling all aspects of violence against women. The information about sentencing was leaked. The guidelines for sentencing have not been issued. They will be produced later this year by an independent body and the Government will respond. The Government take rape extremely seriously. We will do all we can to combat this heinous crime and to ensure appropriate sentences for those who commit it.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I am sure the Minister will join me in congratulating the positive women role models in sport, such as Olympic medallist Shelley Rudman, our 56 women Commonwealth medallists from the home nations so far, and the five courageous competitors in "The Games" who are women, including my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy). Is the Minister concerned that awards worth £3.8 million are made to elite male athletes—over 50 per cent. more than the £2.3 million in awards to women athletes? That entrenches the existing male bias in sporting role models.

Meg Munn: I welcome the hon. Lady to her new position. I am not sure whether the Liberal Democrats are appointing anyone to deal with women's issues—

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD) indicated assent.

Meg Munn: Perhaps we will find out later who that is. The Chancellor announced yet more money yesterday for investment in sport and to encourage everyone to get involved in it. On role models in sport, some of our best athletes at the last Olympic games were women—Dame Kelly Holmes, for example. We will continue to ensure that women get the opportunities that they need to do well in international athletics.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that, in all that they do, every woman Member of Parliament can be a positive role model for women? As eight women from the Gateshead young women's project are observing our proceedings here today, does my hon. Friend agree that women Members in their places today are indeed acting as a positive role model for women generally?

Meg Munn: I thank my hon. Friend for her question and I agree that every woman in the House should be a role model for women generally, particularly for younger women. I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend's constituents are here to observe us today. It is enormously important to encourage more women to get involved in politics, so it is crucial that they have every opportunity to come here and are not prevented from doing so by old-fashioned practices that work against them.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): Is it not the height of hypocrisy for the Government to encourage others to provide a positive role model for women in society when its own splendid Minister for Women and Equality is the only Minister not to receive a ministerial salary?

Meg Munn: The hon. Lady is incorrect, as five Ministers do not receive salaries. I am not responsible for ministerial pay, but I wish that I had a pound for every time that I have been asked that question.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I agree with everything that the Minister has said so far, but does she agree that the lack of role models is not the main problem for women in our country today? There have been many role models in this place—Barbara Castle, Shirley Williams and, the greatest of all, Margaret Thatcher—but that is not the key problem. What are the Government going to do about breaking down the barriers that prevent women from following their role models, whether it be in business, science, teaching or other professions? The Chancellor was vague about that matter yesterday.

Meg Munn: Committing millions of pounds to help women back into employment—and to woman returners, generally—is not what I would call vague. The hon. Lady will be aware that the women and work commission recently reported and recommended a range of measures to tackle the pay gap and to ensure that women get through the glass ceilings—or off the sticky floors, as we say—and overcome the barriers. The Government are considering all the recommendations carefully and will respond in due course.

Sex Industry

19. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): If she will make a statement on the Government's policy on tackling the trafficking of women for work in the sex industry under compulsion. [60692]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): The Government are committed to tackling effectively all aspects of human trafficking, especially trafficking for sexual exploitation. We are currently consulting on the draft UK action plan, which outlines what the Government have done so far and proposes areas for future work.

Mr. Bone: I very much welcome the Minister's response but, 200 years after we abolished slavery, there is still this despicable trade in young women, who face enormous violence and cruelty. One thing that the Government could do quickly to improve the situation is to sign the European convention on action against trafficking in human beings. I urge them to do that quickly.

Meg Munn: I have to disagree with the hon. Gentleman because signing that convention would make no difference to the actions that the Government are taking. The Government already have a comprehensive range of measures both to prevent and to deal with the problem of human trafficking. We are concerned about one aspect of the convention—that the automatic reflection period may be a pull factor in respect of immigration—but let me assure the hon. Gentleman that the case of every victim of trafficking is considered on its merits and that reflection periods are granted. We are further considering what needs to be done and I urge all hon. Members who are rightly interested in the problem to respond to the consultation.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): The convention is very important, of course, but the Government have launched an initiative to try to unite the travel industry, immigration services, police and port authorities in offering early contact for victims of trafficking who are arriving in our country without the language, without a friend and without a single contact, and are perhaps beginning to appreciate what their fate is. That is a laudable initiative, and I applaud it. What will happen to women who take the opportunity to make the contact that is offered? The Poppy project, which is a very good shelter and support project for women—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is quite long enough. I think that the Minister will have got the point.

Meg Munn: When a woman makes it known that she is in that situation, the police need to become involved. Support is provided and her situation is considered, and then a plan is developed to enable her, with help and assistance, and in her own time—we recognise that the situation is often very traumatic and that women need time to reflect—to give her evidence so that we can track down the traffickers. We have a multi-agency taskforce in place and we will continue to work seriously on tackling this dreadful crime.

People Trafficking

21. Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): What discussions she has had with the Home Secretary on improving the support and assistance given to victims of trafficking who agree to help the authorities in a prosecution case against those who trafficked them. [60694]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): As a member of the ministerial group on human trafficking, I work closely with Home Office colleagues to ensure that provision for victims is sensitive to women's needs. That includes reflection periods offered on a case-by-case basis. Our consultation on a UK action plan, which covers labour and sexual exploitation, includes proposals that will further protect and support victims.

Jim Sheridan: My hon. Friend will be aware that today two people have been arrested in Glasgow for human trafficking. I congratulate the authorities on bringing them to justice and I hope that the law is reflected in the sentences. What training do the authorities, particularly the police, get on dealing with women and young girls who are traumatised by this horrible crime?

Meg Munn: The range of training is important. We are undertaking work to ensure that a wider number of police are aware of the issues involved and trained in such a way that they will respond sensitively. We also have groups of police officers who work with other people to ensure that they can respond appropriately as regards women being brought into the country and women who are already here working and being exploited.

Business of the House

11.32 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for the coming weeks?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 27 MARCH—Continuation of the Budget debate.

TUESDAY 28 MARCH—Conclusion of the Budget debate.

WEDNESDAY 29 MARCH—If necessary, consideration of Lords amendments, followed by consideration of Lords amendments to the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill.

Followed by consideration of Lords amendments to the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill.

Followed by consideration of Lords amendments to the Consumer Credit Bill.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords messages which may be received.

THURSDAY 30 MARCH—Motion on the Easter recess Adjournment.

FRIDAY 31 MARCH—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will include:

TUESDAY 18 APRIL—Second Reading of the Commons Bill [Lords].

It may also be of interest to Members to know that the business in Westminster Hall for April will be:

THURSDAY 20 APRIL—A debate on the report from the Science and Technology Committee on forensic science on trial.

THURSDAY 27 APRIL—A debate on the report from the Public Administration Committee on reforming the honours system.

Mrs. May: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving us the business for the coming weeks, which, as he announced, includes debates on the Budget. I understand that nothing will be said about the health service during those debates because there will be no speech from the Health Secretary. Last week alone, 2,000 NHS jobs were cut, including doctors and nurses, but the Chancellor had nothing to say about the health service. When I have raised these NHS cuts in the past, the right hon. Gentleman's response has been, "Don't you think financial management is important?". Of course it is, but we need a debate on what has caused the cuts.

Yesterday, the Royal Free hospital in Hampstead announced 480 job cuts and Geoff Martin, head of campaigns at London Health Emergency, said that that explained why the Chancellor had

"body-swerved the NHS question . . . Sacking nurses never looks good for the Government."

I am interested in his comments, because I remember him when he was a Labour councillor in the London borough of Merton. Government targets and bureaucracy lie behind those cuts. That is why they are genuinely Brown's NHS cuts. Let us fill in the gap that the Chancellor left in the Budget and have a debate on the NHS.

Some cuts are also being made in mental health services. In the Adjournment debate on Monday, the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton) stated:

"Surveys show that only 11 of a total of 84 trusts have considered making small cuts in mental health services."—[Official Report, 20 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 132.]

Today there is a written ministerial statement on mental health legislation, but according to the radio this morning, the Government will scrap the Mental Health Bill, little more than a month after our debate on mental health, when no mention was made of scrapping the Bill. Again, we learn more about the Government's actions from the media than on the Floor of the House. The Secretary of State for Health should make an oral statement on mental health services next week, so that she can be questioned by hon. Members and held to account for her actions.

Today, the Prime Minister is making a written statement on an independent adviser on Ministers' interests. I welcome what appears to be his change of heart. However, we have called for an independent review of the ministerial code for four years. Indeed, I repeated that call yesterday in Westminster Hall. Will the Prime Minister make an oral statement on that and confirm that the Chancellor played an active part in Cabinet debates on the matter? It is another subject on which the Chancellor has been strangely silent.

Today the chairman of Capita, Rod Aldridge, who lent money to the Labour party, resigned. Last year the Chancellor appointed him to chair his commission on youth volunteering. Will the Chancellor make a statement on Capita's links with the Government?

The Chancellor mentioned equal pay yesterday. He said:

"I can today announce new help for working women who want a wider range of career choices offering higher earnings and to close the pay gap with men."—[Official Report, 22 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 293.]

To follow up the questions that have just been asked to the Minister for Women and Equality, does that mean that the Chancellor will close the 49 per cent. pay gap that exists for that Minister? After all, there is still no Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the Department for Transport is one Minister down, so the money is available. May we have a debate on levels of pay? During it, we could perhaps discuss the pay offer in a Labour party advert last week, offering £28,000 to £32,000 for "an experienced, successful, highly motivated and dynamic fundraiser to secure significant funds for the Labour Party."

That individual will be "involved in all aspects of our key donor fundraising work where you will be expected both to initiate ideas and fulfil expectations."

We all know what those are. It is time that that the Prime Minister came to the House and explained himself.

Mr. Hoon: First, the right hon. Lady referred to the Budget debate. There will be a debate today, which will continue on Monday and Tuesday. There will therefore be every opportunity for hon. Members to raise any issue that they wish, not least the excellent funding that the NHS receives. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made clear, an extra £6 billion will be put into the NHS next year and a further £6 billion the year after.

If Conservative Members genuinely believe that that extra money should not be spent on the health service, they need to make it clear—rather clearer than the shadow Chief Secretary, the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers), speaking on Sky News yesterday. When she was asked:

"So therefore compared to what he"—

the Chancellor—

"is planning on spending you would be spending less?"

the hon. Lady replied:

"Um . . . It's . . . It would certainly . . . Yeah, yeah, undoubtedly that could be a possibility".

What a lamentable performance from someone who apparently aspires to run the British economy. Perhaps that explains why she has been pulled from the Budget debate and is not replying to it, as traditionally happens.

Indeed, the shadow Chancellor, the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), is not opening the debate either, as would normally be the case. Instead, we have the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin)—I am delighted to see him on the Front Bench—who will no doubt be declaring his considerable interests when he gets up to open the debate, having refused to abandon his connection with the City when he moved jobs. It would seem that he is now back in the same job, without having given up his interests in the City, so we are not going to take any lectures from the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) about interests. She referred to the chairman of Capita, and we know that he made a loan to the Labour party because the Labour party published that information. If the Conservatives are so keen on transparency, perhaps they should publish their list of donors. So far, however, we have not heard from them.

The right hon. Lady asked for a debate on mental health. The Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton) has issued a written ministerial statement on that subject, as has my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on the subject of independent advisers. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear yesterday the Government's commitment to reducing the gap in women's pay, which we have consistently been committed to doing.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The whole House will wish to welcome the release of Norman Kember and the other hostages this morning. Next Monday will be the third anniversary of the start of the Iraq conflict, so perhaps this is a good opportunity for me to ask the Leader of the House again whether it is time for a debate on the political situation there. We simply never discuss the matter, which seems entirely wrong.

May we also have a debate on ministerial announcements to the House? It has long been a tradition that the Speaker has deprecated the release of material to the press before the House has been properly informed, yet Ministers carry on doing it. The most important information is that contained in the Budget, yet yesterday's Evening Standard, which was published on the morning of the statement, carried headlines about the additional cash to schools. It also said:

"Speaking exclusively to the Evening Standard before briefing the Cabinet this morning", before going on to quote the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was a time when that would have been a sacking offence, and we should have a debate on the matter.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) has already mentioned the dropping of the Mental Health Bill. Many organisations are worried that the most objectionable aspects of that Bill will now be introduced as tack-ons to other legislation. May we have a clear statement of the Government's intentions for legislation in that area?

Lastly, may we have a debate on Cabinet vacancies? The right hon. Member for Maidenhead mentioned that we had now waited four months for an appointment to the splendid office of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—although I understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed an interest in the job yesterday. We have also waited a month since the Prime Minister announced with some fanfare that he was going to create a Secretary of State for social exclusion, and would have an imminent reshuffle to bring that new post about. As the Prime Minister is increasingly being shunned by those on the rich list, that could be the perfect retirement job for him—but I think that we should have a debate on the matter.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising Norman Kember's release. I am sure that I speak for the whole House when I say how delighted we all are for him and his family and friends that he and the two Canadian hostages have been released. It is important, however, to remember that an American hostage, a compatriot, was brutally killed in Baghdad. I would also like to praise the British forces, working alongside forces from other countries, for what has been described as their prominent role in securing the hostages' release.

We have had a number of debates in the House about the situation in Iraq, and I am sure that that will continue. We also have regular defence debates, in which it is possible for right hon. and hon. Members to raise that issue. I have spoken on Iraq on many occasions, and it is a matter that the Government take very seriously. We also recognise the importance of the views of right hon. and hon. Members.

As for ministerial statements, we have a practice of issuing written ministerial statements when that is appropriate, and they provide a considerable amount of detail. Ministers also recognise the importance of coming to the House when that is necessary, and it is something that they do on a regular basis. I looked at the statistics recently, and on average a Minister makes a statement to the House pretty much every other sitting day, so it is a regular occurrence.

As for press speculation, one of the interesting aspects of our great media is that if they speculate often enough about what will be in a ministerial announcement or a Budget statement, some of that speculation will be right. It necessarily follows that if enough ideas are spread around, the media will get it right once or twice. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) believes what he reads in the newspapers about their sources of information. There is a touching naivety about the Liberal Democrats, which we all rather appreciate.

I have made clear the position on the Mental Health Bill. Of course, had the Government not responded to the debate and the various representations received, we would have been criticised for that. Again, I do not expect consistency from the Liberal Democrats—and I am not getting it.

As far as Government vacancies are concerned, I would have thought that the Liberal Democrats, and the Conservatives, who also raised the issue, would have praised the Government for the efficient way in which we are managing the business of the country. Obviously, not having a full complement of Ministers means that our productivity is higher.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): There are growing concerns about the potential impact of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill as presently drafted. Some call it the "Abolition of Parliament Bill". I do not accept that; I accept the Government's reassurances that they will not attempt to push through controversial legislation using this framework. Can the Leader of the House tell us what future opportunity Members will have to debate and table amendments to it so that although Governments have the right to amend, repeal and replace legislation they must always do so with the scrutiny of and accountability to the people in Parliament?

Mr. Hoon: There was a vigorous debate in Committee about the Bill, and the Minister responsible made certain undertakings to the Committee that the Government would in due course bring forward amendments. Those amendments could be tabled on Report, which obviously will take place on the Floor of the House soon.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I remind the Leader of the House that one of his duties is to this House, in which capacity he should be non-party political, and seek to represent the interests of the House? Will he therefore use business questions less for party political propaganda and more in the interests of this House? And with regard to his role as Chairman of the Modernisation Committee, will he assure me that he and the Government—because he controls that Committee, unlike any other Select Committee of this House—will give proper and due consideration to the establishment of a business Committee for the House, which will be representative of Back Benchers, who can then take decisions on how this House deals with business and the amount of debate, as opposed to legislation, that takes place?

Mr. Hoon: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I was not in any way descending into what he described as party political propaganda. I was simply stating the facts. If Opposition Members do not like those facts, I can only apologise. Having chaired several meetings of the Modernisation Committee, I find the idea that I control it slightly astonishing, not least because the hon. Gentleman's regular contributions make it absolutely clear that I simply do not. Sometimes I cannot stop him talking. I find far-fetched the idea that I can guarantee the result. I would welcome advice from anyone as to how I would control him; unfortunately, I see that the Opposition Chief Whip has left the Chamber—[Interruption.] I see that there is a higher power present—and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's wife, the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton), will give me some good advice on that subject in the future.

As for the idea of a business Committee, it has always been the tradition of the House that such matters are resolved through the usual channels. I see no reason to depart from that in principle at this stage.

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend make time for a debate on the interpretation by chief officers and councils of the code of practice for the conduct of local elections? I am very concerned about the possibility that guidelines issued by the chief executive of Stockport council, Mr. John Schultz, will prevent me, and other hon. Members, from fulfilling our responsibilities as Members of Parliament on behalf of our constituents during the pre-election period.

My right hon. Friend may have read in the Stockport Express, and indeed in The Daily Telegraph, that that same council is planning to turn off the lights in the town, and about my utter condemnation of that policy. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Gwynne) has also had cause to criticise his Liberal Democrat council. I hope that my right hon. Friend shares my view that Members of Parliament have the protection of the House in carrying out their duties here and in their constituencies, and will agree to allow time for a debate so that the message can be conveyed loud and clear to those unelected local government officers who seek—without the authority of the House—to stop us.

Mr. Hoon: I note that you are paying careful attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as you always do when this matter is raised. It is obviously of great importance to Members in all parts of the House that they should be free to carry out their duties as Members of Parliament. That is a fundamental principle of this House and of this Parliament. If there are varying interpretations of the code of practice, that is not acceptable to Members.

I had the privilege of visiting my hon. Friend's constituency in a ministerial capacity, and I know what an assiduous and hard-working Member of Parliament she is. It is important for her and other right hon. and hon. Members to be able to carry out their duties in the House free of the constraints about which she has rightly complained.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con) rose—

Hon. Members: How do you do it?

Ann Winterton: I do it easily.

May I support the request from my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) for a full day's debate on the national health service, in Government time, for additional reasons? Three consultations are taking place concurrently, which is extremely confusing for our constituents. The first is on the reconfiguration of primary care trusts, the second is on "Making it Better, Making it Real"—which threatens vital and popular services at Macclesfield district general hospital—and the third is on the future health care project. Those are important matters of which the public should be aware, and one of the consultations—on "Making it Better, Making it Real"—has been deeply flawed.

Mr. Hoon: As I have made clear to the House on a number of occasions, the Government welcome any opportunity to set out our excellent record on the national health service. I am sure that if the hon. Lady is concerned about the consultations, she can make appropriate representations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. If she is concerned about the funding of the health service, she will have an opportunity to raise it during the debate on the Budget, as I made clear earlier.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on the impact of European Union directive 2002/95, which concerns hazardous substances, on the organ pipe-building industry? It is certainly the view of the industry, including the famous organ builders Harrison and Harrison in my constituency, that the directive will prevent them from manufacturing organ pipes, and will lead to job losses. The House will have heard the response from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions to the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) during Trade and Industry questions. If it is indeed the case that the factory can apply for an exemption so that it can continue its traditional craft, could that please be clarified in the debate that is so urgently needed?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made an important point on behalf of her constituency, and on behalf of those who work in the industry. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry takes the matter very seriously. The Government will pursue it, and I am sure that as it has been raised today, my right hon. Friend will write to my hon. Friend directly.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to a letter sent from a GP's surgery in my constituency by Dr. Philip Woodcock to the Secretary of State for Health? Dr. Woodcock complained that the local primary care trust was forbidding local practices to carry out certain procedures as part of an exercise in money saving and cuts that was taking place in the Colchester PCT area. Does that not underline the fact that the refusal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to raise the issue of the health service in the Budget is one of the most inept political ploys that he has ever attempted?

Mr. Hoon: I have made it clear that we shall have three days of debate, following the debate that we had for most of yesterday, when Members can raise any issues they like. If the hon. Gentleman catches Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye, he will be able to raise his point about the letter. As he does so, however, he really must explain whether he is actually saying that health service organisations should not have regard to ensuring that the money that the taxpayer provides for health—in record amounts nowadays—should not be managed properly and used efficiently. That is the issue. Are the Opposition really saying, when they are admitting that they would cut the money going into public services—and therefore cut the money going into the health service—that we should not use that money effectively on behalf of the people whom the health service treats?

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): There are suspicions—possibly justified, possibly not—that the reason why some political parties do not want to identify individuals who have given them loans is that some of those individuals may be foreign. Is it not appropriate now for us to have a full debate on the Floor of the House so that we can discuss the future of party political funding, and so that the shadow Attorney-General can come to the House and expand on his comment earlier in the week that the Conservative party should stop hiding the names of individual benefactors?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising an issue that was raised earlier by the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May). Obviously the Government have recognised the need for transparency. We have changed the rules relating to political donations, and we have acknowledged that a further change is necessary. But if we are to have a proper debate in the country on this question, clearly all parties must come clean about the sources of their finance. Unless and until the Conservative party is prepared to do that, we shall not be able to have a proper and thorough debate.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): May I remind the Leader of the House that his primary responsibility is to protect the reputation of the House? As there is genuine public disquiet about the funding of the national health service, how can he justify the fact that the Secretary of State for Health will not take part in the Budget debate, and the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not mention the NHS once yesterday, for the first time in any of his 10 Budget statements?

Mr. Hoon: I repeat that there will be every opportunity for right hon. and hon. Members to discuss the funding of the health service during the debates that have been made available, and I am sure that they will do so. As for the specific question raised by the right hon. Gentleman, the Government have dealt with it by allocating so much time to discussion of these important subjects.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made clear, an astonishing amount of money is going into the national health service. That money must be managed, and it must be managed effectively. A very small number of health service organisations are responsible for deficits. I am surprised at the implication of what is being said by the Conservative party, which is that the Government should not have regard to ensuring that that money—taxpayers' money—is spent properly, efficiently and effectively on behalf of the people of this country.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I was very sorry that the shadow Leader of the House could not bring herself to give a sincere welcome to the initiatives that the Chancellor took yesterday to provide better training in skills for women. They have been welcomed universally by all except Opposition Members. The situation contrasts very favourably with the total lack of initiatives for women and work when the Conservatives were in government, while from time to time the pay gap worsened. None the less, acknowledging that there is a pay gap, and acknowledging that the report from the women and work commission contains some very good recommendations, may we have a full debate on those recommendations to establish whether we can make progress, and possibly even galvanise Opposition Members into taking a bit of interest in the issue?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for raising the issue and setting it out in that way, not least because we were told that Conservative Front Benchers were going to abandon Punch and Judy politics—not least the right hon. Member for Maidenhead, who famously described the Conservative party as the nasty party. Yet what we have heard by way of a response to the Budget, including the matters raised by my hon. and learned Friend, is an eight-minute rant from the Leader of the Opposition, and opposition to every proposal.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Will the Leader of the House draw the attention of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to a BBC programme broadcast last night called "Whistleblower", which exposed illegal and shoddy practices among London estate agents? In some cases an estate agent had offered to sell a property for £100,000 below cost if the buyer would bung that estate agent £10,000. Will the Secretary of State come to the House and make a statement about the conduct and regulation of estate agents?

Mr. Hoon: We have just had Trade and Industry questions, at which the hon. Gentleman could have raised that issue; nevertheless, I recognise that it is one of great concern. I did not see the television programme to which he refers, but I have seen articles in the Evening Standard, for example, pointing out estate agents' apparent and alleged poor behaviour. On this occasion, I choose to give such reports some credibility. Members will need to return to this issue.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): May we have a debate on the Highways Agency's use of article 14 orders to block developments and the jobs that they would bring to areas such as mine, where such jobs are greatly needed if we are ever to achieve 80 per cent. employment? Businesses such as Northern Rock are prevented from expanding by the use of article 14 orders, which are meant to prevent congestion in areas that are overheating and where the roads have been fully expanded. However, that is not the case with the A1 and the A69, which in some places have not even been dualled.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raises an important issue that is of great concern to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I will ensure that he writes to her about it.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Last night, I was rung by a journalist who told me that the Mental Health Bill will be dropped. We heard details about that this morning on the radio, and at 10.15 am the press were summoned to the Department of Health to be informally informed. Sometime afterwards, a statement appeared in the Library. The Secretary of State for Health really must make a statement to the House explaining where this legislation now stands. We have had a Green Paper, a White Paper, two draft mental health Bills and a pre-legislative Scrutiny Committee. How much money has been spent on this entire exercise, which has now come to nothing? What will the timetable now be for amending the Mental Health Act 1983, and how does the Secretary of State for Health propose urgently to deal with such legislation's conflict with the European convention on human rights? Simply issuing a statement and talking to the press really will not do. The Department must be accountable to the House for this very important legislation, for which we have been waiting for seven years.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has answered his own question, in that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has issued a written ministerial statement—quite properly and in accordance with the rules of the House—setting out the Government's thinking. The Government remain committed, as the statement indicates, to introducing legislation to resolve certain mental health issues, and it will be introduced as soon as possible.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware that, next Tuesday, this country could be hit by the biggest strike since 1926—in fact, the biggest strike ever of women workers. Can he arrange for the Deputy Prime Minister to make a statement to the House on what he, as the regulator of the local government pension scheme, intends to do to resolve this issue? The trade union has proposed positive changes, but the management is refusing to negotiate, even if there are no financial implications.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has rightly identified that the Government's responsibility in this matter is as the regulator of the pension fund, which means that we are obliged to ensure, on behalf of those who benefit from the fund, that it is properly funded. The issue between the trade union and the employers is one for them to negotiate, and we encourage negotiation rather than resorting to strike action.

I should emphasise to my hon. Friend the importance of ensuring that this pension fund is properly funded; if it is not, the very people who are contemplating strike action will lose out because their pensions will not be payable at the rates they are expecting. I repeat: I urge all those involved to negotiate instead of resorting to strike action, and I hope that my hon. Friend will join me in that call.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we please have an urgent debate in Government time on the continuing crisis in Darfur? Given that foot-stamping by the Sudanese Government has effectively vetoed a vital United Nations troop deployment to Darfur, and given that, while the international community dithers and delays, Darfurians are dying in droves every day, is it not now time to decide whether the UN's proclaimed responsibility to protect is a serious attempt to avert genocide, or simply a piece of vacuous moral posturing?

Mr. Hoon: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this important issue, which many Members are concerned about, as are the Government. The Government are the second largest donor to that difficult area of the world, and we take this issue extraordinarily seriously. We have offered not only cash but assistance in kind, in the form of military and other expertise. I urge the hon. Gentleman to continue to raise this issue; he will have a further opportunity to do so next Wednesday, at International Development questions.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): Notwithstanding the excellent measures announced in the Budget yesterday to protect vulnerable people from ever-increasing energy costs, and the initiatives announced today by the Minister for Energy, there remains one important question: the alleged link between the rising cost of oil and rising gas prices. May we therefore have an independent inquiry into that alleged link, which many serious commentators in the industry deny exists?

Mr. Hoon: As my hon. Friend knows, the Government are undertaking a major and thorough review of energy. They will look at that link, as well as our prospects of securing alternative forms of energy into the future. The Department of Trade and Industry is examining this issue in detail, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy are giving it careful consideration. My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, North (Jim Sheridan) will doubtless want to make representations to them.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Will the Leader of the House find time to discuss the serious matter of this Government's and the Department of Education's duplicity in their treatment of the state-controlled and Catholic-maintained sectors in Northern Ireland? They are closing those categories of schools due to falling rolls, but they are allowing, through a charitable trust—which happens to be funded by the Department of Education—the building of new, integrated schools. That will have catastrophic effect on the sectors to which I have referred, which are already struggling in terms of pupil numbers.

Mr. Hoon: If the implication of what the hon. Lady is saying is that we should not encourage the integration of schooling in Northern Ireland, I would be very disappointed.

Mrs. Robinson: No.

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that the hon. Lady did not mean to give that impression. It is obviously very important that we promote integrated schooling that allows young people in Northern Ireland to grow and develop with knowledge of, and understanding of, all the communities represented in that part of the world. However, I will certainly ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland writes to her on this issue.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I echo the very real concerns expressed earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ann Coffey). The ruling Liberal Democrat group on Stockport council is peddling irresponsible scare stories about savage cuts to Greater Manchester police, despite a 45 per cent. increase in the police precept over three years and record numbers of police officers, community support officers and support staff. Will my right hon. Friend therefore find time for a full debate on policing in Greater Manchester, so that the record can be put straight?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has done that extremely well through his observation. He is an assiduous campaigner in Stockport, and I am sure that the Stockport newspaper referred to earlier will cover his contribution and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ann Coffey) thoroughly.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Is the Leader of the House entirely satisfied that we will have sufficient time to debate the remaining stages of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, given growing concerns about its provisions? What has he got to say to the people of Scotland, who are increasingly concerned that a future, hostile Government could use some of its provisions to amend the Scotland Act 1998 to the detriment of the Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Hoon: I have already made it clear that there will be an opportunity for Members to discuss that Bill. Its remaining stages will be taken on the Floor of the House, where amendments can be tabled, debated and decided on.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Could we have an urgent debate on peerages? Unlike many of my colleagues, I do not really care if people want to buy the right to sit in the House of Lords, but I do care if people can buy the right to legislate in the House of Lords. Perhaps we could have a second tier of junior peerages, so that people can call themselves Lord Snooks but are not allowed to pass laws. Perhaps the parties could have 10 each of those peerages and auction them on eBay to ensure that we get best value.

Mr. Hoon: I rather thought that that was how the hereditary peerage worked anyway. I know that the Conservatives secretly regret the passing of the hereditary peerage: they have certainly never given us much assistance in that and for many years they have relied on the hereditary peers to frustrate the will of the elected Labour Government. The hon. Gentleman makes his point in an entertaining way, but if we were to have such a debate, is he guaranteeing that his Front-Bench colleagues would reveal whether any Conservative peers have been elevated to that rank as a result of making an undisclosed loan to the Conservative party?

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Will the Leader of the House provide Government time for an early debate on the role of the Civil Aviation Authority in the east midlands? He will know that on 4 February there was an incident at Nottingham East Midlands airport in Leicestershire that the CAA has simply dismissed, despite the fact that information about the incident was provided by a member of the air traffic control staff at the airport. Is he also aware that the draft master plan produced by NEMA, as it is called, will double the number of night flights and quadruple the amount of freight flown over my constituency between now and 2010? Will he also invite the CAA urgently to look into the recent incident at Great Glen in my constituency last Saturday, when a large lump of ice fell from an aeroplane on to the car of one of my constituents?

Mr. Hoon: I know from regular use that Nottingham East Midlands airport is an excellent airport and the expansion that we have seen in recent years has provided a tremendous boost to trade and industry in the east midlands. The hon. and learned Member has raised some serious questions and I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will want to deal with them.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): May I back the calls for a debate on the future of the health service and, in particular, the cuts that will be made? My constituents face a £30 million cut in health care, leading to the closure of all the acute facilities at our hospital, including a brand spanking new stroke unit. My constituents want nothing more than a level playing field, so perhaps the debate could be used to explain why the Prime Minister's constituency, Sedgefield, gets £1,210 per head for health care, but my constituents get £960. That is a shortfall of £250 per head and could have kept some of those departments open. We want a level playing field, not rhetoric from the Leader of the House.

Mr. Hoon: Again, I have relayed to the House on several previous occasions the fact that the deficits in the health service are limited to a relatively small number of organisations. Some 50 per cent. of the deficits were incurred by just over 6 per cent. of health service bodies. I do not wish to minimise the difficulties that some health service organisations have had in managing their budgets, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in recognising that it is important that budgets are managed so that our constituents can have confidence that the money that they pay in taxes to provide excellent health care is used properly. On the specific issue of how those issues are calculated, he knows full well that the formula for funding depends on an assessment of the degree of deprivation and health problems in particular areas. It is right that those calculations should be made.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): At the last general election, all three main party leaders said that it was now necessary to review legislation to reduce the time at which the abortion of babies is allowed. When can we expect a review by the House, or is that another key issue on which the Prime Minister says one thing and does another?

Mr. Hoon: I know that the Chairman of the Health Committee is concerned to try to find a way to establish an appropriate consideration, not so much of the time limit itself but of the underlying science affecting it. That would be a sensible way forward and, if the hon. Gentleman wishes to do so, he could write to the Chairman and urge him to conduct an inquiry by the Select Committee.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Last night, I was contacted by a constituent whose father had had a heart attack in June 2005 and needed a bypass. On four occasions that gentleman has been admitted to hospital and four times his operation has been cancelled for non-clinical reasons. I urge the Leader of the House to have a debate in Government time on the health service so that the Secretary of State for Health has to reply to the debate.

Mr. Hoon: Everyone takes individual cases seriously, and it is important that they are resolved satisfactorily. However, it is equally important—as I am sure the hon. Gentleman recognises—that we should not treat individual examples of particular problems as somehow symptomatic of alleged widespread difficulties in the health service. The experience of right hon. and hon. Members across the country is of a remarkable improvement in the operation of the health service, and a significant reduction in waiting times. We need to continue and expand those reductions, but most Members of Parliament are delighted with the improvements that the Government have brought about in the health service.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): Braintree community hospital was due to be completed last December. Unfortunately, not a single brick has been laid. When I asked the head of my strategic health authority what was going on, he explained that no business plan had been delivered because of the deficits in my primary care trust. May we have a debate on the funding crisis in our PCTs?

Mr. Hoon: I have made it absolutely clear repeatedly—I am sorry to have to say it again—that if the hon. Gentleman wishes to do so, he may raise the issue in the debate this afternoon, should he catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If he cannot do so this afternoon, he could do so on Monday or Tuesday. There is every opportunity for the issues to be debated. I know that the hon. Gentleman is an extremely successful businessman and I would be astonished if he were suggesting that his businesses should run large deficits without being attended to by his accountants. His accountants would get the sack if they persisted in running deficits without attending to the underlying difficulties.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): West Yorkshire police have recently announced that they are having to close the public help desk at several police stations, including two in my constituency at Shipley and Bingley. I am sure that the Leader of the House understands how important public access to local police stations is in reassuring people about the issue of crime. Will he show how seriously he takes the issue by agreeing to an urgent debate about public access to police stations?

Mr. Hoon: It is of course vital that the public should have access to and confidence in their local police force, which is why the Government have spent so much extra money on providing more police officers and more community support officers in every part of the country, ensuring that the police are accessible to the local community in a way that has never been possible before.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): The Leader of the House assured us today that he is anxious to have fairness and understanding across the community in Northern Ireland. Will he therefore find time to debate the deep offence caused by the Prime Minister in his foreign policy speech in London on 21 March, in which he referred only to the Protestant community? Does the Leader of the House not realise that the Protestant community has suffered the onslaught of IRA terrorism for the past 30 years and therefore resents being used as a political football in an international game?

Mr. Hoon: I am absolutely confident that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did not intend any offence to any community in Northern Ireland. I know from my experience in the European Parliament, where Members from Northern Ireland are vigorous in promoting the cause of their communities, that it can sometimes unconsciously cause difficulties if references are not properly made to all of the communities in Northern Ireland. I assure the hon. Gentleman that that would be my right hon. Friend's clear intention.

Territorial Army Rebalancing

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I would like to make a statement about the Territorial Army, but before I do so I shall mention the situation regarding Mr. Kember. As a Defence Minister, I am pleased to confirm the involvement of British forces in the multinational rescue operation of Norman Kember. The rescue was the result of weeks of careful work and preparation and I pay sincere tribute to the professionalism of the British armed forces. To ensure that we do not compromise future operations, it is not appropriate to go into any detail about the operation or to confirm the troops involved. However, I stress how proud I am of the achievement of those involved in the rescue, which I know will be shared throughout the House.

For many months, the TA has been consulted widely about the changes we should make better to integrate it into future Army structures, which, I remind the House, we announced in November 2004. As a result, much of what I have to say will be of no surprise to TA units. Their views, at all levels, have been sought and their input has helped to define the review outcomes. I am grateful for their comprehensive engagement in that process. I would also like to inform the House that I have written today to all Members whose constituency TA units are affected by the rebalancing, with details of the changes to those units. I am also placing details of all the changes in the Library.

The size of the Territorial Army will not be changed. It will remain at an authorised strength of 42,000, including a university officer training corps of 3,500. Within that unaltered total, the changes we introduce will reflect the modern-day role of the TA as an integral part of our defence posture.

The great change in the TA, which came about as a result of the reforms of the late 1990s, was to move it away from its cold war role. In its place, a mobilisation culture was introduced, such that members of the TA would expect in future to be mobilised and deployed on a range of operations in support of our defence policy overseas, rather than be held in reserve for defence against an attack on western Europe. Since then, the reserves generally, and the Territorial Army in particular, have made a major contribution to operations overseas—for example, we have deployed about 12,000 in Iraq since 2003. Once again, they have in a real sense earned their spurs. I pay tribute to their ability to adapt, in just a few years, to the changing and very demanding circumstances of the new century, and I publicly acknowledge their appreciable skills and courage.

The operational experience gained from extensive use of the TA has allowed us to apply lessons learned in respect of its most effective employment. First, we are assigning to the TA its proper role in the more demanding contingencies for which it might be required to deploy. Each TA unit will be given a clear role to augment the regular order of battle for large-scale operations—those on a scale similar to the campaigns in the Gulf in 1990 and in Iraq in 2003. That is the role for which the TA will train.

Secondly, although we will structure the TA for larger-scale operations, we will continue to support individual members of the TA who want to volunteer for tours on operations of a lesser scale. Many soldiers indicate that they are very keen to deploy on such operations, and the experience they gain is invaluable. At the same time, we need to regulate the use of the TA so that unnecessary strains are not put on individual volunteers, their families or employers, so we will aim to limit the use of reserves on operations to one year in every five, unless individuals volunteer for more. Although that will be our aim, the legal position is that they can be called out once in every three years.

Thirdly, in designing our TA units, we will take account of the realities of TA service. There will always be some volunteers who are still going through their basic training, and others who for good reasons are not available for mobilisation when a particular crisis occurs. We have, therefore, made allowance in our unit structures for both a training and a mobilisation margin, so that TA units are more robustly structured to deliver the trained manpower needed for operations.

Fourthly, we will strengthen the affiliation of TA units to the regular units with which they are likely to operate, thus improving mutual understanding and operational capability. Closer affiliation to regular units for training purposes will also increase joint TA and regular training, thereby delivering more enjoyable, relevant and challenging training to the Territorial Army.

Finally, we will strengthen the support we give TA units, with about 240 permanent staff recruited to provide administration, welfare, training and employer support.

The organisational changes of TA rebalancing will include strengthening the Royal Engineer element of the TA, the establishment of which will increase by about 1,600, as well as increases to the TA yeomanry, or Royal Armoured Corps, and the Army Air Corps. The following new TA units will be formed: an Army Air Corps regiment to support the Apache attack helicopter regiments in the Regular Army, to be based in Bury St Edmunds; and a new Royal Engineer regiment—72 Engineer Regiment Volunteers—will have its headquarters in Gateshead, with a re-roled Parachute Engineer squadron in Wakefield, and will take under command squadrons in Newcastle and Sheffield. In addition, five new engineer squadrons will be raised in Kinloss, Cumbernauld, Failsworth, Northampton and Northern Ireland, as well as a new TA military intelligence battalion, which will have five companies based across England and Scotland. A military provost staff company will be formed in Colchester, which will be a new capability for the TA and will provide deployable expertise to assist and advise in the custody of detainees. A complete new transport regiment will be raised in the south-west, based in Plymouth, with squadrons in Truro, Dorchester and Poole.

As we have already announced, the TA infantry will be reduced by about 900 posts, and reorganised to form 14 TA infantry battalions as an integral part of the future infantry structure. We will now revert to the practice of naming TA battalions after the regular regiments of which they will form a part, rather than after the regions in which they are based. As fewer volunteers will be required as signallers, logisticians and combat medical staff, there will also be reductions in a number of other arms and services.

The changes I have outlined will happen not overnight, but over a number of years. For many volunteers, little will change at all. Those whose units are likely to change will, of course, be given every opportunity to discuss, understand and make an informed decision on their own future. The vast majority will, I am sure, continue to be active members of the TA.

Territorial Army volunteers have shown over the past century that they are extremely adaptable to the requirements of national security. The changes I have announced today will ensure that the TA continues to be a force for good in dealing with the challenges of the next century, as an integral part of our land forces. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): First, I thank the Minister for providing me with an advance copy of the statement. I join him in congratulating our armed forces on the magnificent job that it appears they have yet again carried out in Iraq, in the release of Mr. Norman Kember, which will be welcomed not only on both sides of the House but throughout the land and, I hope, throughout the whole free world. It follows the magnificent operation undertaken in September 2005 when British forces were instrumental in releasing two of our armed forces who were being held by the Iraqi police in Basra. As the Minister said, such operations illustrate the extraordinary professionalism of Her Majesty's armed forces, in which the whole House can take enormous pride.

I associate the Opposition with the tributes paid to the Territorial Army by the Minister. Members of the TA do an outstanding job and it is genuinely debatable whether the Government would have been able to carry out their operations in Iraq without the support given by members of the TA—not only in the specialist skills which they bring, but in their making up the shortfall in the Regular Army caused by the reduction in numbers under the Government.

As the Minister said, since we became involved in Iraq about 12,580 TA soldiers have been mobilised to plug the gaps. That number includes two extremely distinguished members of the reserve forces, my hon. and gallant Friends the Members for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) and for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), who have certainly played their part in the support of their country.

I also think that we should pay tribute to the employers, without whose support and co-operation in releasing their employees for deployment the TA could not operate. In particular, we should acknowledge the special contribution of small businesses, which often have to make great sacrifices when members of their staff are deployed.

In a written answer of the 22 February, the Minister stated that, at 1 December 2005, the total strength of the TA was 37,430, against an establishment of 41,610. Yet that figure was misleading, as it included 5,750 members of the Officer Training Corps. The truth is that the actual number of TA personnel stands at around 31,680, making the actual shortfall in the establishment, leaving out the OTC, about 6,500. Furthermore, according to a recent report in The Herald—a newspaper with which the Minister will be more than familiar—it is alleged that only a third of the TA is ready for operations.

More than 13,500 men and women have left the TA since the invasion of Iraq in 2003—over 6,000 have left in the past year alone. That translates to a rate of about 600 people a month leaving the TA. Previously, about 150 people a month left. The TA's manning levels are now at some of the lowest figures since it was formed in 1906, yet the rate of deployments is higher than at any time in recent years.

Across our armed forces, both regular and reserve personnel are being asked to do more with less. The Minister has presented the restructuring today as a means of increasing the TA's deployability and, of course, we welcome any increase in the utility of those forces. We particularly welcome the return to affiliating TA units to their regular counterparts—something that is more than symbolic, as it will have practical operational consequences. We also welcome the creation of an Army Air Corps reserve regiment to support the Apache attack helicopter. The Army has been particularly adept in using air reserves.

Although we also welcome some of the additional units proposed by the Government, we cannot understand the proposal to reduce some of the specialist units, such as medical staff. In the annual report for last year, the Ministry of Defence stated that there were areas of "critical shortage", and the latest available figures indicate that, against an establishment of 6,880, there were only 4,080 medics. Furthermore, we fail to understand why the infantry is to lose 900 TA personnel.

May I pose a few specific questions to the Minister? First, there is no mention in the statement of the civil contingency reserves. What has the Minister to say about the TA's role in countering terrorism at home and being available to deal with other civil emergencies?

Secondly, what significance should we attach to the mobilisation of a new combat legal force, something that sounds distinctly menacing, the form of a military provost staff company? Perhaps the Minister could tell us whether part of its role will be to root out the likes of Mr. Phil Shiner and others who seek to undermine the work that is carried out by armed forces. If so, we would welcome that new legal battalion to act in support of our regular and TA forces.

Thirdly, what can the Minister tell us about the haemorrhaging of TA members that I describe and the need to recruit, particularly given the strain that that places on employers? He mentions the objective that TA personnel should not be called up for further duty within five years. Can he tell us whether he expects to able to live within that or whether he will rely on the three-year legal requirement.

Fourthly, can he tell us what proposals he has to maintain a TA presence in the Orkney and Shetland islands? People there are keen for that presence to be maintained, so I hope that he can give us something positive on that.

Although some welcome changes have been announced today, we should be under no illusion that the Government are relying too heavily on the TA as a substitute for an adequate standing army. Today's announcement illustrates that fundamental. Rather than a rebalancing, this looks like a further web of cuts.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman's reply was like the curate's egg in that he welcomed some parts of the statement, but I appreciate his opening comments in which he echoed some of what I said. Like him, I pay tribute to the employers—small businesses and others—who perhaps take the greatest strain in all this if any of their employees are called up, and they willingly co-operate with us in the main.

A bit of history would not go amiss. Let us remember that the TA was halved in the 1990s.

Mr. Howarth: The cold war ended.

Mr. Ingram: Given the end of the cold war, we considered what the post-cold war structure should be, as part of the strategic defence review. Of course, this further rebalancing will take account of the new Army structures and infantry structures. We are mirroring the restructuring, which involves recognising where the pinch points and the critical shortfalls occur. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, we are re-roling about 3,000 Regular Army posts to try to make good that problem, and the same applies across the TA. That is why the rebalancing is taking place. It will give those forces greater usability and greater impact, and therefore greater influence over what we seek to do in defence of the national interest.

The civil contingency reaction force was not mentioned because it will remain unchanged. That role continues.

The hon. Gentleman asked about harmony, and I said that it was an aim, but a legal requirement is involved. I do not know how that will play out, because it depends on tempo and usage. We will seek, as best we can, to achieve the higher harmony guidelines, because we value our people, but my experience of the TA is that a lot of them want to serve anyway, and they want to do so frequently.

The hon. Gentleman asked about Orkney and Shetland. No change is planned on Orkney, but we are considering the possibility of closing the very small unit on Shetland. We are talking, from memory, about only 19 TA members, with three support staff. Although it does not quite fit the neat rebalancing, I decided that is appropriate to keep the Shetland unit. Over time, it will be re-roled to match the engineer unit on Orkney. We will deal sensitively with those who are currently in the TA. We have decided to retain the unit. I am conscious of the fact that we recently decided to close Saxa Vord on Shetland. If the unit had closed, it would have meant that there was a bit of the United Kingdom where the military was not flying the Union flag. I did not think that such a decision would be appropriate, given the remoteness of the island.

The hon. Gentleman asked about retention and recruitment. Of course, retention is clearly an issue. Some of the figures could be occasioned by the fact that, once people have completed their deployments and had their moment of contribution and excitement, some of them will probably leave, perhaps because they are under employment pressure. We need to get a better handle on all that—a better understanding of it—but against a very significant decline in recruitment in the early post-SDR period, it is now increasing. That is encouraging, and we must seek to maintain all that.

As at 1 January 2006, there were 297 more recruits than in January 2005—a 1 per cent. increase. As at 1 February 2006, there were 323 more recruits than at 1 February 2005—again, a 1 per cent. increase. That looks like an upward trend, but we must maintain that. Again, I make the point that we have consulted extensively on that among the TA, and the rebalancing will give greater focus and an even higher level of commitment, if that is possible, in the way in which the TA conducts itself, because it will have all the new arrangements, with a more coherent structure.

On medical staff, there is no question that we have issues in relation to them. That is one of the critical points, and the NHS also suffers from it in trying to recruit. Our judgment is to get the numbers to a realistic size, but I mention history again: medical support to the Army was effectively undermined under the last Tory Administration.

Mr. Howarth: Ten years ago.

Mr. Ingram: Well, it is 10 years on, and we are recovering very significantly from the legacy that we inherited. We are growing the regular support and the number of the TA medical staff that we can recruit and retain is based on a much more realistic assessment of what the market can bear.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister is right to refer to the professionalism, adaptability, courage and tenacity of the TA, but recruitment and retention is still a key concern and the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) is right to pay tribute to the tolerance of small businesses, in particular, in that regard. Those who leave the TA refer to three key things. First, they feel that they are not sufficiently valued. That is not true in the House, but it is certainly true elsewhere. Secondly, they do not always get access to the health care that they need when returning from foreign assignments. It is good news that the Minister has announced that they will be vulnerable to that only one year in five. The third problem is that many of them find that they have been sacked while they have been abroad. Is there anything more that he can do, among the welcome list of initiatives that he announced today, to reduce the chances of that happening so that those people are not deterred from serving their country in Iraq and elsewhere, where I understand that they have carried 10 per cent. of the load in the past three years?

Mr. Ingram: That is an issue. My hon. Friend is aware of the extensive support mechanisms that we have put in place to assist those in the TA. I am not making any announcements on that today, but I hope that a message comes out of the statement about the way in which we will take things forward and the important element of the additional staff who will be employed to work alongside our own people on welfare and administration and also employers, which will allow them to create a greater awareness of the vitality and importance of the TA. If employers are considering their business continuity needs, they will see that if there was a disaster in their area, the CCRF and the TA could well turn out, alongside the civil authorities. There could well be occasions when their own employees turned out to save the very businesses on which they depend. We can put over strong messages on this issue. Assistance from Members would be greatly appreciated—I know that my hon. Friend provides that—to get the message over about the importance, vitality and necessity of the TA.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): I welcome the liberation of Norman Kember and his associates and pay tribute to the professionalism and skill of those whose actions led to that. I thank the Minister for his statement, which should be welcomed as a broadly sensible measure to bring about the restructuring of the TA in line with the future Army structure plans. There was an implicit recognition by the Minister, at least of stretch—even if not of overstretch—on the part of the TA. It is right that the House should pay tribute to the work of the TA, particularly in light of the additional burden that it has carried in recent years.

We have already had exchanges about the recruitment and, in particular, retention difficulties in the TA during the past couple of years, when the duties on them have been much more onerous. Is the Minister confident that it will be possible to preserve the current levels in the TA, as he said today is his intention, or will further over-tasking make the problems even worse? Can the changes that he has talked about be achieved, given the recruitment and retention problems? What action is being taken to tackle the shortfall, which, however one calculates it, must, at the very least, be 4,000 or so?

It is welcome that the statement says that reserves will be deployed only one year in every five, or more if they volunteer. The Minister reminds us that the legal situation is that they can be called up one year in every three. Will he undertake to make regular reports to the House about the regularity of deployment so that we can monitor that?

I did not quite follow the Minister's reply to the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) about medical staff. We all understand that there has been a shortage of medical staff, but the Minister's statement and his reply seemed to suggest that fewer staff would be required in the future. I do not quite understand how that can be.

Finally, on the military footprint—the geographical spread of the TA units—I noted with interest where the new units will be based. I have to confess that I have struggled fully to assimilate the significance of the tables because they seem to be colour-coded, but were faxed in black and white. In the fullness of time, no doubt we will get a better impression. It is essential that there remains the widest possible military footprint from the TA so that as many parts of the country as possible are supporting and engaged in the work of the armed forces.

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments. He probably has a faxed copy of the tables, which is why it is black and white. He will have been written to with a colour-coded copy. If he has a colour fax—

Nick Harvey: I have.

Mr. Ingram: He has. Obviously in the Ministry of Defence, we are in a cost-cutting mood and we cannot quite match that. If the hon. Gentleman has anything spare in his parliamentary allowance, perhaps he could help. I apologise for what happened. The letter will include a colour-coded copy, which will assist him.

The core of the key points that the hon. Gentleman raised was about whether we were certain, or satisfied to some degree, that what we announced would be delivered. If we did not restructure or rebalance, we would have a problem, because there would be an incoherence in relation to what we are now demanding in terms of the future infantry structure and Army structure, and the TA would feel somehow second class. Over recent years, it has become obvious that that mood—if it ever existed in parts of our forces—does not exist any more. On my visits, it constantly strikes me, that, very early on in operational theatres, people stop asking others whether they are TA because it is impossible to tell. They are very much an integrated part—and even more so with the rebalancing.

I gave the improvement in recruitment. We have got to make sure that that is continued. There can be no guarantee on that. We are competing in a very difficult environment, because of high employment and other opportunities, and we will continue to do so. However, there is the fact that we are bringing the TA more into the Regular Army structure and that there will be single command at the top end in relation to how we recruit both for the Regular Army and the TA. Someone who expresses an interest in joining the forces, but may not want to join the regulars would immediately be notified of their opportunities in the TA and vice versa. That co-ordinated approach should help recruitment.

I was not saying that there was less need for medical staff. I was saying that medical support—the Defence Medical Services—was dramatically cut during the last Tory Administration. We are recovering from that legacy. It takes time to build things up. We are dealing with a massive increase in employment in the NHS, which relates to people going into the medical services. The size of the medical corps in the TA will match the real position. There is no point in having a large establishment that we will not need in a realistic assessment. Increasingly, there is a demand, but increasingly it will be met from the regulars, supplemented by the TA. I am talking about balancing those resources.

On stretch and overstretch, we have never hidden the fact that some areas are under pressure. We are going through the future Army structure rebalancing and carrying out the TA rebalancing to meet those demands and to ensure that we have better balance.

I am advised that there are colour copies of the tables in the Vote Office now. If anyone wants to leave and not ask me a question, I will understand.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. May I say to those hon. Members who are remaining to put questions to the Minister that if we have brief questions and answers, more of them may well be satisfied?

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I welcome the statement and especially the announcement on the new Royal Engineer regiment that will be based in Gateshead in the north-east. Members of the Armed Forces Bill Committee who were in Basra two weeks ago were impressed by the professionalism, dedication and enthusiasm of the TA soldiers whom we met. I have met TA soldiers in both Iraq and Afghanistan who were working closely with CIMIC—civil-military co-operation—teams that were doing vital reconstruction work. Has any thought been given to how the array of talents, experience and skills of TA soldiers can be brought to the vital role of reconstruction in Afghanistan and other parts of the world?

Mr. Ingram: I am fully conscious of that work and witnessed during the early stages of Telic 1—just after the war fighting had ceased—the role playing by TA personnel in the reopening of Umm Qasr. I also witnessed it in Afghanistan. Water engineers who were being deployed for a different purpose suddenly realised that they had specific expertise, so some remained to work on Department for International Development and non-governmental organisation projects and made a valuable contribution.

Of course, if people have a specific skill but joined the TA to serve in a different role, we cannot instruct them to use that civilian skill. They are not in the TA to use such skills, although additional benefits can be gained from them. If people serve in an infantry role in a difficult environment, they must attend to their prime duties. We are sensitive to the matter, which, as my hon. Friend highlights, is important.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): The Minister entitled his short statement "TA Rebalancing". Like my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), I welcome it in broad terms. However, we should note that everyone accepts that, under the 1998 strategic defence review, when the Secretary of State was Minister for the Armed Forces, the TA was cut to fund the Regular Army changes—that is a fact. I welcome the rebalancing. Will we see a scale of weapons and equipment in the new units that is equivalent to that of regular units? Given the increasing role of the TA, especially on operations, what opportunities will there be for TA officers to command units on operations?

Mr. Ingram: As ever, I bow to the historical wisdom of the hon. Gentleman. I am not going back to the SDR because I am reporting on where we are now, although I appreciate his welcome for the statement—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) is making noises off, but the numbers were halved in the 1990s. There has been a continual reshaping of the TA and we are now trying to get the best coherence.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) asks about equipping the TA. If TA units are training alongside regular units, they will clearly need to have compatible equipment. They will use that equipment because they would otherwise be unable to fulfil their role. I do not expect that that will mean that TA units will have all the kit in their own establishments, but they will be able to draw upon it so that there can be effective training.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether officers will have the capacity to take on command and leadership. Yes, up to a point. The role of commanding officers will be to ensure that they form a unit with all the capabilities. TA officers at captain and major level will have the opportunity to serve in that capacity, as they have done with distinction in recent years.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): The Government have done quite well over the past few years by ensuring that most deployments by Territorials have been formed sub-units commanded by Territorials. The Minister referred to individuals in his statement, so will he make it clear that the Government will continue to resist the demands of large elements of the Regular Army that the TA becomes a part-time personnel agency from which individuals, rather than formed sub-units, are drawn? I also thank the Minister for our meeting of a few weeks ago. I look forward to the detailed blueprint on the infantry and hope that the structure will encourage the retention, as well as recruitment, of good-quality people and, as such, look as much like a regular battalion as possible.

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for coming to see me. The meeting was part of my examination of the matter. It is good to get the experience of hon. Members such as him. I thank him for giving me a range of questions that I was able to pose to my officials.

The whole drive behind what we are doing is to ensure that the TA is integrated in the regular forces. We want to ensure that it is compatible, deliverable and able to achieve its objectives. It would thus be wholly wrong to see it as something that can be dipped in and out of. There will be training for a specific role in major operations because that is the right way of doing things. At any point in time, a third of the TA will be under training and two thirds will be trained—that is the constant cycle that is likely to apply. As I said earlier, it is impossible to differentiate between TA personnel and regulars in the main, whether they are in the infantry or any of the other skilled trades. That reality will grow over the months and years ahead. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's fear will be realised. I do not think that that is what the Regular Army wants, and I am certain that the TA would not allow itself to be misused in such a way.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I welcome the news that the Minister brings about the Lerwick unit. He is right to say that it would be unacceptable for the Ministry of Defence not to have any presence in Shetland, and that view is widely held there. However, he will be aware that this is the second time in recent years when question marks have been raised over the future of the Lerwick unit. I think that that stems from the fact that there are specific recruitment challenges because of both the geography and local economic circumstances. If we are to have a strong future for the TA in Lerwick, special measures will need to be taken to entrench the unit's position. Will special consideration be given to the way in which we manage the unit?

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his contribution and the representations that he and his local authority have made. I knew the deep feeling in the community and understood the strength of the argument, which, in a sense, was why I did not need a meeting. However, if there had been an overriding defence argument for not proceeding with the unit, I would have done that in the interests of defence.

The hon. Gentleman is right that the unit is small. I think that it is 19 strong, with two civilian and one uniformed support personnel. It is their role to assist, but the hon. Gentleman has a role to play, too. I know that he will be only too willing to help the unit to grow in strength. I am sure that the decision will be seen as good news in his constituency, so let us play on that and encourage others.

When I said earlier that there will be re-roling, I should perhaps have better explained that we will examine that to make it more consistent with what is happening in Orkney and the rest of the structure. I can give a "might", rather than a "definite", but I see the benefit of re-roling, although we must take into account what we are recruiting for and why people are recruited. We will deal with all that sensitively.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Every time the Minister makes a statement in the Chamber about the TA, it is accompanied somewhere, no matter how positive it is, by another salami slice and cut to the overall size of the TA. Today is no exception, because we read on page 3 of the statement that we are to lose 900 posts in the Territorial Army. I fully agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) that it is misleading to include members of the Officer Training Corps and the Army Air Corps in the overall figures for the reserve, so will the Minister please correct that? A new police force, or company, is being set up to deal with detainees. What type of detainees will be looked after and for how long will they be kept? Will the new company be going to Guantanamo Bay for preliminary training?

Mr. Ingram: I respect the hon. Gentleman, but his last comment was silly. We are dealing with serious matters. I think that this is the first statement that I have made on the Territorial Army in which I have not announced a cut. There are no cuts—the size of the TA remains the same. We are trying to grow numbers. I accept that the TA is under strength, as is the Regular Army. It has ever been thus—certainly, it has been the case for many decades. By rebalancing numbers and trying to integrate the TA with our regular forces we will give people who serve in the TA a new future and improve recruitment. The hon. Gentleman made a point about the setting up of the military provost staff company to deal with detainees. This is an issue, no matter where we are. If we go into a hostile environment we must have a legal construct for the way in which we deal with the individuals whom we apprehend. Clearly, that will be the case in Afghanistan. It is the case in Iraq, as it is in Sierra Leone, the Balkans and elsewhere. There are different memorandums of understanding and host country arrangements, and we need people who are well trained and capable of living within that legal construct and who understand it well. It is an area to which we must attend, hence the reason for the proposal. Those staff will be trained to our standards, which are exceptionally high.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I endorse the comments about the effectiveness of the Territorial Army, including comments by hon. Members with whom I recently visited Basra.

I welcome the Minister's statement about establishing a military provost staff company in Colchester, although I trust that that will not be followed by reductions in the signallers there. I welcome, too, the formation of the Army Air Corps regiment at Bury St. Edmunds, which will be welcomed across East Anglia. However, the Minister is rather modest, because if I have read the "Summary of Structural Change by Arm" correctly, an area medical squadron is to be established in my constituency. What numbers will be recruited, both to the military provost staff company and to the area medical squadron?

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his welcome. This is an unusual occasion, as I do not think anyone failed to welcome the statement either wholly in part. We must wait and see whether there are any exceptions, but hon. Members realise that there is sense in the proposals. The hon. Gentleman is right that we will establish a new medical squadron—the designation is still to be confirmed—of the 254 Divisional Medical General Support Regiment. I will write to him with more details about that and the new military provost service. According to my figures, there are no cuts or reductions in his area, which does exceptionally well out of the Ministry of Defence, and serves us extremely well in return.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): So as not to disappoint the Minister, may I express concern about further reductions in the TA infantry, not least given the problem of overstretch in the regular infantry of which the Minister is well aware? However, in the interests of balance, I welcome the decision to rename TA infantry battalions according to the regiments in which their regular counterparts serve. On that point, can the Minister assure me on the record that the so-called east of England regiment will be renamed the Royal Anglian Regiment TA? That is what it has been all along, but we would like the cap badge and the name to be fully established.

Mr. Ingram: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate the fact that I have written to 92 Members, and that point has simply slipped my mind. Nothing has come through the ether to assist me, but I will write to him. He may be able to find the information in the detailed charts that we have provided. [Interruption.] If I may be allowed to respond to all the hon. Gentleman's questions, I might be able to remember the position. I appreciate his partial welcome, and I noted his concern about—[Interruption.] As ever, the one person whom one does not expect not to write properly is the one who passes the note, but my office will write to the hon. Gentleman.

The infantry reduction is consistent with what we are seeking to achieve in the future Army structure. It is about rebalancing and re-roling. We want to look at critical pinch points for logisticians, engineers, and the intelligence and provost corps so that our future structure can meet future threats. The TA rebalancing is compatible with that exercise. Recognising that recruitment has increased slightly, we must all work to make sure that that increase is maintained in our own areas. That will help everyone, not least the TA, to be more confident about how they can assist the regulars.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

1.5 pm

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): I draw attention to my interests in the register. I draw attention, too, to my interests as a taxpayer and as a user of public services. We have had just under 24 hours to consider the Chancellor's budget. In the calm of reflection, two things are clear—£5.5 billion has been added to the tax bill over three years by the Chancellor and there will be £175 billion of net borrowing over six years. The most telling fact, however, is that the immediate crisis facing Britain is in the health service—a crisis that is captured by the evocative but surprising title of "Brown's cuts in the NHS"—but he remained entirely silent about that. In the past 20 or so hours, that fact has become more and more salient.

I never wish to impute to an opponent something that they do not sponsor. The Chancellor, however, has sponsored a vast increase in spending on the health service, as is clear in the Budget and is well known to the entire House. Bizarrely, however, the great increase in expenditure on the NHS goes hand in hand with the Chancellor's cuts. For example, 480 people were sacked in the last 24 hours, and 2,000 were sacked in the last week. Every hon. Member will have experience of what is happening on the ground in the NHS.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Letwin: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I will not do so on every occasion on which he seeks to intervene, as I suspect that he would wish to do so approximately once a minute.

Ed Balls: The right hon. Gentleman had a fine and distinguished career in the shadow Treasury, first as shadow Chief Secretary then as shadow Chancellor. He is now head of policy, and today he is probably shadow shadow Chief Secretary. Can he confirm that in all those jobs, it was Conservative policy to achieve falling public spending as a percentage of gross domestic product, and that the proceeds of growth of rule has consistently been applied in the past six years? Can he confirm that that is why the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers), who is shadow Chief Secretary, confirmed that the Conservative party would not match our commitment to increase state school spending to the level of private school spending? Is that why the hon. Lady is not on the shadow Front Bench today?

Mr. Letwin: I will pass over the absurd question about my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers). When I was shadow Chief Secretary I never fulfilled that role in Budget debates, and neither has my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) fulfilled his role as shadow Chancellor in such debates. However, I will respond—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order.

Mr. Letwin: I will respond specifically to the point that the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) made, quite reasonably, about sharing the proceeds of growth. The Chancellor has relied on his wise advice for many years, so I welcome them both to the fold. We are delighted that they are our comrades in arms, as they believe in sharing the proceeds of growth. Page 259 of the Red Book deals with the proportion of GDP to expenditure in successive years. I was not surprised to learn, given the buffers into which the Chancellor's fiscal policies have run, that he intends that the proportion of spending compared with GDP should fall in successive years. That is called the "sharing the proceeds of growth" thesis. I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman and the Chancellor now agree with us that that is a necessity. Having established that base, we come back to the extremely important question: where is the money going and is it being properly used?

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No, I shall make a little progress. The hon. Gentleman will want to hear the next part, before he intervenes.

The Chancellor said in July 1997:

"The public rightly wants to see more money put in the NHS."

Those are fine sentiments, which I echo. The right hon. Gentleman continued:

"But it wants the money actually to go to patient care."

That is what he said—

"actually to go to patient care".

How has he managed to do what he signalled in the first sentence, and so abundantly failed to do what he signalled in the second sentence? How can one spend £5 billion extra on the NHS in the current year and £6 billion extra in the succeeding year and nevertheless end up with Brown's cuts on the coalface of the NHS? That is a remarkable phenomenon.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Can the right hon. Gentleman explain why, whenever the Government have increased expenditure on the NHS, he and his party have opposed it? He asks where the money is going. In Durham, when I was elected in 2001, waiting lists were 18 months to two years. They are now down to four months. That is where the money is going.

[Mr. Kevan Jones]

Mr. Letwin: I did not expect that the hon. Gentleman would pay much attention to the facts of an election campaign, as opposed to the rhetoric of his own party. I understand that that is often difficult for people to do. Had he read the plans that we put forward before the last election, he would have discovered that our plans exactly matched those of the Chancellor for the national health service. There was not a jot of difference. There were the same numbers in the same years. The hon. Gentleman's proposition, therefore, is entirely false.

Mr. Wright: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No, I shall make progress, as I mentioned.

There is a pattern that the House needs to examine and understand better. The Government and in particular the Chancellor, who has been the main guiding force of the Government all these years, have had fine aspirations. When the history books come to be written, the problem of the Government will be seen to be the mismatch between the aspirations and the achievements.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No, I shall make progress.

I shall give three or four examples of that mismatch outside the health service, before we return to the question why it is happening. I start with means-testing. I know the Chancellor is no longer very interested in the Prime Minister's views on matters, but the Prime Minister said in 1995:

"The aim . . . is to remove the stigma of means-testing for ever".

One does not need to rely on Conservative assertions about what has happened since. One can look at the Turner report, for example, although I know it is not the Chancellor's favourite document. It states that, if present policy is maintained,

"the percentage of pensioner households subject to means-tested withdrawal of state benefits at some point in retirement would rise steadily and would be above 70 per cent. in 2050".

That is a pretty remarkable achievement for a Government whose aim was explicitly "to remove the stigma of means-testing for ever".

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The Chancellor said it as well.

Mr. Letwin: As my hon. Friend says from a sedentary position, the Chancellor has no doubt on many occasions echoed the Prime Minister's admirable sentiment, and the Chancellor is the architect of the failure to achieve that result.

On red tape, again, the Government had admirable ambitions. Labour's 1997 manifesto states unequivocally, and I echo the sentiment entirely—

"We will cut unnecessary red tape".

There is obviously an oddity in the definition of "unnecessary". The British Chambers of Commerce has estimated that the cost to business of extra regulations introduced since 1997 stands at just over £50 billion. There have been 15 new regulations per working day since Labour came to office. Again, there is a mismatch between aspirations and outcome.

On council tax, before Labour was elected the current and temporary Prime Minister said:

"We will have to exercise restraint and limit local tax increases. . . We cannot allow ourselves to be forced into big council-tax rises".

Clearly, no Prime Minister can allow himself to be forced into anything, so I assume it is a matter of voluntary decision that, by April, council tax bills in Britain will have increased by 84 per cent. since the right hon. Gentleman made that remark in 1997.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend agree with me and my constituents that it is not only the enormous rises in council tax, in direct contradiction to the promises made by the incoming Government, but the election bribe of £200 last year that rubbed salt in the wound, because yesterday we found that the Chancellor has failed to follow that up this year, so pensioners will be paying high council tax with no relief?

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend is right. During the election I recall saying to various journalists at various press conferences that there was a difference between the proposals that we made for a permanent reduction in council tax for the pensioners most affected by it, and the Chancellor's proposals, which we said would last only one year. I recall a journalist telling me—I do not know whether accurately—that the Government strenuously denied that that was a one-off move; it merely did not happen to be figured in the Red Book. I remember being told by one journalist that we were naive if we thought that that would be the effect, as he had received personal assurances from somebody—I do not know from whom.

My hon. Friend is right that one of the cruellest deceptions is that that £200 payment, on which many pensioners came to rely, is not present in the Budget. Did the Chancellor make a statement to the House about why that is so? No, he did not mention it. That is part of the pattern of the Budget.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman makes great play of the council tax rebate and speaks of cruelty to pensioners. May I remind him that the Conservatives increased the winter fuel allowance by only £10, whereas we gave pensioners £200?

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman will never be able to persuade the British public that the merit of the Government consists in being able to argue that some previous Government were less than perfect. The merits of the Government must be debated and shown to the British public, if they want to earn their trust and re-election.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Letwin: No, I shall make further progress.

The Secretary of State for Transport is probably also a temporary occupant of that office. I note that the Chancellor thinks highly of him, and no doubt he will in due course offer us his own Budget, but for the time being he is constrained to dealing with transport, an important role which he fulfils with distinction. He is aware that the Government promised to reduce road congestion below 2000 levels by 2010. [Interruption.] The Chancellor mutters. He is astonished that I should ever attribute to an opponent any nobility or propriety, but I do not believe that politics has to consist of being nasty about people. I tried to be nice about the Chancellor for some years, without the slightest effect on his consciousness. It works rather better with some of his colleagues, who are more inclined to an emollient view of life. The nation will see that in due course.

The Department for Transport made an admirable plan to reduce congestion below 2000 levels by 2010. It then concluded that that "is not achievable". The CBI estimates that congestion costs are running at about £20 billion a year for the British economy.

I shall give just one further example, although I have more, if tempted. There is no doubt that the Prime Minister was right in 1999 when he said that everyone should have the chance to see an NHS dentist—another splendid aspiration that everybody on both sides of the House could share. It is unfortunate that six or more years later, 48 per cent. of the population are not registered with an NHS dentist. Every one of my hon. Friends and, if they are honest, Labour Members have had letters from constituents in the past few weeks to ask what will happen to dentistry on 31 March. The fact is that there is a crisis in dentistry.

Mr. Austin rose—

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman has been so persistent that I shall give way, although this is the last intervention that I shall take for some time.

Mr. Austin: Now that the right hon. Gentleman is once again speaking about economic matters for the Opposition from the Front Bench, will he resign the directorships that he holds at Rothschild's, as he was previously forced to do?

Mr. Letwin: Nothing that I have said relates in the remotest degree to Rothschild's, and this brief and pleasant foray into the questions of this nation's finances is perfectly compatible with my declaration in the register.

We have come to an interesting question, which I imagine that Ministers must puzzle over in their quieter moments—even given their busy ministerial schedules, they must have quieter moments. They must ask themselves, "What is going on? What is getting in the way?" There is a vast wall of money and the cheques are being signed, but why is it not having the anticipated and genuinely desired effects? The nation and the House have not yet considered that question sufficiently. That process is beginning today, and I hope that we will have ample time over the next three or four years to examine that question in detail.

Let me advance a proposition to explain that bizarre phenomenon. This Government genuinely desire good results, and they want them quickly, which is why they are inclined to do something to achieve them quickly. However, they do not have any deep understanding of the reaction that is likely to set in on the part of society from the action of government. Action meets reaction, and reaction causes the action to be invalid and useless. It is above all the Chancellor who is the architect of that view of life, and he has a basically static view of society. He desires a good result and thinks that society will more or less stay in the same position, except that anything that he does will bring about a determinate effect. Unfortunately, society does not work like that, and I shall give some examples.

I have already referred to means-testing, and the fact is that the Chancellor is the architect of the vast increase in means-testing. He has increased means-testing because he genuinely wants to reduce poverty—he has a moral passion in that respect, and I pay tribute to it. On both sides of the House, there is a shared desire to see poverty reduced in this country, but the problem is that there has been a reaction. The extension of means-testing has resulted in a disincentive to save, which has been a principal cause, along with the Chancellor's raid on pension funds and many other things, of the destruction of savings in this country. The result of the lack of saving has, alas, been poverty beckoning for many people who should have been rescued from it.

If that were one isolated example, it would be important and interesting, but it would not be a pattern, but it is not one example, and it is part of a pattern. Let us consider the Secretary of State who rejoices in the title of Deputy Prime Minister. He, too, has an admirable ambition, which is again due to the Chancellor and which is again right, that there should be more homes in this country. We all share the view that we should have more homes in this country, because we need more homes in this country—many of my constituents cannot afford to buy a home. Unfortunately, however, because the desired result had to be achieved immediately without careful thought about reactions, the contractors who built those houses did not use low-carbon building techniques, because there was no incentive to do so. The result is rising carbon emissions, which directly contradicts the efforts that the Chancellor mentioned in his Budget and that the Government say that they are making to reduce carbon emissions.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Dorset primary care trusts are being made to hand back £11.5 million to the central pot in the Department of Health. That is having an adverse effect on PCTs in Bournemouth and Dorset, which are some of the best run and some of the worst funded in the country, and it is simply because this Government want to address the bigger problem of the national deficit in the NHS.

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend is right. We know the problems of the NHS in Dorset, because we represent

[Mr. Letwin]

Dorset constituencies. [Interruption.] My point is that Brown's cuts, which arise from Brown's largesse, can be explained by this pattern—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Front Benchers on both sides seem to be making comments from a sedentary position. If hon. Members want to comment, perhaps they will do so in the usual way.

Mr. Letwin: You are right, Madam Deputy Speaker, as always. However, I have at least managed to provoke the Chancellor into discussing the NHS, which is more than we managed to do yesterday.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling) rose—

Mr. Letwin: I shall give way in a moment. [Interruption.] If the Secretary of State for Transport wants to join in and discuss the NHS, it is good news, but it would be better if the Secretary of State for Health were to come to the House and talk about the NHS.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May we continue the debate in an orderly fashion?

Mr. Letwin: At business questions, we repeatedly asked for the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House, and I hope that the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Transport will now make representations to her that she should take over a slot in the Budget debate or find another opportunity in order to allow us to debate Brown's cuts with her.

Mr. Darling: If I understand the right hon. Gentleman correctly, for the past five minutes he has been busy making an eloquent case for the Government to spend less, but a moment ago, he told the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) that we should spend more on his PCT. When the shadow Chief Secretary, the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers), was asked yesterday afternoon whether the Conservatives would spend less, she said that it "would certainly mean that". Was she right?

Mr. Letwin: The shadow Chief Secretary was very clear. She said that we believe that over a period we should share the proceeds of growth, which is part of the Chancellor's programme, and that we should find a means of trying to deal with the Chancellor's ballooning borrowing, which is a prerequisite for economic stability.

In his intervention, the Secretary of State for Transport showed what happens when he amuses himself by talking to the Chancellor instead of listening to what is being said. My point may or may not be right—I cannot claim omnipotence or omniscience; I am a mere fallible human being—but at least it has a logic, and it would be helpful if the Secretary of State were to grasp it. It is not the case that spending a large amount of money achieves the desired result if the methods by which it is done are wrong. This Government have proved that it is possible to spend an enormous amount of money while achieving few of the desired results, if one manages to spend the money badly enough to create reactions from society that destroy one's own efforts, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) raised exactly such a case in his admirable intervention.

How can it be that the wall of money has gone through to the NHS, yet we have Brown's cuts all over the place? The answer is that what is going on in the NHS is a vast effort to deal with Government targets. The people who are getting into the most appalling mess on that issue include the now-to-be-ennobled former chief executive of the NHS, the Secretary of State for Health and, much more importantly, people up and down the country who are wrestling with the problem of trying to run hospitals. Despite the vast wall of money, people who are trying to run hospitals are encountering difficulties, because they must constantly chase targets under a system by which they get directive after directive after directive. They know not whether they are coming or going, so they are demoralised, which results in a health service that is not performing up to the levels which, like us, the Government genuinely and passionately want to see.

I have taxed the patience of the House enough. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Will all hon. Members please come to order to let us have a reasonably conducted debate?

Mr. Letwin: I had imagined that this would be a quiet event.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No. I said that hon. Members would welcome the fact that I was about to sum up, and so I shall do so.

There is only one way out of this conundrum, and that is to have a Government who understand that one has to trust people more and share responsibility with them. We must have a Government who recognise that the people who are working their socks off in our health service, our schools and our police services will not be able to do their job properly if they are constantly controlled by an overwhelming state with its targets, agencies and bureaucracy. The Chancellor can throw money at them left, right and centre, over and again, in Budgets where he does mention the NHS and Budgets where he does not. He can go on trying to pretend that he is going to solve the pensions crisis in Budgets where he mentions Lord Turner and Budgets where he avoids mentioning him—this Budget was one of those—but he will never succeed in achieving the admirable goals that we share across this House if he continues to try to run the country from a desk in Whitehall. It cannot be done and it will not be done. It will produce adverse reactions, as it is today, and the money will be wasted.

1.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): I am sorry that the shadow Chancellor is not among us, and surprised that the shadow Chief Secretary is not—although I see that she has just entered. There is something of a history in the Conservative party of people going missing when things get awkward. I well remember those happy days in Millbank in 2001, when the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), having announced his plan to cut £20 billion of expenditure, then went missing, only to reappear a few days later in a field dressed in a sheet—I think that he was meant to be a Roman emperor. Of course we also remember him in 2005, when he masterminded the plan to cut £35 billion from public expenditure, with similarly disastrous results for the Conservatives. I suspect that one or two of his colleagues wished that he had gone missing in that election as well.

Having heard the second speech on the Budget from Conservative Front Benchers, I am struck by just how light they have been on Conservative party policy. As the Chancellor said yesterday, if we consider the big issues that face this country and the choices that we have to make to see what is best in our long-term interests, whether on education, transport, fairness, taking children out of poverty or dealing with world poverty, the Conservatives have had absolutely nothing to say.

The interesting thing about the brief remarks of the right hon. Member for West Dorset—who is after all in charge of making Conservative party policy, which gives Labour Members some comfort—is that he made the case against any Government intervention at all. It was straight out of the book of the Republican party in the United States in the early part of this decade—arguing that Governments cannot make any difference. We believe that whether in education or transport, of course the efforts of individuals make a difference, but it is absolute nonsense to argue that Government cannot make any difference or that it does not matter how much or how little one spends.

The right hon. Gentleman eloquently demonstrated just how far to the right the Conservative party remains, despite everything that its leader has tried to pretend. It is clear that the dominant view in the Conservative party is now that the state—the Government—can play no part at all, and individuals should be left on their own, instead of the belief, which we hold, that Government can make a difference to the opportunities for people in this country, as we have shown by taking children out of poverty and improving their chances at school—and yes, by putting money into the health service, which has dramatically cut waiting lists. People had to wait 18 months when the Conservatives were in power; by 2008 that will come down to just 18 weeks.

Mr. Graham Stuart: The right hon. Gentleman's description of Conservative party policy is a total travesty. What we heard in the excellent exposition by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) is that the Conservative party is now the party of our national health service. [Laughter.] Labour Members may laugh, but during the 1990s, under the Conservatives, productivity in the health service increased year after year. Since Labour came to power, where has the money gone? Where has it been wasted by this Chancellor? It has gone in falling productivity, as shown on page 22 of the booklet "Productivity in the UK 6", which was produced yesterday.

Mr. Darling: If the hon. Gentleman is talking about whether there are more doctors and nurses in the NHS, yes there are, and that makes a difference. It is why we have been able to reduce waiting lists, and it is one of the reasons why deaths caused by cancer and other diseases have fallen. But the right hon. Member for West Dorset was not making the case for the NHS. He was almost arguing the opposite—that it makes no difference whether one puts money into the NHS. We saw what happened when the Conservatives ran the health service for 18 years: we had long waiting lists. People had to wait for month after month to see a doctor, and for ages to see their GP. It is essential that we support people working in the health service, but we cannot do that if at the same time we deny them the means to do what they are supposed to be doing, which is treating patients.

Mr. Letwin: Does the Secretary of State welcome or regret the fact that 2,000 people have been sacked from the NHS in the past week?

Mr. Darling: No one can be satisfied with a situation whereby NHS trusts get into difficulties. However, the point is that we are spending more money, with £5 billion this year and £6 billion to come next year. The vast majority of trusts are able to cope. Surely the Conservatives are not arguing that if a trust gets into deficit year after year it should simply be bailed out. If some trusts can manage their affairs, others can as well.

In denying that there is a role for the Government or the state, the right hon. Member for West Dorset gets himself into the difficulties that were illustrated earlier this year, when he talked about reducing poverty and said:

"the next Conservative government will have to find means of empowering people at the bottom of the heap to have a larger share of an enlarging cake."

When he was asked,

"What does 'means' mean—does it mean money?",

he replied,

"I don't know yet what the means will be".

Of course the right hon. Gentleman has to say that, because the Conservatives have bound themselves dogmatically to their third fiscal rule, whereby spending has to fall as a percentage of gross domestic product regardless of the needs of the nation. Regardless of whether we need, as we do, to take children out of poverty and reduce pensioner poverty, regardless of what we need to spend on education or infrastructure, they are bound right from the start, before a single policy has been formulated, to cutting expenditure. First they said that they would do it annually, then over a Parliament, then over a cycle. That means that over the economic cycle, regardless of the needs of the economy, the infrastructure or any public spending, they have to cut their public expenditure.

Ed Balls: In light of that, was my right hon. Friend surprised when yesterday the shadow Chief Secretary confirmed not only that under the Conservatives spending would be lower than under this Government, but that the Conservatives would not match our pledge to raise the level of state school spending over time to that of private schools?

Mr. Darling: I was not, as it happens. I think that the hon. Lady was being disarmingly honest, which is probably why she was taken off the airwaves at 3.27 pm yesterday. She actually said what the Conservatives think. It is worth reminding the House what happened when she was interviewed on Sky television. I am glad that she is here, because she will no doubt take the opportunity to make any further clarification that she thinks necessary. She was asked by Adam Boulton whether

"compared to what he"—

my right hon. Friend the Chancellor—

"is planning on spending you would be spending less?"

She replied, "It would certainly"—or rather, for the sake of completeness, what she actually said was:

"Um . . . It's . . . It would certainly . . . Yeah, yeah, undoubtedly that could be a possibility."

It is pretty clear to me that the hon. Lady has eloquently set out precisely what is Conservative party policy. Regardless of what we might need on health, education, or defence—you name it—the Conservatives have got themselves into a position whereby before they set out a single policy, they are stuck with the fact that their third fiscal rule means that they cannot make any rational judgment as to what is required in the future.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): When the Chancellor made the announcement yesterday about matching education funding in the private sector, had he forgotten that the Prime Minister made the same pledge in 2001, or does he simply not read the Prime Minister's speeches?

Mr. Darling: We have been moving towards that aim. We have increased expenditure on education. [Interruption.] The difference between the Labour and Conservative parties is that we have increased the money for education. We have reduced class sizes and refurbished and replaced hundreds of schools throughout the country. Doubtless the hon. Gentleman remembers the policy on which the Conservatives fought successive elections. They originally tried to encourage people to opt out. Subsequently, they have opposed every item of proposed expenditure in the past seven or eight years.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday that if we genuinely want to improve education standards and ensure that we have a highly skilled work force, two things are necessary. The first is continuing to make the necessary reforms to drive up standards. Secondly, we must back that up with the money necessary to employ teachers, provide the right IT equipment and so on. The Conservative party opposes that. The fiscal rule that it has adopted means that it cannot spend the money needed on education, or anything else, regardless of the needs of this country.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): It would be helpful if the Secretary of State could grasp the obvious and straightforward proposition that expenditure is a necessary but insufficient condition of improvement in the public services. Given that thousands of children from state schools—I attended one, unlike the Secretary of State—are leaving school unable to read, is not it time that the Government stopped heeding the advice on teaching reading that Kimberley, Meek and Miller have proffered for the past 20 years in the psycho-semiotic framework that the shared reading lesson is viewed as an ideological—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is supposed to be making an intervention.

Mr. Darling: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman for several years, and there may be more in common between what he and I think than between what he and Conservative Front Benchers think. I believe that he accepts that reform in the classroom is essential but that one cannot improve education without spending at least some money on it. The right hon. Member for West Dorset opposes the extra money for education.

If we want to ensure that we have smaller classes, we need more teachers. If we want decent IT equipment in schools, we have to pay for it. When the Conservatives were in power and my children were in primary school, a computer was a rarity. There were computers in private schools but not in state schools. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Again I ask the House to come to order. Let us have a sensible and mature debate.

Mr. Darling: If we followed the Conservative party's fiscal rule, which means spending £17 billion less this year and £16 billion less next year, that would have a substantial effect on capital and other expenditure. Surely it must be obvious to the right hon. Gentleman privately—I understand his difficulty in blurting it out publicly—that the shadow Chief Secretary's eloquently expressed admission that "Yes, absolutely" there will be less expenditure, causes the Conservatives some problems.

Mr. Letwin: I do not know whether the Secretary of State has had an opportunity in his role as "shadow Chancellor" to examine page 259 of the Red Book. If he has, will he confirm that the Chancellor intends to follow the rule of sharing the proceeds of growth between 2007–08 and 2010–11? Perhaps the Chancellor can show him the page. Will he read out the figures for the percentage of GDP occupied by spending?

Mr. Darling: The Conservative party is committed to cuts over the cycle and substantial reductions in expenditure. That is completely different from the Government's policy. The Conservative party has committed itself, regardless of what is necessary, to cut public expenditure. That works out at £17 billion less this year and £16 billion less thereafter. That would have an effect—and that has been Conservative policy for most of the decade. I believe that it originated in the Witney and West Oxfordshire Gazette in October 2000, when the now leader of the Conservative party was a prospective parliamentary candidate and first set out his belief that spending needed to increase below the economy's growth rate. The Conservative party had the same policy in 2001 and in 2005. That is why it is suffering its current difficulties.

Conservatives have, more by error than judgment, got themselves into an economic policy that would, through their dogmatic adherence to a rule that makes no economic sense, threaten the stability that we have built up. That is one reason why Conservative policies have no credibility. People will not be able to trust the Conservatives. Indeed, as the shadow Chancellor, who is sadly not with us today, said last September:

"Too often we have sacrificed long-term credibility for the prospect of winning support from an aggrieved section of the population or the possibility of winning a vote in the House of Commons".

He continued by saying that the Conservative party's

"Short-termism has hampered attempts to develop a long-term economic policy."

He was right.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The Government have been in power for many years, so they have had a long bash at governing. If spending on education has increased so much, why is a secondary school in my constituency being demolished when there is overcrowding in the other secondary schools and children are left at home with no education?

Mr. Darling: Approximately 20,000 schools have been repaired or replaced. Throughout the country, it is striking that there are so many new schools and schools beings refurbished. That is happening in my constituency and in constituencies all over the country. I suspect that most Conservative Members know that. They also know that class sizes are falling and that there is better IT equipment as well as other facilities that were simply not there eight or nine years ago.

If the Conservative party sticks to the third fiscal rule, it will mean that in future, it will not be possible for it to match our expenditure. I wonder whether the shadow Chief Secretary was right yesterday when she said that the Conservatives would not accept our proposals to increase expenditure on children who go to state schools so that it begins to match the money for those who go to private schools. Do they accept that?

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) said no such thing. She was referring to aggregates. We have made it clear that we have no objection to the Chancellor's 1 per cent. increase in spending on Britain's schools.

Mr. Darling: Not only did the shadow Chief Secretary refuse, but the shadow Chancellor refused, when he was pressed on television last night, to commit himself to that amount of expenditure. [Interruption.] Sadly, I do not have the "Newsnight" transcript and I can therefore only go on the impression that the shadow Chancellor gave. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Again, debate is breaking out throughout the Chamber. Let us debate the Budget resolutions.

Mr. Darling: Perhaps we could clear up the matter. I am happy to give way to the right hon. Gentleman who speaks, at least today, for the Conservatives. Is the Conservative party committed to increasing education spending so that we spend the same per head on children who go to state schools as on those who go to private schools?

Mr. Letwin: I made it clear that we have no objection to the 1 per cent. increase in school spending that the Chancellor included in the Red Book. Will the Secretary of State tell us when it will happen and by what stages, and how much money the Chancellor will spend on that weird and waffly promise, which is a nice idea? Can he tell us anything about how and when it will be funded? We could then make a mature judgment about the proposition. Neither the document nor the Chancellor's speech contain any details about it. I hope that the Secretary of State will acknowledge that simply spending the money is not enough. That is the point that we have been trying to get into his head, and the Chancellor's head—and if they do not get it, the children of this country will suffer.

Mr. Darling: I think the right hon. Gentleman has just said that that was a nice idea—which could be Tory-speak for no. However, my answer to the question is yes, we are committed to increasing capital expenditure up to 2010–11, as was set out by my right hon. Friend yesterday.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): I would be grateful to know the time frame the Government have in place to meet their aspiration for expenditure on schools in the state sector to equal that in the private sector. How has that time frame changed since the Prime Minister made his original announcement on the subject in 2001?

Mr. Darling: As I said earlier, we have increased education spending and we will continue to do so. I would never wish to misquote any Conservative Member, but when the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet was asked whether the Conservatives were going to match us on expenditure, she said: "That's not the answer." That seems to raise significant doubt whether the Conservatives have any intention—let alone the ability—to match us on that. If they were prepared to match our goal of increasing expenditure on education so that we spend the same on children in state schools as on children in private schools, they should say so, rather than attempting to dance on the head of a pin and avoid the question.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: I shall give way to the right hon. Member for West Dorset, then I must make some progress.

Mr. Letwin: Let me repeat these simple questions. The Secretary of State wants us to match something. Right. When? How much? And how has it changed since the Prime Minister made the commitment?

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman could start by answering that he will meet our commitment to increase capital expenditure by 2010, as set out by the Chancellor yesterday—[Interruption.] Well, he does not want to answer that question. The Conservatives are finding every which way to avoid answering it. The reason why they have to do that is that they are stuck with this rule, which means that they are committed to a reduction in expenditure. That means that they could not meet the goal that we have set ourselves.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Darling: No, I want to make some progress, but I will certainly give way later.

With education, transport or any other measure, it is important to ensure that we are in a position to make real choices, and that is what the Budget allows us to do. As the Chancellor said yesterday, there are choices to be made between tax reductions and investing money to improve services and infrastructure in the long term. That is why we reject the idea that we should be tied to a dogmatic rule that would prevent us from making that choice.

On education, I agree with the proposition advanced by some Conservative Members that this is not just about money. It is also about implementing the necessary reform. However, there is a difference between us, in that when we see schools that are in difficulties or failing, we are prepared to do something about it, both in terms of teaching skills and of making the necessary investment.

Mr. Graham Stuart: The right hon. Gentleman says that when the Government see schools that are in difficulties or failing, they take action. As the Member for Beverley and Holderness, I have next door to me the authority of Hull, which boasts two members of the Cabinet among its Members of Parliament. In Hull, however, the Government are not turning the schools round. They are letting down the pupils. What is the right hon. Gentleman going to do about that?

Mr. Darling: When a school is in difficulties or failing its children, it is up to the local authority, supported by the resources that it gets from us, to do something about it. The Conservatives say that they are in favour of the reforms, yet they would deny the education system the means to carry them out—[Interruption.] Because if they are committed, as they are, to the rule that prevents them from spending the necessary money, regardless of the consequences, they will be unable to will the means of achieving those changes. The Conservatives are tied to a dogmatic rule that prevents them not only from investing in infrastructure but from improving fairness and opportunity in education.

John Bercow: The problem is that the right hon. Gentleman's rhetoric is simply not matched by the reality. Given that children in young offenders institutions receive on average only eight hours education per week, and that the Government say that they want to help the most disadvantaged people in our society, will the Secretary of State explain why no reference whatever was made to that subject either in yesterday's Budget or in the 167 clauses, 18 schedules and 228 pages of the Education and Inspections Bill? What is going on?

Mr. Darling rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are discussing the Budget resolutions, not what is in the Education and Inspections Bill.

Mr. Darling: The Budget, as the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) well knows, is primarily concerned with the allocation of resources and the decisions as to how they are spent. He is right to say that we need to improve the quality of training. That issue is being addressed, and the situation is steadily being improved. However, we need money to do that, just as we need money to help families with young children.

The Conservatives' attitude to tax credit and the pension credit is quite revealing. When they go on about means testing, it is clear that what they are actually against is the policy that we have pursued for a number of years, in which we have deliberately channelled more money into the hands of families with young children, and of pensioners on low or modest incomes. That is one of the reasons why we have been able to reduce child poverty and pensioner poverty—something that simply did not happen when the Conservatives were in office. When I see the shadow Chancellor expressing increasing scepticism towards these tax credits, it becomes quite obvious what the Conservatives are about. They have always been hostile to the introduction of tax credits, yet I believe that those credits have played a substantial role in reducing poverty and helping families with young children.

I turn now to the measures on the environment that were introduced in the Budget. They, too, reveal the gap between what the Conservatives say they are in favour of and what they actually do. The climate change levy has been very important, because it encourages energy efficiency in business. Through the levy, we have been able to reduce carbon emissions by about 28 million tonnes, which is a substantial way of meeting our Kyoto obligations. However, the Conservatives have made it very clear that, despite all their rhetoric, they continue to oppose the climate change levy. The Chancellor announced yesterday that, from next year, the levy will increase in line with inflation. It will be interesting to see what the Conservatives actually do, despite the talk of the Leader of the Opposition and other Conservative Members, when asked to choose between doing something that really does reduce carbon emissions and simply talking about that policy.

Gregory Barker: Does the Secretary of State agree that the climate change levy is simply a tax on energy, and not a tax on carbon?

Mr. Darling: No, I do not, because it does reduce carbon emissions. There was a time when I thought that there was consensus in the Chamber that we should reduce carbon emissions, but there is no point in simply talking about doing it. We need to produce the means of reducing them, and without doubt, the climate change levy has done that. That is why the Conservatives ought to support it, rather than opposing it. It is all very well to talk about cycling to work and putting solar panels on houses. Yes, all those things help, but if we want to make a substantial reduction in carbon emissions, we have to will the means to do that.

Gregory Barker rose—

Mr. Darling: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman one more time. Perhaps he will tell us whether he will support the proposal to increase the climate change levy in line with inflation from next year.

Gregory Barker: The climate change levy could be a much more effective tool if the Government were prepared to look at the facts. Does the Minister agree that it is not effective? If it were, carbon dioxide emissions would not have risen in five of the past seven years. Will he further confirm that we shall not meet the 2010 target that was set out in the 2001 and 2005 Labour manifestos—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. These interventions are getting far too lengthy. There are people who actually want to contribute to the debate as well.

Mr. Darling: We will meet our Kyoto obligations. We have introduced a number of measures, and next week my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs will set out the further steps that we propose to take. One of them is to introduce an obligation to increase the use of biofuels, which will result in the equivalent of taking about 1 million cars off the roads every year. I hope that the Conservatives will support that as well. The measures that we announced yesterday to change the road tax paid will also send a clear signal to people that they should think long and hard about what they do to reduce the environmental damage caused not just by transport but by other means as well.

Miss Kirkbride: The right hon. Gentleman is trying to parade his green credentials, but the top rate of vehicle excise duty that the Chancellor announced yesterday applies to only 1 per cent of cars. Is that not rather timid as a green proposal?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Lady seems to be calling for even greater taxes on gas-guzzling cars. It is obviously important to have for road tax a reasonable balance between the top and bottom end of the range. There has been substantial change in that nearly half the cars will now pay a frozen or a reduced rate. That applies to the cars that are more environmentally friendly, but there will be higher rates for those that cause more damage.

Of course, that is not the only thing that we are doing. We have the road transport fuel obligation and, largely at our instigation, aviation emissions have been included in the European trading scheme. We are taking a number of measures.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con) rose—

Mr. Darling: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman who speaks on transport for the Conservative party.

Chris Grayling: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. When the announcement was made yesterday, with a great fanfare from the Chancellor, of a new zero rate for vehicle excise duty, was the Secretary of State aware that it appears that only two cars are eligible for that zero rate, and that they are not currently on sale in the UK?

Mr. Darling: As the Chancellor said yesterday, there are a small number of cars in the zero-rated band, but the whole point of introducing the banding is to encourage the industry to become more efficient. As I said to the hon. Gentleman earlier this week, it is high time he started thinking about long-term solutions. If he has better solutions, then he should come up with them. The changes that we have made send a very clear signal to people, and they are important when we consider them with the other changes that we have introduced. When we vote on the climate change levy at some point, I hope that we will see the Conservative party change its mind. It is all very well to talk about these things, but if it is not actually willing to vote for the measures that reduce carbon emissions, all its talk adds up to very little.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Friends of the Earth said yesterday that it felt that the Budget had failed to provide a major contribution to tackling emissions in the long term. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree?

Mr. Darling: Over my years as Transport Secretary, nothing that Friends of the Earth has said to me has surprised me. Many environmental groups widely welcomed what the Chancellor said yesterday. I believe that that, and other measures, send a very clear signal to motorists.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): Yesterday's announcement on carbon capture and the memorandum of understanding with the Norwegian Government were very welcome. Do the Government have any estimate of the time scale for large-scale carbon capture and for carbon to be pumped into the North sea, starting with the emissions from power stations?

Mr. Darling: We want to get on with that as quickly as possible, and we will publish proposals. As the hon. Gentleman knows, quite a lot of work has been done—for example, at Peterhead power station—to see how carbon can be captured and stored under the North sea. We want to try to bring forward practical measures that will encourage that. I cannot give him a precise time scale, but everybody wants to press on as soon as we possibly can.

Nobody can be in any doubt that the problem of greenhouse gases is growing. The difference between us and previous Governments is that we are doing something about it by meeting our Kyoto obligations and making sure that we meet other obligations as well. To do that means that we have to support measures such as the climate change levy.

It is clear from the contribution of the right hon. Member for West Dorset, and from the little that was said by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday, that the Conservative party hopes that if it says very little, people will not notice what it is up to. The right hon. Member for West Dorset has gone further today, and confirmed what we always thought about where the Conservatives instincts lie. They are trying to argue that the Government have a very limited role, and cannot make a difference to the lives of people in this country. They have tied themselves to a fiscal rule that is absolute nonsense in economic terms.

In contrast, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor yesterday set out a clear direction for this country for the future. In particular, he showed how we can, from a position of strength, invest in education, continue to put money into other public services and make a real difference to the future prospects of this country. This country has been transformed over the past few years. We have built a position of strength that would have been undreamt of 10 years ago when the Conservative party was in power. For those reasons this Budget should be commended, and we should vote for it next Tuesday evening.

2.5 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I cannot recall a time in politics—certainly in my lifetime—when the Government have given us so much to talk about, but the official Opposition have had so little to say about it. The performance of the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) yesterday and of the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) today has been an affront to the House. They had the opportunity to hold the Government to account; they had the opportunity to—

Mr. Graham Stuart: Why is the hon. Gentleman attacking us?

Mr. Carmichael: Because you have said absolutely nothing and you are not fulfilling—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman meant to refer to the occupant of the Chair.

Mr. Carmichael: Nothing could be further from my mind, Madam Deputy Speaker. The official Opposition have not done their job and they are letting down the people who vote for them and who send them here.

Managing expectations is one of the most important aspects of politics, and it is something that the Secretary of State for Transport normally does exceptionally well. When I saw that the first full day of debate on the Budget was to be about transport, my expectations were raised. I really thought that we would hear a great deal in the Budget about transport, because many transport issues tick many of the boxes that seem to be important to the Chancellor. Transport can be a tool of economic development, it can be a tool for environmental improvement and it can be a tool for social inclusion. Those are all things that the Chancellor says motivate him and underpin his policies to date. However, there was virtually nothing about transport in yesterday's speech.

Last week, the Secretary of State gave us a tremendous speech about the future of the rail network. We were told about a new generation of high-speed trains; we were told about the possibility of double-decker trains; and we were told that we were going to have transport of which we could be proud. He also offered some sort of vision of a 20 to 30-year strategy. For an issue such as transport, that is exactly the right approach. We need to have more long-term thinking and more long-term strategic thinking. The absence of such long-term strategic thinking has caused many of the difficulties with the transport infrastructure that we have today.

Why did the Chancellor not follow that up yesterday? Why was there nothing about the railways in the Budget? We were told that it was going to be a green Budget, and there is an obvious link between transport and the reduction of CO_2 emissions. I welcome the new bandings for vehicle excise duty. They have the potential to make significant changes and to encourage the use of more environmentally friendly vehicles and to discourage the use of the more dangerous and damaging ones. However, the manner in which the bandings have been introduced has been timid in the extreme. It is mere tokenism.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) pointed out yesterday, the extra cost of vehicle excise duty for gas guzzlers will be roughly equivalent to the cost of filling half a tank of petrol for one of them. There is therefore no real disincentive for the so-called Chelsea tractors. Those who can afford such vehicles will not be put off from buying or using them by an increase in vehicle excise duty of that scale. However, the use of larger 4x4 vehicles is important for many people in constituencies such as mine and in other rural and remote communities. Such people—and farmers, in particular—operate businesses that work on very tight margins. The extra cost will make a difference to them, but no protection will be given to them.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) seemed to give the impression in his comments in the House that the increase in vehicle excise duty was not high enough. The hon. Gentleman, however, seems to be suggesting that it is too high. Can the Liberal Democrats be clear about what their policy is?

Mr. Carmichael: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will listen a wee bit more carefully from now on. I was saying that some meaningful protection was needed for those who will be hit hardest—[Interruption.] I do not know whether a Conservative Member wishes to intervene. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) wish to make a comment?

Gregory Barker: What protection does the hon. Gentleman suggest? Can he explain?

Mr. Carmichael: The hon. Gentleman has finally got to his feet and had the courtesy to ask the question properly. I can tell him that there is an opportunity, within the regulatory framework operated by the European Union, for derogations from vehicle excise duty for remote and peripheral communities. Spain, Portugal and Greece have provided that for many years. We urged his party to do that when it was in government for many years, but it always refused to do so. We have always been told that it could not be done, but we found out recently that France has started doing it. That is the sort of protection that can be given.

Gregory Barker: So, farmers who have large 4x4s in the hon. Gentleman's constituency will get a subsidy, but farmers in my constituency, only 50 miles from London, will be penalised like the Chelsea tractors. Do I understand him rightly?

Mr. Carmichael: I shall not dwell on this point—the hon. Gentleman asked for one example. He is well aware that it is possible to put in place protection for people for whom it will make a difference. One means of doing that is on the basis of geography, as I explained. It is also possible that rebates can be offered through VAT or the tax system; that is not beyond the wit of man. My point—and he was one of those who was chuntering behind me earlier, complaining that I was not being hard enough on the Government—is that the Government have made no attempt to give us any of those protections. I find it difficult to understand the insistence that one size will fit all and be appropriate for all parts of the country.

Mark Lazarowicz rose—

Mr. Carmichael: I want to make some progress.

In the long term, we should be dealing not with vehicle excise or fuel duty, but with a proper system of national road pricing. The Secretary of State has made encouraging noises about that in the past but, again, we heard nothing about it yesterday. It is not as though we are short of transport projects needing support. In Greater Manchester, the Government still fail to demonstrate adequate commitment to the Metrolink expansion. Light rail schemes in Leeds, Liverpool and Portsmouth have all been cancelled. The Government guidelines on light rail procurement, which we were promised last December, have still not been published.

When it comes to new roads, however, it seems that money is no object. The Secretary of State will be aware that the National Audit Office is currently investigating how the Government's new road building programme seems to be spiralling out of control. The costs have gone from £3.5 billion to £5 billion. Where is the prudence there?

Money does not seem to be so readily available for road maintenance. Tomorrow, the annual local authority road maintenance report will be published. I will not pre-empt that, but it is fair to anticipate that it will be bleak. Much of England's road network is potholed and crumbling, which is dangerous for cyclists, motorcyclists, pedestrians and motorists. Filling in small potholes is not as sexy as building new roads—it does not provide the same opportunities to cut ribbons at openings—but it is necessary and important.

On the question of bus transport, I want to give a warm and genuine welcome to the proposals for free bus travel for pensioners, which will be introduced as a nationwide scheme in 2008. I commend the Secretary of State and the Chancellor for having at last caught up with their colleagues in Scotland and Wales in the implementation of a national scheme.

Mark Lazarowicz: It is, of course, a national scheme for England, as it is a national scheme for Scotland. That has the effect that my constituents, should they wish to visit the hon. Gentleman's constituency, can do so free of charge, but they cannot visit free of charge constituencies in Newcastle or elsewhere south of the border. Does he agree that perhaps we should consider a UK-wide scheme, or at least a mainland-wide scheme, as the next logical development from the welcome England-wide scheme?

Mr. Carmichael: That is an interesting idea, and surely not beyond the wit of man. A pensioner is a pensioner, whether he is in Scotland, England, Wales or Northern Ireland. I hope that some of the disputes about crossing boundaries that we have seen between different local authorities with the concessionary scheme being rolled out in England will not appear at a macro-level. That would be a missed opportunity.

While we will consider carefully the funding of the scheme to be rolled out by 2008, we must have more immediate regard to the situation facing local authorities that are trying to implement the scheme announced last year. That is forcing many local authorities into crisis as the 31 March deadline approaches. In Watford, for example, the Government provided funding of £300,000, but the eventual cost was no less than £830,000. In Bath and North-East Somerset, the shortfall is in the region of £200,000. Community transport schemes are suffering. Again, many people in remote and rural areas, where there is not an "ordinary" bus service, depend on such crucial schemes. They are not getting that sort of provision as part of the scheme, and I have heard of places where those schemes are being cut to allow councils to meet their commitments to the concessionary scheme.

York has struggled because it received some £855,000 from the Government rather than the £1,086,000 that the implementation of the scheme will cost. That pattern seems to be repeated throughout the country. In many local authority areas, councillors have taken the initiative and have been able to make significant progress in providing good, often multi-modal, schemes, which are popular and workable on a local basis. Surely it is not right that those schemes should be sacrificed on the altar of the one that they are being forced to introduce.

An awful lot of opportunities have been missed. The Budget could have delivered a great deal more for transport. The bottom line is that as an instrument of economic generation, environmental change and social inclusion, transport could deliver an awful lot more for the Government, if only they would take it seriously.

2.18 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael). He made his points very forcefully, but in a very moderate way. He also ensured that his party's policies in relation to the Budget were presented to us. As he reminded us, that was in contrast to the speech of the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), who has now left the Chamber. He came in, delivered his speech and left—in the absence of the shadow Chancellor and the shadow Chief Secretary, although I was delighted to observe that the shadow Chief Secretary joined the debate halfway through the proceedings.

Gregory Barker: Surely the absence of the shadow Chancellor is not remarkable. The absence that is extraordinary is that on the Labour Benches. The hon. Gentleman is the single, solitary Labour Back Bencher who is present. Oh! Another one has just returned.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think that we need references to anyone who is or is not in the Chamber. We need references to the debate, which is on the Budget resolutions.

Keith Vaz: The fact is that every other Labour Member agrees on the success of the Budget, and I am clearly speaking on behalf of all of them—which is a great and powerful position to be in.

Listening to the right hon. Member for West Dorset took me back 30 years to when I first saw him speak, in a university debate. His speech today was almost identical to the speeches that he used to give at the Cambridge Union: very funny, made without a script, with the right hon. Gentleman making it all up as he went along—but with no substance. That is exactly what we heard today. It was basically an undergraduate speech, of a type for which the right hon. Gentleman became so famous when he was a student.

In contrast, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport gave an excellent speech, setting out very clearly why the Budget would be such a success. When I returned to my office yesterday after the Budget speech, I was inundated with calls from constituents and others who were delighted with the support that the Chancellor is giving to ordinary working families, and with the success of the Budget and the 10 years of delivery of sustained growth to our country.

I have been in the House for 19 years. I came in with my right hon. Friends the Paymaster General and the Secretary of State for Transport. I have forgotten who was Chancellor of the Exchequer when I was first elected, but I do remember that every time a Conservative Chancellor stood up at the Dispatch Box to deliver a Budget, it was at a time of crisis. For 10 years we have had economic stability and growth, and that is a credit to the stewardship of the economy by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor—and, if I may say so, by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, who has been at the Treasury for as long as we have had a Labour Government.

Mr. Graham Stuart: It is a beautiful picture that the hon. Gentleman paints, and I am sure that we all enjoy the pastel colours in which he paints it, but will he concede that the stability and growth started long before the present Chancellor came to office? It started in 1992, since when we have experienced a period of continuous growth. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the stability was created by the reforms of the last Conservative Government, and that this Government inherited the strongest economy in Europe?

Keith Vaz: No, I do not accept that at all. All that I can remember—and, I am sure, all that the hon. Gentleman can remember from that time, during which he was outside the House—is crisis upon crisis, with Conservative Chancellors coming to the Dispatch Box to try and deal with one or another of them. Whether it was the exchange rate mechanism or some other issue, they were dealing with a crisis. What we have had is stability and growth. What we have had, in the words of the Chancellor, is cultural stability. People expect from this Government the ability to deliver Budgets that will help working people in this country, and that is exactly what we were given yesterday.

Mr. Stuart: Perhaps, as the hon. Gentleman's memory is failing him, he will look at the inflation figures for 1997, when the current Chancellor came to office. The inflation rate then was 1.8 per cent., compared with 2.1 per cent. in 2005. Real growth in gross domestic product in 1997 was 3.2 per cent., compared with 1.8 per cent. today. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will reflect on that and realise that the inheritance, not anything that the present Government have done, has made the difference.

Keith Vaz: Merely saying persistently that the economy was inherited does not justify the hon. Gentleman's proposition. I know that I will be 50 this year, but my memory is not failing me. I know what a crisis is, and that is what we had. I also know what stability is: the lowest level of inflation, the lowest interest rates, the lowest unemployment and the longest sustained period of growth in our country. I think that that is a huge credit to the Chancellor.

Of course, Oppositions have a duty to oppose what Governments do; that is the nature of opposition. I was an Opposition Member, along with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Transport and the Paymaster General, for 10 years before our party became the Government, and of course one of our duties was to scrutinise. However, when the economy is going well and sustaining and benefiting our constituents, political parties have a duty to say so and to congratulate those who have made it a success. Indeed, the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart), has benefited from the economy's strength. I am certain that if the economy were not a success, the Opposition would have offered today a much more severe critique of this Government's efforts, instead of the platitudes and nonsense that we heard from the right hon. Member for West Dorset. Therefore, I welcome this Budget and the success that we have enjoyed in the past 10 years.

I come now to three developments that we heard about for the first time yesterday, the first of which is the additional resources that will be given to education. The overall education budget has increased in the past 10 years, which is only right. It is important that we have given so much money to education and that the economy is strong, so that we can generate the resources to enable our schools to provide our children with the best education that they have ever had. Of particular importance was the decision to give the extra £440 million directly to head teachers. Members can doubtless cite past examples of secondary and primary heads raising with them their concerns about a particular expenditure item, or a staff issue that needed to be resolved. Under this Chancellor, instead of having to ask the local authority for money, heads have been able to use the special budget given to them to deal with urgent and emergency issues. The direct payment to secondary and primary heads gives them their own budget to spend on such matters, which is most welcome.

Like other Members, I write constantly to local education authorities asking for support for our schools. In the city of Leicester, we have a Liberal Democrat-Conservative coalition and, strangely, although they are unable to get along in Westminster, they get along extremely well in Leicester. Whenever I wanted to deal with a particular issue raised by a school in my constituency, I used to have to write directly to that coalition, and thus the paper chase began. Now, there is a budget that allows head teachers to interface directly with their stakeholders and to spend money on their schools. That is of enormous benefit to schools, head teachers and children.

Mr. Gauke: I presume that the hon. Gentleman supports the Education and Inspections Bill. In general, does he welcome the move to diminish the role of LEAs and to give greater power to schools, so that they do not have to deal with local government bureaucracies?

Keith Vaz: The hon. Gentleman tempts me to discuss a Bill that is not the subject of this debate—and I know, Madam Deputy Speaker, that you would admonish me if I went down that path. I voted for that Bill because it is in the best interests of our pupils and of education, but passing legislation is not enough; we must also give schools the money to implement these policies, which is exactly what the Chancellor has done.

The second specific expenditure item in the Budget—which I fully support—on which I want to touch is the money being given to prepare our children and young people for the 2012 Olympics. If we are to host the Olympics, it is absolutely vital that we have world-class athletes and that our young people are able to win medals. We cannot start indulging in these activities one or two years before the event. I know that we had a Labour Government for only three years before the millennium; nevertheless, we started our preparations for it far too late. We have six years in which to prepare our young people for the Olympic games, and we should all welcome the £600 million that has been allocated to allow us to train world-class athletes. There is a feeling in the east midlands, and Leicester in particular, that it is very much a London affair. By having the mini-Olympics all over the country—we certainly wish to ensure that we have them in Leicester—we will be able to train our young people early to compete with the best in the world. Starting six years ahead of time is right, so I welcome what the Government propose for the Olympics.

I also welcome the small but significant amount of money that will be provided to enable a memorial to be set up to those who died in the London bombings on 7 July last year. It is easy to forget and move on, but it is important that we understand the kind of society and country in which we live. Allocating funds for a memorial is not a mainstream issue for the Treasury—although of course money is—but it sends a powerful message that we stand united in the face of terrorism and that we will remember the innocent people who died, of all faiths and no faith, on that day. It is essential that we as a country recognise that and I hope that the money will be well spent. I hope that we will make a better job of it than we did the Diana memorial, which keeps flooding and which nobody can visit because people keep falling over. What a terrible memorial to a great public figure. I hope that the new memorial will be properly designed and executed so that we can remember those people properly.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): The hon. Gentleman has just told us all the things that he welcomes in the Budget. Given the situation of the NHS in Leicester, does he welcome the fact that the Chancellor did not mention the NHS yesterday?

Keith Vaz: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor spoke for one hour and two minutes, and that was a very, very long speech—as we all know. I do not think that we would have wanted my right hon. Friend to speak for any longer than that, so I quite understand it if he did not mention every single aspect of policy that the Treasury has been involved in over the past few years. He does not need to mention the NHS because he has given so much money to the health service in Leicester. From 1997 to 2006, the amount of money going to the health service in Leicester increased by 97 per cent. Waiting lists have gone down. However, I wait to hear from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health whether she will give the go-ahead to the pathway project, so that the three hospitals in Leicester that have been told that they can have £765 million can go ahead—just like Barts hospital, which has already received permission. However, that is not an announcement to be made by the Chancellor. As the hon. Gentleman knows as a former Health Minister and spokesman, it is the Secretary of State for Health who makes such announcements.

Mr. Burns: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman understands that the Chancellor did not have enough time to discuss health in his Budget, but does he not think that his constituents would have been interested in how the money that will be made available to the health service will deal with the deficits in Leicester?

Keith Vaz: No, because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is also a Member of Parliament for Leicester. We know where to go and whom to ask if we have any problems with the health service. I assure him that I shall meet my right hon. Friend shortly to ask her what is happening about the pathway project. I know that the money has been allocated and that the architects have spent £60 million on the hospital, so we want to know when work will start. Having my right hon. Friend there is very important because she will be able to give us the answers. We will expect those hospitals to be built, because that is the promise that was made. It is an issue not for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, but for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, and I will certainly raise it with her.

Mr. Bone: The hon. Gentleman and I share the same strategic health authority; it is the worst funded in the country, which is why we have problems in the health service in the east midlands. Would it not have been useful if the Chancellor had done something to even out funding?

Keith Vaz: No, because my right hon. Friend has done a huge amount for our health service, which we welcome, so the issue that the hon. Gentleman raises is not for my right hon. Friend. The money has been allocated and it now has to be spent. I am happy about the amount we received in Leicester, but I want the three hospitals to be modernised. That is the promise that was made and we shall hold everyone to it.

In his intervention from the Back Benches, the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), who has now resumed his Front-Bench duties, said that I supported everything in the Budget. I do, but two important elements were missing and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will deal with them in her response.

The first missing element was specific support for the textile industry. Thirty years ago, 140,000 people worked in the textile industry in Leicester; today, the number is 28,000. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), whose constituency is in the Northampton area, knows that textiles also affect his constituency. I am worried about the industry—about the high level of imports to the European Union and the EU's failure to act properly to stop the dumping of goods. I want specific measures and help for the textile and footwear industries in Leicester, which are important not just for Leicester but for the whole country. If we invest in them, it benefits our whole economy. Before the war, one in every five white shirts in Europe was manufactured in Leicester. We had a huge textile and footwear industry, but it is disappearing. I ask the Treasury to look at that industry before the next Budget, to make sure that specific help can be given.

The second omission from the Budget speech would have taken up only an extra minute—unlike the health service. It is the Treasury's current assessment of our readiness to join the euro. In his Budget last year, the Chancellor said that he was not authorising a new assessment, but it is important that the Treasury keeps the five economic tests under review. I am fully signed up to the need for us to pass specific tests to join the euro. I understand why the Chancellor has said that it must be done, but I am concerned that we are not keeping the tests under review. In previous Budgets, my right hon. Friend has talked about the need for an assessment, so I hope that in the winding-up speech we will find out what has happened to the current assessment. We may not have met the five economic tests, but we need to be kept informed.

My final point is about the Lisbon agenda, whose sixth anniversary we celebrate this year, and our role as a competitive economy in ensuring that the rest of Europe reacts to the Kok report, commissioned by the European Commission last year, and to the decisions being made this very day in the spring European Council. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General is a frequent visitor to ECOFIN, so she knows what it is like to deal with our European colleagues and how difficult it is to move countries along. The Lisbon scorecard is extremely important, because Lisbon was the first European summit to benchmark European economic success. We asked why, over the past decade, America was able to create 10 million jobs, while in Europe we could create only 1 million. It was due to the nature of our economies.

As my right hon. Friend knows, two reports have been issued this week. One was from the BRUEGEL group—the Brussels European and Global Economic Laboratory—and said that we were doing extremely badly and were way down the list in respect of the Lisbon scorecard. The second assessment, by the Centre for European Reform, was that we were at the top of the Lisbon scorecard, one of only three European Union countries to have met all three of Lisbon's employment targets.

It is all very well having the best economy in Europe, but we also need—I say this in all friendliness to my right hon. Friends—to ensure that we export some of that economic success to the rest of the European Union. That needs leadership from the United Kingdom on such issues and an acceptance that we must strive to achieve the benchmarks. We are leaders in Europe in economic reform and in the competitiveness of our economy. All that I ask is that we give emphasis and focus to those successes in the year that comes.

I have only praise for the Budget. I send a big thank you from my constituents to the Chancellor and his Treasury team for giving us the cultural stability that has been lacking in Britain for so many years.

2.40 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) is a fluent and capable speaker, but the collective memory of the House knows that that there is something wrong with his memory. To describe the period that Nigel Lawson was Chancellor as being a background of solid crisis is to show that the hon. Gentleman wasted the first few years that he was a Member. I remember very well the time that he was talking about. Indeed, the time of the Lawson reforms was the beginning of the settling of the economy's strength, which has given the extraordinary inheritance that the Chancellor benefited from when the Labour Government came to power. I imagine that, otherwise, his constituents will be much gratified by his speech and look forward to him exerting his authority to bring the mini-Olympics to Leicester, in which we look forward to seeing him perform in white shorts.

Hearing the Secretary of State for Transport speak is, on many occasions, like a near-death experience, and today was no exception. Even by his undemanding standards, it was an absolute corker of a speech. Given the huge transport issues that effect this country—many hon. Members face serious infrastructure problems in our constituencies—it was a very mere and disappointing speech indeed.

I congratulate the Chancellor on his 10th Budget—a record achieved only by one other Chancellor, Sir Nicholas Vansittart. I do not know what the Chancellor has got to swank about—this is the 21st Budget that I have sat through in the House—but achieving his 10th Budget is a notable milestone. I am prepared to congratulate him, as long as he is prepared to remember that in his time—it has not been a wholly unsuccessful time—he has been able to build on the golden inheritance that he inherited from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke).

I congratulate the Chancellor, as I have done every year since he has been Chancellor, on his decision to grant independence to the Bank of England. This time, I applaud very much the steps that the Government have taken, although belatedly, to assign more independence to the Office for National Statistics. I hope that that will enable us to bring greater integrity and accuracy to our statistics, which are so important for the assessment and forming of Government policy.

The Budget settles for the record the fact that the Chancellor is indeed a leading exponent of the old-fashioned tax-and-spend school. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, in his admirable and energetic response yesterday, was certainly right: the Chancellor has indeed raised billions, he has spent billions and he has very little idea of where the money has gone or how effectively hard-working people's tax funds have been spent and to what ends.

Listening to the Chancellor, he rather reminded me of Christopher Columbus in that when he set off he did not know where he was going, when he got there he did not know where he was, when he came back he did not know where he had been, and he did it all on borrowed money. Listening to his rather manic presentation, one was very conscious of the fact that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) pointed out, it is not necessarily how much money is spent, but the way in which it is spent that counts. Any number of taskforces and goodness knows what else will not be able to close that gap.

Whether it can be considered a triumph to achieve what the Chancellor calls sound public finances when taxation is nearing 39 per cent. of gross domestic product is in itself a question. What we do know is that his key policy mistake has been a massive transfer of resources into a largely unreformed public sector. His announcement of even larger spending increases on education and child care will, in my view, only make the situation worse. The long-term effect of the Budget will be a significantly higher tax burden, lower productivity and thus depressed growth, living standards and competitiveness, to our domestic and our international disadvantage. It is a huge disappointment that the Chancellor simply does not understand that while, of course, increased resources matter, so does a disciplined programme of expenditure matched with real reform and thus with better results. All the lessons of the past show that to be the case.

Let us take education. The decision to increase spending by £19 billion a year in real terms from taxpayer funds is extraordinary, given the record of recent years. The Government have already increased schools spending by 66 per cent. in real terms since 1999 with no discernable change whatever in the trend in examination results and the quality of the finished article leaving schools. Extra spending might be justifiable if it were preceded by a major programme of reform, but reform—that is to say, management autonomy and parental choice—has proceeded most slowly in education out of all the public services. The truth is that the source of the problem is the failure to deliver, even now, with all this money, a good education. That is what parents want to see and it is what the country wants to see. That needs to be tackled with real and energetic reform and not just large amounts of low-flying cash.

I was truly shocked that, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) pointed out, in the whole of the Chancellor's one hour and one minute speech, conducted at a decent gallop, he never even mentioned the national health service—almost the most important of all the Government programmes in terms of expenditure. I suppose that that is not really surprising given that he knows what he spends, but because the Government have totally failed to grip reform in the national health service, they have no idea what it really costs. The health service in my constituency and all over Sussex and elsewhere is struggling to cope with unfunded cost pressures, inherited debts and not enough time or support to help it through. With the greatest anxiety, I await the inevitable outcome of the cuts in services that must follow on from the situation of those health authorities. The excellent think-tank Reform estimates that, at the present rate of growth in the NHS, there will be a resource gap of £7 billion in 2010. That is an enormous sum of money and I would be grateful if the Paymaster General would tell me how she thinks that the Government intend to deal with that.

After the expenditure of all this money, hard-pressed taxpayers are entitled to ask, "Where are these world-beating public services?" The Chancellor has indeed taxed too much and borrowed too much. Old Labour has got its way under this Chancellor, which is, of course, why the Labour party cannot wait, by and large, to get rid of the Prime Minister and to put in his place a more user-friendly animal. Let us face it: under the Chancellor, the pips really are squeaking. He has saddled the taxpayer with the highest tax burden in history. Families are literally groaning under the impact of the amount of money that the state takes from them.

The Chancellor has imposed on commerce records levels of bureaucracy and red tape and he has blocked vital reforms in the public service. Even with some of the reforms that he has brought in, the valuable concept of a low-regulation, low-tax and competitive economy, which came to fruition in the later years of Baroness Thatcher and under John Major, is being rapidly eroded as business men and women sink every day into a bog of regulation and higher taxes. Had the Chancellor himself had the guts, will and determination truly to set about reforming the public sector by dealing with the vast array of old Spanish practices and the like that still remain, by increasing investment and by substantially extending choice in real terms, high-quality public services would today be available to everyone.

Where exactly is this modern and efficient transport system or even its beginnings? Where is the infrastructure expenditure that is glibly promised every year? I urge the Chancellor to consider carefully a message that came from a seminar that I held in my constituency last weekend ahead of the wholly unsustainable programme of house building that is wished on Mid-Sussex and the surrounding area by the Deputy Prime Minister: there should be a far more even distribution of infrastructure expenditure across the growth areas. Let me give the Paymaster General an example. The Government are spending enormous sums of infrastructure money around Ashford and in Milton Keynes. Mid-Sussex, and north-west Sussex generally, are going to have willed on them by the Deputy Prime Minister an enormous number of houses—not significantly fewer than Ashford—yet there is no commensurate Government spending on public infrastructure. The Government need to acknowledge the firm feeling that they should honour their obligations for infrastructure expenditure, rather than simply passing them incontinently across to the developers who rightly already make a major contribution.

I want to consider three areas on which the Chancellor and his people have done badly. I preface that by saying that I do not pretend that everything is bad. Many of the things that have been done are good. There are bits of our economy that are doing well, although, as I said, they should be doing well because of the Chancellor's remarkable inheritance.

I will quote from a speech made in the House by the Chancellor in 1989, when he was shadow Trade and Industry Secretary, on a pensions scandal when, again, the ombudsman blamed the Government of the day for bust pension schemes. The then shadow Trade and Industry Secretary railed against the "fecklessness, gullibility and incompetence of the Government who, for months and years, ignored all the warnings"—[Official Report, 19 December 1989; Vol. 164, c. 204–05.]

Today, the Chancellor who said that presents himself as the future leader of our country, but, frankly, he and the then Work and Pensions Secretary, who is now the Transport Secretary—I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber—debauched the public pensions system in this country.

Keith Vaz: It is disgraceful to say that.

Mr. Soames: It is not disgraceful at all.

The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the only welfare reform Minister whom the Government have had who was worth his stuff, said:

"when Labour came to office we had one of the strongest pension provisions in Europe and now probably we have . . . the weakest".

I say again that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is responsible for debauching the public pensions of this country. My hon. Friends will agree with every word of a passage from an article on pensions in The Times by Lord Rees-Mogg, who said that the Chancellor

"took all the big decisions on pensions. He has wrecked the system of private pensions. He has wrecked the system of public pensions. He has destroyed the system of savings. He has tapped pensions by deliberate stealth.

He has impoverished generations of old people, past, present and to come. The Chancellor's pension policy has been one of the great scandals of British financial history. He should be ever held responsible."

Many Conservative Members will agree entirely.

There was a great failing, too, by the Paymaster General. I am sorry to disoblige her, but the shambles of the tax credit system for which she is responsible is one of the most disgraceful episodes in the Government's history. Many people in my constituency and, indeed, throughout the country, are still paying the cost of that grotesque incompetence. The Chancellor has utterly failed to get a grip on the unfunded costs of public sector pensions and has made a unique contribution to off-balance-sheet accounting of well over £800 billion.

Before I conclude, I applaud the Chancellor's determination to try to do more to prepare Britain to compete in the great global economy. Because of the war in Iraq, which I supported at the time, and which I still support, although I deeply resent the way in which the Americans handled the post-conflict arrangements and the trouble that flowed from that, the exercise of soft power has become even more important. America's soft power has diminished like the winter snows, and the country has lost almost all credibility abroad. America has 13 carrier groups that it can deploy throughout the world, but to bomb the living daylights out of 30 people is not the most sensible way of using military power. Soft power matters. Our country has a wonderful tradition of the use of soft power, and our assets include the BBC World Service, the British Council, British art and culture, the great traditions of democracy at Westminster, the monarchy and the law. All those things command great influence overseas, so they are vital assets.

I am glad that the chapter entitled "Meeting the productivity challenge" in the Budget report includes a well-written passage about the United Kingdom as a competitive centre for global investment. However, when she deliberates on public spending I urge the Paymaster General to consider the need to deploy our soft power on an even greater scale. If we are to maximise the great opportunities afforded by the global economy, we must put more money into the great services provided by the British Council, the World Service and the Foreign Office. It is tremendously short-sighted to diminish the unbelievable expertise of the Foreign Office. Across the world, our remarkable diplomats do a wonderful job, so hacking away at the Foreign Office's overall budget is extremely short-term, bad politics and not in our national interest. It is in our national interest to make sure that those great assets are properly funded so that services do not struggle on a shoestring. A grotesque amount of money is spent ineffectively and inefficiently, and it would be spent much more efficiently and effectively by organisations such as the Foreign Office.

When travelling abroad, Ministers are always begged to provide more training places at our military establishments, not just at the Royal Military Academy Sandhurst, Cranwell or Dartmouth, but at some of the engineering and signals establishments—wonderful sources of brilliant expertise and knowledge that are acknowledged all over the world as leaders in their field. We are wonderfully good at defence diplomacy. Lord Robertson, when he was Secretary of State for Defence—and a very good one, in my view—made much of that in his White Paper. With the cuts and the huge pressure on the Ministry of Defence and on manpower, it is important to remember that defence diplomacy is a huge plus for this country. It may not be a great big item in the context of the health service and the education service, but it is vital to our national interest.

I had hoped that the Chancellor would announce yesterday a set of reforms to the planning system and the overweening bureaucracy and regulation that would release the energy of our economy. I am deeply depressed by what I heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) yesterday about the lack of integrity in the presentation of the Gershon figures. I hope that the Paymaster General will this evening give a truthful and accurate exposition of the Gershon figures. She may not have heard my hon. Friend say that the National Audit Office has not thought fit to sign off the Government's figures because it does not regard them as accurate.

I hope the right hon. Lady understands that the overwhelming bureaucracy and red tape are the reason that companies such as Google, Oracle and Amazon locate in Dublin, rather than London. That is very bad news for us. Those are the very companies that we want to attract and which we used to attract. We face losing not just low-skill, low-paid jobs to big emerging economies, but much more seriously, high-skill, high-paid jobs. China and India are producing 4 million university graduates a year.

The Chancellor's response to the global challenges facing Britain is to saddle this country with the highest tax burden in our history and record levels of red tape. I am glad to hear on all sides that the Chancellor has woken up to the international and domestic triumph that is the City of London. I declare my interest, which is registered in the Register of Members' Interests.

The booklet entitled, "Financial services in London: Global opportunities and challenges" is a very good document that has been warmly received in the City. Having kept the City at a distance and not having helped it at all for years, finally the Chancellor embraces it as he knows he is about to become Prime Minister. That is a good thing, because the City of London has done more for the country than anyone could possibly imagine through its expertise and its overseas earnings.

There remains tremendously important work to be done to fix a crisis in competitiveness, productivity, training and education to prepare our economy and our people of all ages for the global challenges that we face. This was not a Budget that prepares Britain for a new global economy.

3.4 pm

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Tackling climate change and protecting the environment was one of the central themes of yesterday's Budget. When I saw that the Conservatives had put up the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) to open the debate, I thought that that would be a major theme of the Conservative contribution today. The right hon. Gentleman was evidently allocated to perform another role in the debate, but at least he did not perform it in the same foaming-at-the-mouth, carpet-chewing style of his leader yesterday, for which we must be grateful.

Although the right hon. Member for West Dorset did not take up the issue of climate change and the environment, I should like to record my welcome for the fact that the Chancellor chose to put it at the heart of the Budget, thereby reflecting the increasing concerns of our constituents. Some environmental organisations have, naturally, criticised the Budget for not delivering all that they would want, but that is in the nature of campaigning organisations. That said, some elements of the Budget have received a positive response from those organisations.

Mr. Graham Stuart: The hon. Gentleman's expertise is recognised across the House. This Budget focused more on green issues than did the previous nine, but does he accept that the history of those 10 Budgets has been the Chancellor's failure to convert into action Labour's intentions before the 1997 election to change from taxing "goods" to taxing "bads" and fundamentally change this country's approach to its environmental responsibilities. That is why emissions have risen, and yesterday's Budget will make little difference.

Mark Lazarowicz: No, I do not accept that. We are on course to meet our targets, as long as we continue to take the right policy decisions. We must, however, do more to ensure that tackling climate change is at the centre of Government policy. Growing public concern has been reflected in this year's Budget and in previous policies. I hope that the general positive response that the environmental proposals have received—from the hon. Gentleman, it would appear, in some respects—will hearten the Chancellor and encourage him to do more to ensure that climate change is at the top of our priorities. In that context, important decisions will be made over the next few months about the emissions trading scheme, about bringing aviation into the scheme and about the response to the Stern review.

Ed Balls: What does my hon. Friend think that the green NGOs make of the fact that the Conservatives remain opposed to the climate change levy? What signal does that send about their environmental credentials?

Mark Lazarowicz: NGOs will draw a clear conclusion about the Conservatives' environmental credentials. I was about to come to the climate change levy, so I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding us of the Conservatives' continual failure to move an inch on the levy. They have made so many U-turns and flip-flops that it might have been easy for them to change policy on the levy, yet they remain obdurate in their refusal to do so.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the climate change levy, by being a tax on energy and not on carbon, is wrongly based? The Conservative party and four other parties have offered to work with the Government to tackle the biggest environmental issue facing the world, but the Government have refused. What does he think about that?

Mark Lazarowicz: I am going to come to the question of working together in a moment. The fact is that the climate change levy has led to significant reductions in carbon emissions. By 2010, it will allow the overall energy demand in the economy to be reduced by more than 6 per cent. Unless the hon. Gentleman is living on another planet, which I am sure he is not, he will at least accept that a fair element of the energy that we use originates from carbon. That is why the levy has a heavy impact on carbon emissions.

[Mark Lazarowicz]

It is not only me or the Government who say that. When I sat on the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee in the last Parliament, we had an investigation into the means to tackle climate change. The various groups that came before us to give evidence did not say that the climate change levy was the wrong instrument but that it should be increased. That is why it is particularly welcome that the Chancellor said that it will be indexed so that it will be seen to have an impact on reaching our targets on CO_2 emissions.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): There is no doubt that the Conservatives' environmental policies are incoherent and all over the place. My hon. Friend and I were fellow-members of the EFRA Committee in the last Parliament. Does he recall the evidence from representatives of the energy-intensive industries such as the construction products industries in my constituency, and brick-making, who argued that the climate change agreements have delivered the reduction in emissions? At a time of high energy prices, they would welcome some respite, but recognise that penalties are needed if CCAs are not complied with. They have a point, do they not?

Mark Lazarowicz: The two elements go together. On their present trends, the climate change levy and the climate change agreements will have a roughly similar effect in terms of a reduction of carbon emissions. They both have their role to play. Clearly, any tax can be refined and improved, but the key point is that the levy has had a significant impact on reducing emissions in the UK. Independent—not Government—research has shown that it has had a significant impact on the behaviour of businesses. Adding that fairly small, but visible, element to their costs encourages them not only to reduce their energy costs but to look at other ways of operating and improving energy overall, which has a positive effect on our carbon emission reduction targets. We must also bear it in mind that taken together, the overall effect of the reductions in energy demand and in national insurance contributions has been a reduction in costs for business as a whole. That has to be seen in the round. Elements can always be adjusted and improved, but the general direction is one that we should support.

I am genuinely puzzled by the Conservatives' refusal at least to give some qualified backing to the climate change levy. They are entitled to say that they want to see change but this is not the right one and they would do something else in future. We get one or two hints of what that might be from vague references to a carbon tax, but merely saying that that might be the answer does not take us much further, because it could be applied in many ways. We have not seen anything representing a worked-out proposal from the Conservatives—perhaps we will hear about it later in the debate—so we have no idea of what alternative they would put in place.

No doubt their conversion to the green agenda is genuine, although there may be some exceptions. However, they cannot tell us time and again that we will have to wait until the machinery—no doubt wind-powered—of Conservative think-tanks grinds out some kind of policy recommendation before they come off the fence on the climate change levy. Surely the right position, if they were really concerned about the issue, would be for them to say, "We don't think it's the best policy and it's not our preferred policy, but it's making a difference and having an impact. We will support it now and in the Lobby at the end of these debates on Tuesday, and in due course we will come forward with an alternative." Surely the Conservative party should not undermine a policy that has had a significant effect on reducing carbon emissions. Everyone who has an interest in the subject and knows about it realises that.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): Perhaps my hon. Friend can reflect in his eloquent speech on the importance of the climate change levy and the contribution that it makes to reducing our carbon emissions. He will recall that, when the Government introduced the levy, the Conservative party not only opposed it but had no alternative suggestions for dealing with climate change.

Mark Lazarowicz: Indeed. Perhaps we are not much further forward but doubtless we will hear about it if such alternatives are proposed.

Mr. Ellwood: The hon. Gentleman questions the sincerity of the Conservative party's green credentials. Can the Labour party fulfil its 2001 or 2005 manifesto commitment to reduce carbon emissions?

Mark Lazarowicz: I do not question the sincerity of the Conservative party. I am prepared to accept that, for whatever reason, a change of direction has occurred. Conversion is one thing but it must be followed by specific policies if one is to make a difference and persuade the country that it is not some form of tactical, short-term change.

Our policies are moving in the right direction and they have made a significant impact. The climate change review next week will outline the other steps that we are taking to try to ensure that we reach our international and national targets.

Mr. Graham Stuart: I believe that the hon. Gentleman is genuinely committed. Unlike with so many Labour Members, I do not find it necessary to denigrate the motives of my political opponent. However, he has not mentioned that, under the Government, CO_2 emissions have increased and are continuing to rise. That is a failure of Government policy. Emissions fell under the Conservatives and are increasing under Labour. This dirty Chancellor is letting down the environment.

Mark Lazarowicz: We accept that we need to do more to reach our targets. However, without the climate change levy, carbon emissions would be even higher. That stands to reason. The hon. Gentleman should accept that, if we are to hit our targets—we have all said that we will do that—the climate change levy has an important role to play. I am therefore disappointed and genuinely puzzled by the way in which the Conservative party will not move on the issue.

The Opposition's approach is unfortunate if we are trying to hold a serious debate on how to make progress on policy. I do not want to spend all my time on the climate change levy, but its beneficial impact on carbon emissions is acknowledged. If we cannot get even qualified Conservative support for it, we encourage disillusionment and cynicism outside the House, and the idea that all we do in here is talk about tackling climate change without effecting specific policies. I therefore hope that the Conservative party may yet reconsider its position.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that we can now see the difference between the public statements that the Leader of the Opposition has made on climate change and what is actual Conservative policy? Where is the substance? Is it not clear from the fact that the Conservatives are not conceding on this issue that the gimmicky things that their leader has been saying over the past few weeks have no substance?

Mark Lazarowicz: I shall be more charitable than my hon. Friend. All I am saying is that I am posing questions on this issue, and that it is reasonable to expect answers from a party that claims to wish to be elected to Government at some stage in the future, although one might have doubts as to how soon that will be.

Another reason why the Conservatives' refusal to move on the climate change levy is so unfortunate is that, in the past, the right hon. Member for West Dorset and other Conservative Members who have been involved in these debates have recognised that we need a broad political consensus if Governments are to have the political space to introduce the undoubtedly radical measures that are required to tackle climate change. If we cannot get practical evidence of support for a consensus on the climate change levy, we are entitled to ask how much chance there is of getting a consensus on the wider agenda.

The Budget proposed an increase in vehicle excise duty for gas guzzlers, and I believe that that proposal has the support of the Conservatives, although I might be wrong. Some of their Back Benchers seemed to suggest that the proposed rate of duty was not high enough. Whatever their position today, however, there is no doubt that, a few years ago, such a Budget proposal would have caused uproar and resulted in all sorts of media campaigns against it. Now, however, the political atmosphere has changed, and such policies attract a positive response from the vast majority of the public, apart from a few moans and grumbles. We have yet to discover the Liberal Democrats' position on this, and I was surprised to hear some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) earlier. Nevertheless, I believe that this proposal is generally accepted as the right thing to do.

Mr. Jones: Like my hon. Friend, I welcome that change. Is he, too, looking forward to seeing those on the Conservative Front Bench getting rid of their gas-guzzling cars and following the great example set by their leader in choosing an ecologically friendly Government car?

Mark Lazarowicz: When I cycled into the House of Commons yesterday morning, I was interested to see a large number of Conservative Front Benchers also coming in by bike. I am sure that that was not a one-off gesture purely for the purposes of Budget day, and I am equally sure that we shall soon see hon. Members from across the House following their excellent example.

If we can achieve public consensus on an increase in vehicle excise duty on cars that consume more fuel, perhaps we can now start moving into a political space where we can take the even more difficult decisions that will be necessary to tackle climate change, particularly in terms of transport.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Government's green taxes have not kept pace with inflation, and that they have actually fallen as a proportion of people's expenditure? If we are serious about introducing green taxes to encourage people to use more environmentally friendly cars or aeroplanes, they need to be uprated fairly regularly.

Mark Lazarowicz: The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point.

We will have to revisit the level of tax on fuel for motor vehicles. However, the Chancellor said yesterday that he would delay the decision on an increase in fuel duty until later this year by continuing the freeze until 1 September, and there are good reasons for doing so. The present high level of world oil prices will clearly have had a bearing on that decision, which is understandable. However, I would not be surprised if there was a concern somewhere in the Chancellor's mind about the possible political consequences were we to return to a regular uprating of vehicle fuel duty.

If we seriously look at the issue, we will all know that, in spite of recent increases, the cost of motoring in real terms has gone down over the longer term and that the increase in greenhouse gas emissions as a result of increases in road traffic has been an important contributor to the UK's overall greenhouse gas position. One of the most powerful factors influencing the extent of use of motor vehicles is the cost of motoring. We cannot get away from that. We all know that it is true.

If we are really serious, we have to do something about the problem. Yet again, we have not heard any serious suggestions from those on the Opposition Front Benches about what we might do to recognise that reality. We certainly did not get them from those on the Conservative Front Bench. When the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) was not in the Chamber, I quoted from the comments made by the Liberal Democrat leader in the Budget debate yesterday. He criticised the new vehicle excise duty on 4x4s as being a very limited measure. I made the point that the impression that we gained from the comment made by the leader of the Liberal Democrats and repeated elsewhere during the day was that he was against the measure because it did not go far enough. He was in favour—so it would appear—of a higher increase in vehicle excise duty. That is certainly in line with what the hon. Member for Rochdale has just said. He nods so he seems to agree that he would like to see higher vehicle excise duty on the top-range vehicles.

When I pressed this point with the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland earlier in the debate, he seemed to say that he was not in favour of an increase in tax on the high fuel-consuming vehicles in certain circumstances. He seemed to say that he would be against such a measure in remote and rural areas. One suspects that there is a close correlation between remote and rural areas and Liberal Democrat constituencies. Once again, we see the Liberal Democrat tendency to talk green at one level, but to explain to their constituents that it will not really affect them. Someone else will be green, but not them.

Paul Rowen: I apologise for not being in the Chamber when my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) made his remarks. I was in the Standing Committee considering the Road Safety Bill. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), who owns a Jaguar, made it clear that there should be a higher tax on his car. However, we must draw a distinction between farmers who may need a Range Rover to do their job—they can be recognised, and they are already exempt through the red diesel provision—and those who use their car for leisure. Exemptions could be made in certain circumstances. That is the point that my right hon. and learned Friend was making.The general point is that there must be a proper discussion about the use of green taxes if we are going to get people—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his point.

Mark Lazarowicz: The point that I was making rather meekly was that the Liberal Democrat policy was to be in favour of being green in general, but not of being green in particular. I shall leave the House to decide whether the hon. Gentleman has refuted my assertion.

Ed Balls: Does my hon. Friend agree that, whether it is the top rate of tax or the top rate of vehicle excise duty, the Liberal Democrat position is still very hard to fathom?

Mark Lazarowicz: I cannot but agree. The position of the Liberal Democrats has been of some interest to the House, and I notice that, at the end of yesterday's debate, the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne), who also speaks for the Liberal Democrats on these issues, seemed to endorse the proposal from the Energy Saving Trust for the increase in VED at the top end of the range to go up to £2,000 rather than £200. That appears to be the direction of their policy, but no doubt it would not apply to Liberal Democrat voters living in Liberal Democrat constituencies.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that for the leader of the Liberal Democrats, who, as we have heard from the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen), drives a large Jaguar—clearly, he does not transport sheep around in it—the challenge would be to give up that vehicle as a good example for the green lobby in this country?

Mark Lazarowicz: The leader of the Liberal Democrats happens to be a constituent of mine, and I must admit that I have not seen him drive his Jaguar around the constituency with sheep or anything else in it. I shall leave it to him to make his choice.

In directing my comments at the Conservative, Liberal Democrat and, for that matter, Scottish National party and Unionist Members, my purpose is to say that if we are to get a genuinely comprehensive approach to controlling emissions from motor vehicles, we must address the cost of motoring. Unless that cost gradually increases, we will see increasing use of motor vehicles, with the consequential effect on CO_2 emissions. If hon. Members accept that, as I am sure that they would, it is fair for me to ask them to give a guarantee to the House. Were the Chancellor, later this year, to go ahead with the increase in fuel duty, would they back him in that decision and not jump on a bandwagon with all sorts of unsavoury individuals to say why they cannot support an increase in that particular case?

Mr. Graham Stuart: The hon. Gentleman demeans his green reputation by playing party politics to cover up the Government's failure. There are serious points to be made in this debate, and he is more than capable of making them. Is he aware that this year, for the first time in a number of years, the CO_2 emissions impact of the United Kingdom's newly bought vehicle fleet is worse than that of the previous year's fleet? That is an unfortunate turn for the worse under this Government.

Mark Lazarowicz: I was not trying to go too far down the road of making party political points, but the nature of the Chamber tends to encourage one to do that. My fundamental point is that if we are to get a real political consensus on tackling climate change—a genuine one, not a notional one—that requires parties across the Chamber to recognise the steps being taken. When, later in the year, we inevitably debate the level of fuel duty, I hope that the same commitment to tackle climate change will be shown by Opposition Members, rather than, as often happens, they deciding to jump on whatever bandwagon seems most popular with voters in the short term.

Stewart Hosie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mark Lazarowicz: As I mentioned the SNP, I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Stewart Hosie: The hon. Gentleman is generous. I also enjoyed the badinage between him and the Liberals. On a serious point, however, does he recognise the difference between a working 4x4 vehicle used by a hill farmer to take feed to a field of lambs in the late spring when there is snow on the ground, and a brand new Porsche Cayenne sitting outside a large house in Kensington?

Mark Lazarowicz: I recognise the difference. In those circumstances, however, I suspect that the costs could be reflected in other ways in the income and expenditure of the particular business, but that would take us in another direction.

My point is that it is easy for people to say that they are in favour of increases in VED on gas-guzzling cars and then to find all sorts of reasons why it does not apply to them or their constituency. We have seen some evidence from the Liberal Democrats today that they are moving towards that approach. I had not expected to speak at such length, and I will try to conclude my remarks soon.

Just as motor vehicles raise the issue of fuel duty, the increase in air travel raises the issue of the continual and worrying rise in greenhouse gas emissions and of what measures to implement in response. I would have liked an increase in air passenger duty in the Budget, or some alternative form of taxation, in recognition of the problem caused by the growth in air travel. If we are to have a serious debate, the Opposition parties should make clear whether they are or are not in favour of an increase in air passenger duty at least in line with inflation. The hon. Member for Eastleigh seemed to imply that he was in favour of such an increase, but it was not clear that that was Liberal Democrat policy.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): While many of us may want an increase, or indeed the imposition of tax on aviation fuel, that view would be expressed more credibly by Labour Members if the Government were not expanding the supply of airport space. When the availability of airport space is restricted, the price of using that space goes up and the increase must be passed on to the consumer, but when the space expands, the price of air travel continues to fall.

Mark Lazarowicz: I have made clear my own reservations about the airport policy in so far as it affects my area and others, but I think that it would be wrong to think that the issue could be dealt with through airport policy alone. We must think about the pricing of air travel as well. It is a complex issue, and we are right to try and tackle it at a European and international level, but I think we could consider it here in the United Kingdom as well. I think that it would have been better if the Budget had provided for an index-linked rise in air passenger duty rather than a freeze.

Paul Rowen: Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne), our environment spokesman, has made our policy very clear? It was discussed at our conference in Harrogate a few weeks ago. We are in favour of exactly what the hon. Gentleman has proposed.

Mark Lazarowicz: I am glad that we appear to be clear about the fact that that is the Liberal Democrats' policy, although I must say again—without wanting to become involved in the badinage in which some Members wish to engage—that it is a pity that the Liberal Democrat policy in theory is not the same policy that is applied in practice. In Scotland, where the Liberal Democrats are in government, the Liberal Democrat transport Minister is subsidising air travel to many parts of the world. Indeed, he recently introduced an air travel subsidy for, as it happens, the constituency of Orkney and Shetland. First-class as well as economy tickets are being subsidised. As I have said, it is all very well to have a policy in theory, but in the case of the Liberal Democrats we sometimes do not see the same policy in practice.

We should think about what will happen if we are to be able to secure enough broad consensus and political space to allow Governments to take steps such as increasing air passenger duty. We all know what might well happen if there were a major increase: there would be all sorts of tabloid campaigns about its affecting people's ability to go on holiday, and so forth. That is why it is fair for me to ask the Opposition parties to be clear about their policy. We seem to have received a response from the Liberal Democrats, but it would be interesting to know whether the Conservatives are in favour of at least the index-linking of air passenger duty. The fact that none of them are choosing to intervene may speak for itself.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I do not believe that working families would want their opportunities to travel abroad for holidays to be affected in any way. Does my hon. Friend agree, though, that there is a fundamental difference between a rather inexpensive holiday abroad and flights being offered at 99p? That is sheer abuse, and we must try to control it as best we can.

Mark Lazarowicz: Indeed we must.

Let me summarise the main points that I have tried to make in a speech that became longer than it was intended to be. I think that the Budget set out—as we apparently say nowadays—a clear direction of travel in terms of the priority given to tackling climate change and environmental policy, and I welcome that. I believe that we need to go further with fuel duty not only on cars and other such vehicles, but on aviation. I challenge the Opposition parties to make it clear that they are prepared to go in that direction and to provide the political space for the Government to implement such measures.

I say again to the Conservatives that being prepared at least to reconsider their position on the climate change levy would be much greater evidence of their commitment to tackling climate change.

This is a good Budget and I welcome its commitment to tackling climate change. I particularly welcome the extra funding given to microgeneration, a subject with which my private Member's Bill deals. Indeed, I should have declared earlier an interest in that regard, which is listed in the Register of Members' Interests. That Bill is an example of how we can make progress on such issues through broad, cross-party support. The public are genuinely interested in taking steps in their own homes and communities to respond to the challenge presented by climate change. I welcome the Government's decision to put climate change and environmental issues at the heart of the Budget, and in doing so they are responding to growing public concern about such issues.

3.41 pm

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): I wish that I could welcome the Budget in the same way as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz), but sadly, I cannot. Looking back at the 10 Budgets presented by this Chancellor of the Exchequer, the step on which to congratulate him is his granting independence to the Bank of England. Indeed, it is a pleasure to have here today the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls), who is viewed by many as the true architect of that policy. As with quite a few other polices, it showed that after 18 years of Labour refusing to accept the reforms introduced, quite properly, by the previous Conservative Government, young new Labour figures such as the hon. Gentleman had at last grasped the importance of stability and a proper, market-based economy, and that they had accepted the settlement left behind by that Government.

If this House is to contribute properly, be it on the environment or the economy, we should all try to deal with the facts as they are, instead of trying to spin every single fact purely for our own party political purposes. Unfortunately, such spinning is a Labour tendency, and I suppose that after three consecutive election victories, Labour Members may feel a bit like the Leeds United of the 1970s, who, by kicking their way to the first division title, came to think that that was a fine way to play the beautiful game. Well, in this political game, twisting the truth is not the right way to go.

The acceptance that I and other Conservatives seek is acceptance that our economy's stability and growth started many years before the current Chancellor took office, and that the previous, Conservative Government turned this country from a basket-case in 1979—bankrupted by the socialism that is still expressed by interesting specimens on the Labour Back Benches—into the most powerful economy in Europe in 1997. If Labour Members would accept that, we could move on to a more constructive debate on the way forward.

In considering what happened since Labour inherited the strongest economy in Europe, we should take note of the booklet produced as part of the Budget papers, entitled "Productivity in the UK 6: Progress and new evidence". It says that "productivity is the key long-run determinant of economic growth and . . . is even more important in an increasingly global world."

The hon. Member for Normanton nods; he may even have been the author of those words. It continues:

"In the long-run, economic theory"—

we are definitely in the hon. Gentleman's territory there—

"suggests that only increases in labour productivity growth can produce ongoing increases in living standards . . . productivity is the main determinant of improvements in national prosperity . . . because gains from labour utilisation are limited."

That is the Government's policy on productivity, so let us look at the record.

From listening to Labour Members, one would think that the Government had taken triumphant steps forward on productivity, which is, they say, the key determinant of the future prosperity of this nation, but they have not. In Labour's first term, productivity growth was 2.1 per cent. In Labour's second term, it dropped to 1.3 per cent., and in Labour's third term so far there has been a 0.4 per cent. increase in productivity. The key determinant of the future strength and prosperity of this nation has been systematically undermined term by term by this Government. In comparison, the last five years of the Conservative Government, from 1992 to 1997, saw productivity growth of 2.6 per cent.

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman's memory is selective. What were the figures for productivity between 1980 and 1982, when there was a recession, and between 1988 and 1992, when there was a further recession? Those were the circumstances with which my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) and others had to grapple to ensure that we did not return to those days.

Mr. Stuart: As the hon. Gentleman knows, as this country went from a socialist basket case in 1979 to the most powerful economy in Europe in 1997, there were difficult decisions to be made. The British people were involved in times of great sacrifice, including depressions and high interest rates. The overall balance was, of course, the transformation—Labour Members know this full well—of this country's economic base between 1979 and 1997.

This Government inherited the strongest economy in Europe—[Interruption.] Well, I do not know whether Labour Members have any interest in manufacturing but it has, historically at least, been important to this country. In the last four years of the Conservative Government, manufacturing employment increased by some 200,000. Since Labour came to power, manufacturing employment has fallen by 1.1 million.

Ed Balls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stuart: I am delighted to give way to the hon. Gentleman, who will be able to explain why this Labour Government have destroyed manufacturing jobs, whereas under the previous Conservative Government such jobs were increasing.

Ed Balls: There are so many different points that one could make that it is difficult to know where to start, but this is only an intervention. Between 1980 and 1982, manufacturing employment fell, not by 1.1 million but by 3 million, as a result of the deepest recession since the second world war. That was then followed between 1990 and 1992 by the longest recession since the second world war. We can trade statistics, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in retrospect, it was a mistake for the Conservative party to vote against Bank of England independence in 1997?

Mr. Stuart: I entirely and happily agree that the independence of the Bank of England was a good thing. However, the hon. Gentleman has failed to recognise the transformation that I have described. He is more knowledgeable on matters economic than most of us, but he is still too grudging to acknowledge that. I have noticed that almost every one of his contributions in the House seems to be a partisan attack on an Opposition party.

The House would benefit from the hon. Gentleman's intellect and—as I know privately—charm, if he used them constructively to deal with the world as it is and not as a partisan punch ball. Any fair-minded or neutral person would recognise my description of the background when the Government came to power.

In my constituency, the number of people employed in manufacturing in the last three years of the last Conservative Government increased by 3,000; since the Labour Government came to power, those jobs have reduced by 1,600. That is a lot of families whose jobs have been destroyed. By undermining manufacturing, the Government have helped to undermine the future prosperity of the country.

Earlier I mentioned some figures that showed the contrast between 1997 and the present, but they are worth repeating. In 1997, when the Chancellor came to power, inflation was lower than it is at present—contrary to the impression one might receive when listening to Labour Members. The rate of inflation in 1997 was 1.8 per cent., compared with 2.1 per cent. in 2005. Real GDP growth in 1997 was 3.2 per cent., compared with 1.8 per cent. at present.

Stephen Hesford rose—

Mr. Stuart: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is about to acknowledge the strength of the economy in 1997 and the turnaround that had taken place. It would be a step forward if some honesty started to appear in the speeches of Labour Members.

Stephen Hesford: The hon. Gentleman is generous in giving way. It is not so much 1997 that I want to talk about, but the accuracy of the figures that he is coming out with. Is he comparing like with like? The two inflation figures that he has given were calculated on a different basis.

Mr. Stuart: I am taking the figures from Government statistics, so I could not possibly say whether they had been manipulated—whether appropriately or not. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has a better idea about that, especially as so many of the statistics produced by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor have so often proved elastic—shall we say?—in their derivation.

Mr. Russell Brown: During the Budget debates in 1997, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) came very close indeed to admitting that when the Conservatives left power the economy was on the verge of overheating.

Mr. Stuart: It is extraordinary to have a speech from nine years ago in which someone almost said something mentioned as strong evidence against the case being put. That perfectly encapsulates the weakness of the arguments of Labour Members. If that is the strongest question they can put, they have no case at all.

Mr. Brown rose—

Ed Balls rose—

Mr. Stuart: I have been generous and I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in due course, but I want to make some progress, and it is certainly clear from the intervention of the hon. Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown) that no progress will quickly be made by giving way to Labour Members, who will not accept the most basic facts about the economy.

Ed Balls rose—

Mr. Stuart: Well, I will give way to the persistent hon. Gentleman.

Ed Balls: May I clarify the situation? My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown) is right: in 1997, while inflation was low, the problem with the economy was that it was growing too strongly. When the Labour Government came to power, Treasury forecasts predicted inflation moving above 4 per cent. over the next year. The hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) may remember that in the six months before the change of Government, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer had constantly ignored advice from the Governor of the Bank of England that interest rates needed to rise. The change of Government and Bank of England independence actually restored stability to an overheating and dangerously inflationary economy.

Mr. Stuart: The hon. Gentleman makes a unique argument in the House against the last Conservative Government—that growth was too great. Growth was great in 1997, and growth, particularly in productivity, has fallen off since. He will have written many essays on the importance of productivity as the key determinant of the future prosperity of this nation, but he has failed to come back at all on the Government's productivity record. I would particularly enjoy an intervention on that subject.

Ed Balls: I am extremely happy to come back on that specific point. The figures set out clearly in the Red Book and in the document to which the hon. Gentleman refers show that, over this economic cycle, the productivity growth rate has been higher than in the previous economic cycle, when the Conservative Government were in power. Those are not just the Government's figures; the National Audit Office has audited the trend rate of growth. Under this Government, the trend rate of growth in the economy, based on rising employment and productivity growth, has gone up. So I am afraid that the facts are the opposite of what the hon. Gentleman implies.

Mr. Stuart: I am afraid that no light was thrown by that intervention on the fact that productivity has not been growing under this Government. Interestingly, that brings me to my next point, which relates to the figures produced by the Chancellor. I welcome something else in yesterday's Budget: the fact that the gathering of national statistics will be put on a truly independent basis. Opposition Members have been saying for many years since the Chancellor came to power that, unfortunately, the public no longer trusted the figures that he provided.

Yesterday's debate on the Budget threw up, in a powerful speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark)—the main points of which are well worth repeating, given that the Chancellor's key aide is here—the fact that John Oughton, the head of the Office of Government Commerce, which is the main watchdog to ensure that procurement is carried out properly in government, was asked at a sitting of the Public Accounts Committee:

> "As I understand it, the process of collating this information involved the Treasury ringing round departments asking what savings they could offer up in time to be mentioned in the Budget with no checks at all."

That was in the context of coming up with the £2 billion in Gershon savings that the Chancellor mentioned last year. When that question was put to the head of the OGC, he replied:

"That is an accurate statement of the gains as they were reported in the spring of 2005."

That is a damning condemnation of the way that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is prepared to manipulate figures to come up with whatever is required to provide him with a political platform. This year Sir John Bourn, the Comptroller and Auditor General and head of the National Audit Office, offered to check the figures, and my hon. Friend told us yesterday:

"Once again, the numbers that the Chancellor presented as definitive Gershon savings have not been signed off by the National Audit Office."—[Official Report, 22 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 371.]

In that context I, along with other Opposition Members, welcome the prospect of a proper, independent national statistics service in future.

Yesterday's Budget speech was over an hour long, but the Chancellor did not mention the NHS even once. Could that be because when there is a problem the Chancellor distances himself as fast as he can? Is there is problem in the NHS today? Absolutely. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has been the road block to reform—the man who said before they came to power that a Labour Government would be wise spenders, not big spenders—has splurged spending on the NHS without proper reform. That is why people ask, "How has all this money been spent with so little to show for it?" The number of NHS administrators has increased by 66 per cent., whereas the number of doctors and nurses has increased at a fraction of that percentage. The Prime Minister's own policy unit said in 2004 that health service productivity had fallen by 20 per cent. since the Labour Government came to power.

At the heart of what is wrong with the Government is the fact that all we ever hear from them, in the context of the Budget or anything else, is a reiteration of their spending levels. No one is in doubt about the level of spending; what is in doubt is whether that spending has been wise. It has been big, but it has not been wise.

I looked at the chapter on improving productivity in the Red Book. One acronym did not appear at all in that chapter, or in the Chancellor's speech: NHS. The Red Book had nothing to say about improving productivity in the NHS. However, there is a chapter called "Understanding Productivity"—a useful section for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after so many years of failing to promote it in the private or the public sector—in "Productivity in the UK 6". We find that, despite its being said that productivity is the main determinate, the truth is that while spending has doubled, productivity on the standard measures in the NHS has fallen. Page 22 of "Productivity in the UK 6"—this is where we have to look to find the truth of what has gone on in our NHS—states:

"Estimates using National Accounts measures show an average fall of between 0.6 per cent. and 1.3 per cent. a year over the period 1995–2004."

Spending on the NHS has doubled. The number of bureaucrats and administrators has been increased by 66 per cent., yet productivity in the NHS—the supposed show piece of this Labour Government—has fallen. That is why, across the country, thousands of health workers have already received notice that they will lose their jobs and thousands more are waiting to be told that. A financial deficit afflicts the national health service because of Labour's mismanagement and failure of understanding. I hope that the Minister who responds later will deal head on with the issue of productivity in the NHS and what can be done to turn round the lamentable record so far, so that the record sums that have gone into the NHS can show through in an improvement in treatment.

I already feel as though I have tried your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I would like to finish on the subject of the environment. The Chancellor's raids on pensions and the undermining of the security of hard-working people in old age has been disgraceful, and the failure to produce honest statistics has been equally shabby, but the Chancellor has been a complete and utter disgrace on the environment. There has been a failure to deliver on the promises that were made before the Government came to power and, at every step—every Budget—it has been the Chancellor who has failed to deliver the mechanisms by which the country could change from a policy of growing emissions to one of cutting them.

The global leadership that the leader of the Labour party is so keen to spout worldwide is not matched by any kind of improvement at home. The masking effort carried out by Labour Members in using the climate change levy as the sole test of any politician's environmental credentials is false. We have the climate change levy and we have a Labour Government—and under that Government emissions have risen. To be posing as in any way environmentally friendly while emissions have risen is nothing short of disgraceful.

Be it on pensions, productivity, or honesty and statistics, the Government have failed. On the environment, and on the long-term future of the country and of the world, perhaps they will be seen by many to have failed most of all.

4.4 pm

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): We are having a wide-ranging debate. Several hon. Members mentioned pensions and I know that others wish to speak, so I shall briefly focus on matters relating to pensions and, especially, the plight of our poor pensioners, before talking about business competitiveness in Northern Ireland and the opportunities that the Chancellor missed in his Budget to help in that regard.

I acknowledge the improvements over recent years that have been made on pensioner poverty. I also acknowledge that the Chancellor announced yesterday the national bus scheme that will give pensioners free bus travel. There will also be increased funding for the insulation programme and the retention of the winter fuel allowance. However, the Chancellor failed to address several aspects of pensioner poverty. As several hon. Members have said, there is deep concern and anger among many people about the failure to continue the council tax rebate, which was applied as a rate rebate in Northern Ireland. Many people think that as the rebate was announced in the run-up to last year's election, the Government have cynically refused to continue it this year because they know that the next election will be some time away.

If there was any logic behind the Government's position on the rebate, they would have carried forward something in the Budget for pensioners today. Pensioners will face enormous increases in their council tax bills. Those in Northern Ireland face an enormous increase in their rates bills because the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has increased the regional rate for this year by 19 per cent., which is massively over the rate of inflation. The situation is causing great concern in my constituency, which has a high proportion of elderly people. How will they meet that sort of increase when they also face the imposition of water charging for the first time, as well as swingeing increases in electricity and gas prices? When the Paymaster General winds up the debate, will she tell us why the rebate has simply been left out of this year's Budget? What possible explanation can there be for giving welcome assistance and help last year, but none whatsoever this year? Pensioners up and down the land deserve an answer to those questions.

I welcome the fact that the winter fuel allowance will be retained, but there is a question mark over why there has been no increase to the allowance whatsoever, even to take account of inflation, since its introduction in 2000. The sum of £200 would have bought a household considerably more fuel back in 2000 than it would today, especially given the recent price increases. In view of the Government's commitment to combating fuel poverty, I would have thought that the Chancellor could increase the winter fuel allowance from its level of £200, at which it has been stuck for six years. I have no doubt that Ministers could point to the fact that the situation is a major improvement on that which went before. I accept that and pay tribute to the Government for what they have done. However, after such a length of time, surely there is an unanswerable case for increasing the winter fuel allowance to bring it in line with its original value in 2000.

A lot has been said about the Chancellor's raid on the pension funds when he first came to office. Several hon. Members have talked about crises, and many tens of thousands of people in this country are affected by the crisis caused by the closure of company pension schemes that have shortfalls. I accept that the Government have brought forward the Pension Protection Fund and the financial assistance scheme, but the fact of the matter is that although some 85,000 people and their dependants have been put in a real crisis through no fault of their own, the Government have rejected completely and utterly the findings of the parliamentary ombudsman following the investigation of the matter.

The Government have failed to provide those people with any hope of a decent standard of living in their later years, even though they paid into pension schemes in good faith—and were advised to do so by Government leaflets. The ombudsman found that the Government were at fault, but they have simply rejected that finding, not only undermining the office of the ombudsman, but leading people to question whether they should invest in pensions at all. If that is the Government's reaction to the findings of an independent ombudsman, can people have faith that if they follow today's advice about investing in pensions for the future they will not be out of pocket and facing a dire future in old age?

The Government have a responsibility and they must do more. Some of my constituents who worked for Richardson's IFI plant in north Belfast—Joe Blair was one of the test cases at which the ombudsman looked—are in dire straits. They believe that they were robbed, not just by the initial collapse of their pension scheme, but latterly by the Government's failure both to accept the ombudsman's report and to rescue them from poverty, heartache and hardship. The Government say that it would cost £15 billion to £17 billion to do so and that they cannot find that money. The fact is that money could be found to compensate those pensioners, not least from unclaimed assets. The Chancellor has said that he will use some of those assets for youth provision—a fine and laudable objective—so why can he not use them to fulfil his responsibilities to those pensioners? It is a very serious issue and I urge the Government to treat it as such. There is an urgent need to rescue the lives—I put it as strongly as that—of people who are in very bad way indeed as a result of what has happened to them through no fault of their own.

On the more general issue, we await the outcome of the consultation on the Turner report, but we need help for today's pensioners as well as tomorrow's pensioners. There is a growing reliance on means-testing to help our poorest pensioners. Initially, means-testing was necessary to target resources on the poorest pensioners, but in 2006 that is counter-productive. Forcing more and more people to apply for means-tested benefits and pension credit is a disincentive to save. It is demeaning for many people, who find the application process difficult. The figures clearly show that a great deal of money to which people are entitled has not been claimed. The outcome of the consultation on Turner should be that we move away from means-tested benefits and implement a properly funded, decent state pension that is indexed to earnings. That is the way forward.

Turning briefly to business competitiveness in Northern Ireland, in the next few weeks there will be a renewed effort on the wider political front to achieve political progress there. I hope that it is possible to achieve progress and restore devolution on the basis of adherence to democratic values, but even if devolution is restored and local people can make decisions through their local representatives, the reality is that many decisions by the Treasury, and by the Chancellor in particular, will be more important than all the decisions by local Ministers in Northern Ireland combined. In particular, that applies to Government fiscal policy and rates of corporation tax, which affect business competitiveness. In infrastructure and skills, Northern Ireland is every bit as competitive as our neighbours, but we lose our competitive edge in the cost of doing business.

Some of the difficulties faced by businesses in Northern Ireland are the same as those experienced throughout the country. The challenge to business from eastern Europe and south-east Asia is felt right across the United Kingdom, but there are problems that are unique to Northern Ireland. Central to that is the fact that we share a land frontier with the Irish Republic. A 30 per cent. corporation tax rate in Northern Ireland puts business at a major competitive disadvantage with our counterparts in the Irish Republic, where corporation tax sits at 12.5 per cent. No matter what incentives are offered and no matter how skilled our work force is, it is difficult for the Province to compete when there is a corporation tax of 30 per cent. in Newry, for instance, whereas three miles across the border it is 12.5 per cent.

It is the Government's stated wish to see the private sector grow in Northern Ireland, but we have higher energy and transport costs than the rest of the United Kingdom and higher corporation tax rates than the Republic of Ireland. We must be allowed to compete on a level playing field. If we are to be a competitive and effective economy, and if the Government want less reliance on the public sector, which we want as well, the appropriate fiscal arrangements must be put in place. I regret that an opportunity has been missed in the Budget for the Government to address some of those issues. The levy on fuel duty at the present rate in Northern Ireland, compared with the Irish Republic, encourages fuel smuggling and fuel laundering. The Government need to deal with that.

Local politicians in Northern Ireland want devolution to be restored. We want local Ministers to have responsibility. Free transport for our pensioners, for example, was a policy introduced by Democratic Unionist Ministers in the former Northern Ireland Assembly, so we welcome the fact that the rest of the country is catching up with us. However, there is only a certain amount that a devolved Administration can do. Tax rates will continue to be set here in the House and by the Government here at Westminster. On behalf of the business community and our economy in Northern Ireland, I appeal to the Government to consider the particular circumstances—the disadvantages that we suffer as a result of sharing a land border, and the difficulties that we suffer as a result of the differences in corporation tax rates between the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland. I urge the Minister to address those issues when winding up the debate.

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab): I am sure that the House looks forward to the devolved Assembly being reconstituted. We, like the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds), wish the Northern Ireland economy continued success.

This is the second Budget debate in which I have spoken since I entered the House. The first was our first Budget in 1997. It is good to be back and to review what we have done in the interim. It has been said that, where there has been success in the economy, it is because of the legacy that we inherited. I wonder how long that can be said with any credibility. If there are alleged defects in the economy, that is said to be entirely our fault. I am not sure how Opposition Members can credibly have it both ways, but those who have addressed the Budget seem to be arguing that. I look forward to the winding-up speech from the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) to see how he can square that circle. Which is it: the inheritance and the economy are good, or the economy is not so good and it is our fault? Which would the Conservatives have the public believe? I know what I have observed between 1997 and today.

Listening to the Leader of the Opposition's speech, it occurred to me that he is a digitally remastered version of the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), who between 1997 and 2001 had nothing to say on policy but cracked a few good jokes. Once the public realise that the only difference between the two right hon. Gentlemen is that the Leader of the Opposition has hair, I look forward to them reacting the same at the next election as they did in 2001, and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Perhaps it would be a good idea if the hon. Gentleman started to address the Budget.

Stephen Hesford rose—

Mr. Paul Goodman: The hon. Gentleman appears to be under the misapprehension that the success of the economy depends on Labour or Conservative Governments. Will he acknowledge that the success of the economy depends on the strength of British business? The question is whether this Government are making things better or worse, and I shall address it when I wind up the debate.

Stephen Hesford: I look forward to that. The hon. Gentleman will want to deal with the record growth and stability under this Government, with 54 periods of continuous growth—an achievement that no previous Government have managed.

I wish to deal with the success that my constituents have enjoyed over the past nine years and the background to the Budget. Our economy has faced oil price shocks. We have had the highest sustained oil prices for a quarter of a century, which have doubled since 2004 and trebled since 2002. Growth among the eurozone economies has been slow, yet the UK had the largest export market in 2004 and 2005. Those are not merely figures, they are the underlying reasons why employment in my constituency is at record levels.

In previous decades, faced with such challenges, our economy would have tipped into recession. Indeed, I intervened on the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) to remind him of the two largest shocks that the UK economy had suffered since the war under the previous Conservative regime. Inflation rose to 25 per cent. and unemployment passed 2 million. That is what used to happen, but it has not happened this time. That is a key backdrop to the Budget that my right hon. Friend delivered yesterday.

Labour's economic reforms have helped the UK economy continue to experience successive periods of growth. In 2005, the UK's economic growth was higher than that of any other major European economy. These things do not happen by chance, and I certainly do not accept the argument that it is down to inheritance. We have low inflation and stable interest rates, which are key to hard-working families in my constituency. In the previous years of boom and bust under the previous regime, any parts of the economy that did well tended to be in the south-east, while the north-west, where my constituency is, suffered at the hands of the mismanagement that occurred. Under this Government, we have low inflation, stable interest rates and stable growth. The north-west has benefited from that, as have all parts of the country in their respective ways.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Would the hon. Gentleman care to read something other than the brief that he has been given by the Labour Whips? If he bothered to read, "Devolving decision making: 3—Meeting the regional economic challenge", he would find that this Government have failed to narrow the so-called north-south divide. In fact, they have compounded the problem, contrary to the contention that he advanced, having strayed momentarily off-piste from his brief.

Stephen Hesford: The hon. Gentleman's constituency is across the Pennines from mine. If he knew the region that I come from, Merseyside, he would know that it is going forward. Liverpool is to become European capital of culture in 2008 and the open golf championship is to come to Royal Liverpool golf club in my constituency in 2006 for the first time in 40 years. That was made possible by a package put forward by the Labour-led council, backed up by the economy that I am describing. In previous years, the open golf championship disappeared from my area because of the lack of investment and no infrastructure being put in. All hon. Members, from whichever party, are welcome to come to Hoylake for an enjoyable week when it takes place. There is no need for them to write to tell me that they are coming. [Interruption.] I cannot put everybody up, unless they want to sleep on the floor.

The International Monetary Fund recently reported:

"Macroeconomic stability remains remarkable ... supported by sound policies implemented by strong institutions and underpinned by monetary, fiscal, financial, and structural policy frameworks that have increasingly instilled confidence in the authorities' conduct of macroeconomic policies."

Hon. Members may laugh, but those are the true circumstances, not the fictions that we have heard so far.

When the leader of the Conservative party made his opening speech yesterday, why did not he deal with the Budget speech, but deliver a prepared, pre-arranged rhetorical eight minutes—the shortest response to a Budget speech in living memory? He did that because he truly represents his party, which has nothing credible to say about the Budget.

The global economy is undergoing a major transformation. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday, the Budget takes the UK economy forward in an increasingly difficult global economic environment. Far-reaching and fundamental changes have been driven by technological advances, greater international trade, investment and rapid growth in emerging markets such as China and India. I look forward to the winding-up speech of the hon. Member for Wycombe and the Conservatives' response to the challenges of those two rapidly expanding countries. He does not appear to recognise what I am saying—

Mr. Soames: What is the hon. Gentleman saying?

Stephen Hesford: I am saying that this country's economy will survive the challenges of the new economies in the east whereas, under a different regime, we would have tipped into recession. That was the previous Government's record—any kind of shock tipped us over.

Mr. Bone: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that trade with India is decreasing rather than increasing under the Government?

Stephen Hesford: That is because the Indians got off to a quick start. However, our economy will survive India's rapid growth and thrive on it. We will conduct more trade with India, which will become another economic partner. The Labour Government have enabled Britain to be better equipped for such challenges.

The Government will support parents and families to survive the shocks, balancing work and family needs through tax credits. Unlike some other hon. Members, I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for introducing the tax credits, because, in my constituency—I can speak only for my constituency—they have been a success. Six thousand families in my constituency benefit from tax credits and the new maternity and paternity rights that are coming on stream. In other parts of the Wirral, not necessarily strictly in my constituency, Sure Start and nursery education make important positive differences.

Let me deal with the Budget itself. [HON. MEMBERS: "Thank goodness."] It is well worth waiting for. Economic growth will continue under the Government. I have spoken about the 10 years during which I have watched the delivery of Budgets. The four if not five previous shadow Chancellors have predicted recession regularly.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Every year.

Stephen Hesford: My hon. Friend is right. That has happened every year, and they have been wrong every year. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor predicts that the economy will pick up from 2.7 per cent. to 3.25 per cent. in the coming economic period and I look forward to that. I wonder whether the Tories will make another prediction that will be proved wrong. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Wycombe laughs—I await his speech with interest.

Public borrowing is on course for meeting the golden rule, as it has been since 1997. There will be a £16 billion surplus in the cycle that ends in 2010–11. Employment has risen in my constituency. There are 170,000 more people in work since last year's Budget. I have not been able to discover the figures for my constituency, but I am told that the £970 million shared equity scheme will help 35,000 people in the UK, and I look forward to it benefiting some of my constituents.

The environment was a key part of the Budget, a fact that has been welcomed by many of my hon. Friends, not least my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz). The climate change levy presents a challenge. It has been opposed by the Conservatives in successive years, and they have not yet signed up to it. That represents a key dividing line between us. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has taken the difficult but important decision to increase the levy in line with inflation. No doubt the Tories will argue that they oppose that proposal for business reasons. They certainly have not welcomed the climate change levy in principle. I would like to hear whether they are in favour of it in principle and whether they support its uprating.

I welcome the £1 billion for the establishment of an environmental research institute. I also welcome the change that my right hon. Friend has made to the taxation of car use. Cars with the lowest emissions will attract no vehicle excise duty, while the 1 per cent. of cars that cause the most pollution will attract duty of £210. That is the right way forward and I hope that Members on both sides of the House will welcome those measures. The Chancellor will revisit the level of fuel duty in September and it remains to be seen whether it will be increased. The delayed decision must be seen in the context of the rise in world oil prices and we shall have to reassess the situation in September.

The hard-working families in my constituency will benefit from the rise in personal allowances to £5,035, and the rise in the child element of tax credit to 14 per cent. over the next few years. I welcome that, as will those families. I am not so sure about the 1p on a pint of beer, but I certainly welcome the 9p on a packet of cigarettes. I was one of those who pressed strongly for the ban on smoking in public places and the increase is a social measure as well as an economic one. I also welcome the rise in stamp duty exemption to £125,000 and the inheritance tax figure moving up to £325,000.

There is another potential dividing line between Opposition Members and ourselves about which little has been said by the Opposition so far. I heard a conversation between two Liberal Democrat MPs yesterday, following the announcement of the increase in the child trust fund to £250—£500 for lower income families—at age seven. Their initial reaction to that announcement was, "Good. That's more money allocated that we can take back when we abolish it."

Rob Marris: Name them.

Stephen Hesford: When the Liberal Democrats come to wind up, I would certainly welcome an assurance that they would not abolish the child trust fund, although I suspect that I would be disappointed in that hope.

I have already mentioned the sporting successes in my constituency, in regard to the open golf championship. I have looked fondly at our success at the winter Olympic games and, in particular, at the Commonwealth games, on the back of the investment from UK Sport and the Government. I therefore welcome the £600 million for world-class British athletes that, I hope, will build on that success in the years to come.

I wait with interest to see whether the decision to increase investment in education that my right hon. Friend announced yesterday will be supported by the Opposition. That was a key political statement. Such decisions are not taken easily, but they are taken for the principled reason that we should invest in the future of ordinary, hard-working families and their children so that they can make the best of their natural abilities and compete on a level playing field in the best possible circumstances with the 6 to 7 per cent. who benefit from private education. Although I do not begrudge people their private education, I want the vast majority of children to have access to the best. My right hon. Friend was brave and correct to come to such a decision and that will not be lost on the mums, dads and grandparents in my constituency.

One might say that making such decisions is what a Labour Government should be doing, and it is the sort of the thing that this Government are doing. I ask all parties in the House to support this decision and to do so not just in principle by saying that they think it is a nice idea, but to do so by agreeing to guarantee the money not just for one year but for each and every year until 2011 when the rise in spending will take effect. I also welcome the additional £585 million that will be distributed directly to schools throughout the financial year 2006–07.

Community support officers are making such a difference in my constituency. Their introduction was opposed by Conservative Members even though I believe that Members on both sides now support the work that those officers do. I am therefore delighted that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is building on their success by doubling their number to 16,000 at a cost of another £100 million.

I am also delighted that my right hon. Friend has seen fit to copy the very good free transport system that we have had for a long time in Merseyside and extend free pensioner travel across the country. That will be very much welcomed on both sides of the House. It will certainly be welcomed by pensioners in my constituency who were able to travel throughout Merseyside for free, but became frustrated when they reached the border and had to start to pay for their travel.

It has been argued that the NHS was not mentioned in the Budget speech. Since I first spoke in the House in 1997, I have watched the economy and my local health service. I have regularly visited my local NHS trust and all the other health services in my area in my nearly nine years in Parliament. I do not deny that there are difficulties in certain trusts—others can address that issue—but the NHS in my area certainly speaks for itself. I am very pleased that it does.

I welcome the Budget and I am delighted to have been able to take part in the debate. Perhaps I should have started with this, but I apologise to the House for not being present for the beginning of the debate. However, I am grateful to have had the chance to speak.

4.45 pm

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Wirral, West (Stephen Hesford) who, as ever, delighted the House with his fluency and wit. Certainly, there was a fair degree of laughter on this side of the House, and I am grateful to him for that. I wish to return to the issue of productivity raised in the forceful speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart).

Productivity is hugely important, and the Chancellor devoted much of his speech to measures intended to improve it. He has said in the past:

> "Productivity is a fundamental yardstick of economic performance, and poor productivity condemns a nation to be held back."

There is an element of complacency about productivity in the documentation produced by the Treasury. The impression gained is that the Treasury is rather proud of this Government's productivity record. The hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) intervened on that point earlier to say that, as is stated in the Red Book, the evidence points to raised productivity growth over the current cycle compared with previous cycles. I think that that is the gist of his remarks.

Interestingly, that same point was made to an economist on "Newsnight" last night, who replied that the current economic cycle has yet to be completed, so there are a number of years in which productivity is expected to be low as part of that cycle. Therefore, the comparison is not like with like. The expression that she used to describe the Treasury's presentation of the productivity figures was "sleight of hand". I am not an economist, so I am in no position to say whether she was correct.

There is no doubt that current productivity, on the basis of the 2005 figures, is very poor. It is at a record low, whether one measures it by growth in output per worker or by growth in output per hours worked. Productivity growth in 2005 was extremely slow—either the slowest since records began or at least since 1991, depending on which measure one follows. As for the projections, the Treasury continues to predict sluggish productivity growth in future years.

The key question for the House to determine is what is causing this poor productivity. There are a number of reasons for it. First, the balance of the economy has changed, in the sense that the public sector is now bigger, compared with the private sector, than a few years ago. The productivity record of the public sector, particularly in health and education, is not impressive. It should also be acknowledged that it is difficult to measure productivity in that sector. In terms of progress and new evidence of growth, the Treasury's, "Productivity in the UK" makes that very point. None the less, the Office for National Statistics is attempting to find better ways of measuring productivity. Whichever method it uses, however, it tends to find a problem.

On health, the ONS report produced by Tony Atkinson estimated the decline in NHS productivity as 1 per cent. per year since 1997. On education, the ONS changed its methodology to measure productivity—I am not critical of it for doing so—but the previous methodology suggested a decline of 2 per cent. per year in recent years. A more sophisticated approach still results in a decline of 0.5 per cent. per year since 1998. Whichever way one cuts it, productivity is not impressive in the public sector. That is the gist of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness.

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend is right that it is extremely difficult to gauge, but by any standards, by and large, productivity in the public sector is way inferior to that in the private sector.

Mr. Gauke: That is absolutely true, and it brings me neatly to what I was about to say. Productivity in the private sector has also not been impressive in recent years, but the change in balance, with the public sector growing at the expense of the private sector, has reduced our overall productivity because productivity in the public sector has been particularly poor in recent years.

There are a number of explanations for what is happening in the private sector. Many economists would argue that a large element of it is due not to policy failures but to what might be described as labour-hoarding. A number of businesses expect a slowdown in the economy, which means that there is less work, but rather than lay off staff—and expecting the slowdown to be followed by some economic growth, which would mean having to find new staff—they retain existing staff for longer than they might have otherwise.

Ed Balls: I want to be sure that I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying. He seems to be saying that in the past, when the economy experienced a tough year, people were laid off, unemployment shot up and employment fell. Because nowadays people think that a tough year in the British economy will be followed by a return to growth, they do not lay off staff but retain them in their jobs. That is why in that particular year employment stays high and productivity figures are slightly lower. I understood the hon. Gentleman to be saying that that was good news for the British economy rather than bad news—or did I misunderstand?

Mr. Gauke: The hon. Gentleman may find this hard to understand, but I was not making a partisan point. I know that this will be beyond his comprehension, but I am not claiming that labour-hoarding results from a failure of Government policy. All I am saying is that it is happening—that it is an observable fact. It is a good thing. If it is thought that the economy will grow and that it is therefore unnecessary to lay people off, that is clearly a good thing. There was no criticism in what I was saying at that point; but—

Ed Balls: But!

Mr. Gauke: Yes, there is a "but". When labour is hoarded—if that is the correct phrase—and growth does not follow, there is more vulnerability to an increase in unemployment. If the downturn lasts longer than expected, there will be higher unemployment. That is a potential difficulty. In 2006 we are witnessing some increase in unemployment, perhaps suggesting that the labour-hoarding is unwinding to some extent. We shall see.

There are, however, more substantial reasons why productivity has been so poor. One is the increase in regulation. According to the "Burdens Barometer" published by the British Chambers of Commerce, the cost of regulation has risen by £14 billion since 1998. The World Economic Forum says that since 1997 the United Kingdom has fallen from 13th in its league table to 30th in terms of Government regulation.

The Chancellor focused a great deal on the City of London in his Budget and the papers that have been produced. The City faces great challenges and regulation, which in general are not domestically driven. They come not from the United Kingdom but from the European Union: the markets in financial instruments directive, for instance, is causing concern.

Taxation is another problem. Business taxes have risen substantially. The Ernst and Young analysis shows that if North sea oil revenue is excluded, taxes are the highest that they have ever been. The level of taxation is not the only difficulty, however. We should observe what is being done by our competitors. We are to be taxed more heavily than Germany, and it is no surprise that Germany's growth is likely to exceed ours in the years ahead.

We should consider not just our own taxation level, in absolute terms and relative to those of our competitors, but the complexity of taxation. Let me give an example.

[Mr. Gauke]

I know that vehicle excise duty is not a business tax, and I am not particularly critical of the policy per se, but it is rather characteristic of this Chancellor that we are to have seven different rates whereas once we had only one. That illustrates this Government's tendency to complicate matters. According to a World Economic Forum assessment, in terms of tax simplicity the UK is ranked 67th in the world, tied with Benin.

A further element threatening productivity is the decline in business investment. The Chancellor said in his 2001 Budget that

"To achieve our first ambition—to secure the fastest productivity growth of our competitors over the next decade—business investment must rise".—[Official Report, 7 March 2001; Vol. 364, c. 298.]

That is not happening. Business investment is falling, in part because of the taxation and regulation that I mentioned earlier. It is now at a record low: about 9 per cent. of gross domestic product, which is the lowest level since records began in 1965.

The British Chambers of Commerce and the CBI have offered substantial criticism of our skills levels. I know that more is being spent on education and I am not critical of that, but we must get the value for money that the Government have not achieved in the past. Until we get the full reforms that we need, I will not be all that optimistic. To be fair, the Government are moving in the right direction through their Education and Inspections Bill, but there is still a long way to go.

This country has enormous advantages, such as the English language and strong cultural links with many other parts of the world. In an increasingly globalised world, we should be able to succeed, grow and prosper. There is cross-party consensus on the need to embrace globalisation, and we at least all talk about a belief in and desire for free trade, even if we do not always implement it. But our economy is becoming increasingly clogged up and it is less competitive and productive than it was. There are some fundamental economic issues that we need to face, and I fear that this Budget has completely failed to do so.

4.57 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke), who talked about productivity in detail and with great knowledge. Indeed, he somewhat embarrassed the Government.

Yesterday was the first Budget that I had witnessed as a Member of the House of Commons. I got here very early to put my green card by my normal seat, only to discover that the place was packed with green cards. I felt a sense of great anticipation: this was going to be a packed House, and I was about to hear the iron Chancellor tell us about his great new reforms. According to the bookies, it was to be the right hon. Gentleman's last Budget as Chancellor, and he will be elevated to the role of Prime Minister very soon. So although it is always a thrill and an honour to enter the Palace of Westminster, I felt a little extra anticipation yesterday.

The Chancellor spoke for just over an hour, but it seemed like three hours. After half an hour, a fellow Conservative whispered, "I've given up the will to live." Another said to me, "When does the Budget start?" I thought that they were simply being partisan, but I noticed on looking across to the Labour Benches that three Back Benchers had fallen asleep. Later, some of them left. I thought that the Front Benchers would be okay, but when I looked at the Deputy Prime Minister, I noticed that even he was enormously bored. The Prime Minister was grinning, but it was even more artificial than usual. So in that sense, I was very disappointed with the Budget. The leader of my party said more in eight minutes than the Chancellor said in over an hour.

I thought that I should measure the Budget against the expectations of the people of Wellingborough, whom I regularly survey through my "Listening to Wellingborough and Rushden" survey. Of the issues that they mention, five in particular always come top: pensions, council tax, police and crime, education, and health. Wellingborough is a rapidly expanding town. Indeed, according to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, over the next 15 years 9,825 new dwellings will be created in one half of my constituency, and 6,800 in the other. So there will be an enormous increase in the number of people in the constituency. It worried me that the Budget provided no encouragement for first-time buyers. The small increase in stamp duty exemption did not even cover the average price of a new home for a first-time buyer. That was a little mean, and the Chancellor could have done better on that.

One important issue in Wellingborough is pensions. I agree with previous comments about the 85,000 people affected by the failure of their company pension schemes. It is unfair that the Government have not dealt with that problem. If an ombudsman criticises the Government on an issue, they should take notice of what she says. We cannot let 85,000 people down through maladministration and do nothing about it.

People are now beginning to realise the implications of the £5 billion that has been stolen from pensions each and every year, as their pensions are being slashed. I should congratulate the Chancellor on one point: he has put the tax burden up to its highest ever level, but he has done so cleverly. He has done it through stealth taxes that people have not noticed initially, but they are now all coming home to roost.

In my constituency, a group of pensioners were so fed up that their pension was going up by less than the increase in the council tax that they started a campaign. They had public meetings, and shadow Ministers came to speak to them. What annoyed those pensioners so much was that the basic state pension was not going up enough to cover the increase in council tax in my constituency. They were also fed up with means-testing. Many people knew that they could get more money if they applied to the Government for pension credit, but they were not prepared to do so. They did not want the Government to know all their financial background. They thought that after paying in year after year, they should not have to go on bended knee to the Government for a few extra pounds a week. That is the problem with the pension credit. We should get rid of it and all the other bribes, and give people a decent pension. One of the few issues on which I agreed with my predecessor was that the millions, if not billions, of pounds of unclaimed pension credit could be added to the basic pension right now. I do not know why the Government do not do that.

Council tax also comes high in the list of priorities for the people of Wellingborough. That is partly because we have had the biggest rise in council tax since it was introduced. Part of the reason why the councils have had to put up the council tax is the funding formula used to support the revenue grant. It is clearly based on historic evidence not future population growth, and we have lost out year in and year out.

It is strange, however, that before the election, when Labour controlled the county council, the increase in revenue support grant was £7 million. The Conservatives took over, and this year's increase was only £2 million. That is wholly unacceptable—

Dawn Primarolo: I have listened carefully to the points that the hon. Gentleman has made, and he has so far produced a list of large spending commitments, over and above the Government's spending. I hope that he will tell us what policies his party has to raise the tens of billions of pounds that he thinks should be spent.

Mr. Bone: I certainly will if I get time, but the Minister is being a little unfair—[HON. MEMBERS: "Surely not."] Surely. I was arguing that there should be a fairer distribution of the revenue support grant.

Mr. Gauke: I suspect that part of the costs to which the Paymaster General referred related to the loss of occupational pensions, which the Government constantly say will cost £15 billion to put right. Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be interesting if the Government could explain later in the debate how they reached that figure?

Mr. Bone: As I understand it, the sum each year is not very much and there have been several suggestions as to how it might be covered.

Policing and law and order are huge issues in my constituency. We shall be talking about extra policemen—and before the Minister jumps up again, I shall tell her how we would pay for them. People in my constituency want local policing; they want to see more police on the beat, catching criminals and deterring people from crime. The Government are doing exactly the reverse. They have come up with police support officers, but that money should be spent on real policemen.

The Government talk about local policing, yet in my constituency the proposed amalgamation for an east midlands force means that we shall lose our local area. Our chief superintendent, who was based in Wellingborough, is now based in Kettering, and that east midlands force will cost millions and millions of pounds. Why not scrap the idea of regional police forces and spend the money on extra police officers?

There has been much talk about education and about how much extra is being put into the education budget. Well, we are not seeing it in Wellingborough. Under the Labour Government, a Labour-controlled county council demolished John Lea secondary school. The sale of the site, including the school playing fields, raised £11 million, yet only £2 million was reinvested in my constituency. The destruction of that school means that all the town's other secondary schools have overcrowded classes, and people moving into the town with teenage children have problems finding a school for them.

Thousands and thousands of new dwellings are being built in my constituency, but where on earth will the children go to school? There are not enough schools. Despite all the talk about education, education, education, it is certainly not happening in Wellingborough.

Ed Balls: In the hon. Gentleman's opinion, would the people of Wellingborough support the Government's proposal that we should raise the level of state spending to the level of private school spending, or would they agree with the shadow Chief Secretary that that would be throwing money away?

Mr. Bone: I really am grateful for that intervention, because the people of Wellingborough do not believe anything the Government say about education—[Interruption.] They have seen a secondary school knocked down, but they have seen no more money, and they are having to sack teachers from primary and infant schools. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. Could Members on the Front Benches contain their discussions until they catch my eye?

Mr. Bone: Perhaps I should move away from education, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as it was causing a bit of concern, but I shall finish the point I was making, as the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) wanted a reply.

I do not believe a word that the Government say about education. I do not believe that any extra money will go into education in Wellingborough. The Government's history over the past nine years is that in Wellingborough educational provision has gone down. It may be great in the hon. Gentleman's constituency but it is not in mine, and the Government should take that into account. Wellingborough should receive its fair share of education spending.

The most important issue in Wellingborough is the health service. As many Members have said, the Chancellor did not mention the health service at all. I am not really surprised. Dentistry in Wellingborough has been privatised, and I saw no commitment in the Labour party manifesto to do that. There were far more NHS dentists in Wellingborough in 1997 than there are today. If people can find an NHS dentist who will take them on, it is almost a miracle. On GP appointments, we have one of the lowest ratios of doctors to patients in the United Kingdom, and it was much better in 1997.

The most important problem in the area relates to Kettering general hospital. There is no hospital in Wellingborough, and we should have a community hospital there. We hear that the Government are in favour of community hospitals, but there is no money for one in Wellingborough. However, the Government have a very useful formula for funding the NHS to make it fair across the country. That is a very good idea. The only problem is that when they announced that funding, they provided my area with only 85 per cent. of what the funding formula says the sum should be. [Interruption.] Labour Members may argue about that, but I am told that the reason why that happens is that other areas get more money.

I am pleased that other areas get more than their formula share, but that is not good enough for the people of Wellingborough. All the talk of the formula and funding may not really mean anything to the people of Wellingborough, but when the local hospital must cancel 3,000 out-patient appointments and 600 operations, close a ward and an operating theatre, and transfer nurses from one area to another, that is when it comes home to roost.

Rob Marris: May I gently suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he check his figures on the formula funding in Wellingborough? I think that he will find that from 1 April 2007, no primary care trust in England will be below 95 per cent. of formula. I very much doubt whether his PCT is currently 15 per cent. off formula, because I think that I am right in saying that no PCT in England is anywhere near 10 per cent. off formula. So I urge him in his litany of doom and gloom for Wellingborough—it does sound dismal—to check his figures on the NHS.

Mr. Bone: The figure that I cite has never been challenged locally. In fact, I am told that it translates into £21 million less for the local hospital. I am pleased to hear that progress will be made, but the Government always promise jam in the future, and I really do not believe it.

Let me quickly consider some of the people who have been affected by the Government's action. I shall give some examples of what the Government have meant to patients in Wellingborough. Miss Major has been in agony. She has been admitted to the accident and emergency department on three or four occasions. She needs an operation. The operation was planned, but it was cancelled because of the cuts. Someone in my constituency is in agony, because of the cuts forced on us by the Government. Mrs. Baddock had to wait more than six months for her operation, yet the Government say that no one is waiting more than six months for an NHS operation. What they say and reality are completely the reverse. Mrs. Cutting has a heart complaint. In September 2005, she was told that she needed an electrocardiogram. I should not have thought that an ECG was a particularly difficult thing to arrange, but she has been told that she will not have one until November 2006. She has pointed out to me that it will be four years from when she first fell ill to when she gets any treatment whatsoever.

Last night a constituent phoned me and said, "My father has to have a heart bypass. He had a heart attack in June 2005. Four times he's been admitted to hospital, Four times he's been ready for the operation, and four times it has been cancelled because of staff shortages." That is the reality of the NHS in my area.

The Minister challenged me on how we would fund some of the extra commitments. Well, first, I congratulate the Government on scoring a century. Under their leadership, since 1997, £100 billion of taxpayers' money has been sent to the European Union—that so-called free trade area. Can they explain why £100 billion has to go to the European Union to provide a free trade area? If only half of that money had been left in this country, they could have met all the funding commitments without any problem whatsoever.

This Government have failed us; this Chancellor has failed us. Whatever this Budget was, it was not a Budget for Wellingborough.

5.15 pm

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), who spoke with such passion about how the Budget will affect his constituency. He started by talking about the hype that surrounded the Budget. I agree with him—for many of us who, for the first time, were able to sit in the Chamber and listen to the Budget, there was an awful lot of hype surrounding the event. In fact, one could describe it as a non-event. We had a 61-minute speech and lots of documents—1,000 pages in all, I think—but there was very little to tackle some of the challenges that we face today. There was nothing to assist productivity growth, pensioners or the NHS. When we remove the North sea oil revenues, we find that we are being taxed more now than ever before.

Dawn Primarolo: Will the hon. Gentleman explain to the House why he wants to take North sea oil receipts out of calculations of tax?

Mr. Ellwood: It has been a common practice to be able to read the two sets of figures: one with North sea oil revenues and one without. That gives a good indication to the public. They can recognise how much contribution is made from North sea oil.

Dawn Primarolo: Will the hon. Gentleman follow through by explaining whether it is his party's policy that, whenever a sector is doing well in the economy, its contribution to tax is to be removed from the tax calculation?

Mr. Ellwood: I think that the right hon. Lady is deliberately trying to mislead me. We are trying to show that if there is a significant sector that is contributing to the revenues and that is removed, it gives a good indication of what the rest of the economy is doing. I am not saying that we should take any one sector in isolation, but North sea oil provides such a large amount of revenue for this country that it is important that we are able to see both figures. As I said, that is common practice. It is nothing new.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Ellwood: I think that I will make a little progress, otherwise there will not be an opportunity for the winding-up speech.

I am trying to convey that, because of what is happening to the economy, borrowing is not under control. This year, we are having to borrow £37 billion or, to put it another way, £175 billion over the next five years. That is all to do with over-regulation of our economy, and that also applies to businesses and affects growth. Productivity growth is falling from 2 per cent. to 1.75 per cent.

Of course, there were some great headlines in the Budget. One of them was about education, which we have spoken about at length. However, when we analyse that—we have had a couple of days to look at the figures—we realise that the increase is less than 1 per cent. Another headline-grabbing bit of news was that pensioners are to get free travel during off-peak times. That is wonderful, but the measure does not come in until April 2008. The Chancellor failed to mention that.

The Budget was promoted as a green Budget, but it contains very little to turn around the CO_2 figures that we face. We have heard many times the fact that, in the past five years, CO_2 emissions have increased rather than fallen. I am glad that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) is now in his place. I hope that we will be able to meet our Kyoto targets, but I asked him whether we would meet Labour's manifesto commitments on greenhouse emissions. The answer to that is no. We will not be meeting them at all.

Sadly, we spent much of today's debate discussing not the Government's initiatives, plans for Labour, or plans for Britain, but what the Tories and the Liberal Democrats would do instead. In the remaining days of the Budget debate, I hope that we will focus on how we can improve the situation with CO_2 emissions, instead of trying to second-guess policies that are yet to mature and be announced in their fullness.

Where are the initiatives on rail transport? France is actively encouraging people to abandon their cars and use rail, but we heard nothing in the Budget about that. Indeed, there was nothing on cycling to encourage people to abandon their cars, specifically during the school run. We could easily help to tackle CO_2 emissions through VAT on aviation fuel, but again we heard nothing about that. All that we have heard is a lot of attacks on Tory policies.

Mark Lazarowicz: If all the matters that the hon. Gentleman thinks should have been covered in the Budget statement had been covered, it would have lasted a lot longer than the 61 minutes about which he is complaining. Is it now the case that the Conservative party thinks that there should be VAT on aircraft fuel, or an increase in air passenger duty? I would be interested to know—I might actually support it.

Mr. Ellwood: The hon. Gentleman falls foul of exactly the same thing that I accused him of earlier. He is trying to talk about Tory policy when we should be debating the Government's policy. There will be ample opportunity to discuss Conservative policy in due course, but today's debate is about the Government, not the Conservative party. Yes, we heard a 61-minute speech from the Chancellor, but there was not one mention of any of the initiatives that I have cited in the statement or in the 1,000 pages that were produced. [Interruption.] I will make some progress because I appreciate that we want to hear from the Front-Bench spokesmen.

At the start of the debate, we digressed by talking about the NHS. The NHS is in crisis, but there was nothing in the Budget to alleviate it. We acknowledge that an extra £1 billion has been put into the NHS, but today we became diverted on to a debate about whether simply to throw money at something. That debate was entirely misleading. Conservative Members do not question the fact that extra spending must be put in, but it is the way in which the money is spent that is important. Reform must accompany spending, which shows the whole point of us scrutinising the money that is spent.

Although Dorset has one of the worst-funded health authorities in the country, we are just able to make ends meet. However, as authorities in other parts of the country cannot do their sums and run their services correctly, £11 million is being removed from our health authority so that it can be given to other authorities. Dorset, which is doing well, is being made to suffer and yet another health authority will go into the red. That cannot be sensible, and it shows exactly why we need the reform about which I spoke earlier—[Interruption.] I get the message and will draw my remarks to a conclusion.

I was pleased, on a personal level, by the announcement of the introduction of a charitable fund to help British victims of terrorist attacks abroad. Such a fund was absent until now, although Spain, France, the United States and other countries had introduced one. Adequate compensation was provided after people were sadly killed or affected by the 7 July bombings because of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority. However, those affected by an attack on Britons abroad did not get a penny because the compensation scheme is limited to British shores and travel insurance does not cover terrorism. I am pleased that the fund has been introduced and I ask the Paymaster General to give us details on when we will have a full announcement on how the process will work.

The Budget was left wanting. An awful lot could be done and we need answers soon. We cannot wait until the comprehensive spending review to tackle problems with the NHS, the climate, the economy and, certainly, our support for pensioners.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): It is a pleasure to respond to the second day of debate on the Budget, all of which I heard bar five minutes. I also spent two hours attending yesterday's debate, which was a great pleasure to listen to.

I should like to respond to some of the points made in today's debate. The first Opposition speech was made by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz)—who is not in the Chamber, but he may return. Almost the first thing he did was to make the extraordinary claim that he was inundated with telephone calls yesterday in support of the Budget. We regard that as very strange—I certainly have not been inundated with such calls, and neither have my hon. Friends. Perhaps he was making a bid to return to the Front Bench. Later, he said that the Chancellor's speech was too long at one hour and two minutes, so he may not return just yet. He made a very good point about the Olympics with which we wholeheartedly concur. He spoke, too, about the effects of terror—a point also rightly made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood).

[Mr. Paul Goodman]

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz), who is in the Chamber, made a long speech—perhaps longer than he expected—on climate change, which is a subject on which he has great expertise. After 36 minutes he said, "Can I say briefly?", and he may wish to follow that advice in his next contribution. However, he made some very good and interesting points.

The hon. Member for Wirral, West (Stephen Hesford) spoke about 56 periods of continuous growth. He was right to do so, but he did not make the point fully, as he failed to mention that many of those periods were under a Conservative Government. However, he reminded the House that we left the Government a golden economic legacy which, alas, they are not handling well, as we shall see.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) gave a masterly summary of the effect of government on business. My hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) dealt with productivity growth and cited some figures, to which I shall return. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) made the same point and spoke, too, about the effects of regulation. My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) dealt with the effect of the Budget on council tax in his constituency. He said that the Budget did not do anything for Wellingborough—he should know, as he is a fine constituency Member.

We know full well that the Chancellor's annual Budget speech does not so much reveal the Budget as conceal it. We know from experience that the full truth about the Budget is contained not in the big announcements in the Chancellor's speech—there were not many such announcements in his speech yesterday—but in the small print of the Red Book. Page 180 shows that he has revised down long-term productivity growth from 2 per cent. to 1.75 per cent. His speech yesterday certainly did not reveal that fact—it concealed it. Page 252 shows that he has revised up his current deficit from £4 billion to £7 billion. His speech yesterday did not reveal that fact—again, it concealed it.

The Chancellor claimed yesterday that it was a Budget for the environment, but page 262 reveals that he expects to take less, not more, revenue over the next two years from the climate change levy, although his speech did not mention that fact either. Above all, there is the issue of council tax. Page 186 of last year's Red Book includes the heading, "Building a Fairer Society", and lists 17 measures, the 15th of which is payment for the over-65s. An £800 million payment was to be made to help hard-pressed elderly people whose council tax bills have, in most cases, risen, and the value of whose pensions have, in many cases, fallen.

Stephen Hesford rose—

Mr. Goodman: I shall certainly give way to the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps he would like to explain why some of the money handed out to pensioners last year to help them with their council tax is not available this year.

Stephen Hesford: The hon. Gentleman is talking rather rapidly and becoming excited. He glossed over the issue of climate change, but I urge him to deal with the facts. Do the Opposition support the climate change levy in principle, and do they support the inflation rise applied to it?

Mr. Goodman: If I am excited, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that that has nothing to do with the contents of his speech. On the climate change levy, we will introduce proposals at the next election. There are problems with it. That, I think, deals with him.

Page 188 of this year's Red Book contains the equivalent table. The section headed "Building a fairer society" has shrunk to five measures. Perhaps the Chancellor has given up on building a fairer society. He has certainly given up on helping pensioners with their council tax. In that table an extension of the £800 million is nowhere to be seen. Could the withdrawal of special council tax help for pensioners have any connection with the fact that there was a general election last year?

My right hon. and hon. Friends will no doubt argue that the withdrawal of help reveals last year's offer of help to be a cold, cynical, calculating pre-election bribe. I will not quarrel with that assessment, although my suspicion is that the withdrawal of that help is also the Chancellor's personal contribution to the Prime Minister's election campaign in May. Those elections will provide an opportunity for millions of disillusioned and angry pensioners to give their verdict on the Government's decision at the ballot box.

I want to step back from the Budget and examine the seriousness and starkness of the economic challenge that confronts Britain's future.

Keith Vaz: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Goodman: No, I must make progress and let the Paymaster General in.

In 2050, China's share of world trade is estimated to rise to 24 per cent. North America's is estimated to fall by 2 per cent. to 23 per cent. The EU's share is set to fall by almost half to a mere 12 per cent., so the choice is clear. Even to maintain our position—to keep up with North American rather than European Union growth rates—we must compete to prosper. If we are to meet the challenge of the 21st century, the economy must travel in the right direction.

We all know, or should know, what that means—high growth rates, improved competitiveness, better productivity, internationally competitive tax rates, light touch regulation, strong savings and investment with reform. Last year our growth was 1.8 per cent. It was not growth at North American levels. It was not even growth at EU levels. A 1.8 per cent. growth rate was below the EU average—indeed, I can tell the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) that we were 19th out of 25—below the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development average and below the world average, but the Budget will do little to take our growth, compared with that of our competitors, in the right direction.

We need improved competitiveness. According to the World Economic Forum, as we heard, since 1997 we have dropped from fourth place in the competitiveness league table to 13th. In 1997 our share of world trade was 5.7 per cent.; last year it had fallen to 3.8 per cent. The Budget will do little to take our competitiveness in the right direction.

We need improved productivity, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness said. He pointed out that year on year growth in productivity is at its lowest since 1990, at 0.4 per cent. From 1992 to 1997, as he said, the improvement was 2.6 per cent. Under the Labour Government it fell to 1.3 per cent. The Budget contains little to take our productivity in the right direction.

We need tax rates that are internationally competitive, but far from going in the right direction, our tax burden is going in the wrong direction. In 1997, our tax as a share of gross domestic product was just under 35 per cent. The falling line of tax as a percentage of GDP in Germany is about to cross the rising line of tax as a percentage of GDP in the UK. Page 266 of the Red Book confirms that tax as a percentage of GDP next year is expected to rise to 38 per cent., the highest rate for about 20 years.

The USA, Canada, Australia and Ireland, as the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) pointed out, are following the same competitive path. In 2000, our business taxes were 10th from the OECD lowest; now, they are 10th from the OECD highest. The Budget will do nothing to make our tax rates more competitive or to make our tax burden go down rather than up. The Chancellor could not bring himself to admit yesterday that the Budget adds another £5.5 billion over three years to the nation's tax bill, already the highest since records began.

We need strong savings, and it is here that the Chancellor is perhaps most culpable. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) earlier quoted the Prime Minister in opposition. The Chancellor said in opposition:

> "I want the next Labour Government to achieve what in 50 years of the welfare state has never been achieved: the end of the means-test for our elderly people".

What has happened to means-testing under the Government? When we left office, the percentage of pensioners who were means-tested was 37 per cent., whereas now it is 46 per cent. and climbing.

What has happened to saving? Since 1997, the personal savings ratio has fallen by half. This Budget will do nothing to take savings in the right direction, any more than it will restore the £45 billion that the Chancellor has plundered from pension funds since 1997. Yesterday, the Chancellor could not even bring himself to admit that he expects the savings ratio to fall yet again next year, any more than he could bring himself to mention—I will be interested to see whether the Paymaster General can manage this—the words "Lord" and "Turner" in the same sentence.

Above all, we need investment with reform. We have had the spending—money has been poured into hospitals, schools and child care—but we have not had the reform. Yesterday, the Chancellor had scarcely a word to say about, and no action to take, on the NHS. I concede that the Chancellor had plenty of words and an action plan for education, but it was an action plan with no timetable.

Ed Balls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Goodman: The hon. Gentleman has not been here for the whole debate, but if he will tell me whether he wrote the jokes in yesterday's Budget speech and what the timetable is for bringing public sector schools up to the standard of private sector schools, I shall give way.

Ed Balls: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the importance of tackling the challenge of globalisation through investing in productivity, and education and skills are particularly important. Does his party support our goal to raise the level of state spending in schools up to the level of private schools? Does he support that goal—yes or no?

Mr. Goodman: The hon. Gentleman must be really slow. Of course we support the goal, but we want a timetable, which he did not give us. It is no wonder that when the Prime Minister needs support for real education reform—reform with a Conservative direction of travel—he has to rely on Conservative votes to get it through the House of Commons. The Chancellor will be pleased to hear that if the Prime Minister introduces real NHS reform with the same Conservative direction of travel, he will again be able to rely on our support to get it through, even if he cannot rely on Labour Back Benchers.

As for child care, the House will be aware of rising complaints from private, voluntary and independent providers that the Government are driving them out of business because of the lack of a level playing field in child care, and today I can provide the House with new figures. According to Laing and Buisson's day nursery market report 2006, in the year to January 2006, 40,030 places provided by local authorities opened, but in the same year 17,715 day nursery places provided by the private sector closed, which is very serious. That is the first time that I have seen figures showing a decisive tilt from the private sector to the public sector, and that figure throws into question the Government's commitment to a mixed market in child care. Perhaps the Paymaster General will say what the Budget will do to provide a more level playing field in child care between the public sector and the private sector.

The Budget will do nothing to deliver investment with reform, because we will not have investment with reform while we have a Chancellor who is the roadblock to reform. The vigour, creativity and strength of British business—strength largely achieved despite Government policy, not because of Government policy—are to some degree masking all those moves in the wrong direction. There is so much that is good in the British economy, but the economy could and should be even better. The great challenge presented to the Chancellor and to this Budget was the challenge of 21st-century change. There is no global pension fund waiting to be raided by countries that have run out of incomes to tax by stealth, and there is no international tax credit system waiting to bale out Governments who get into trouble. However, there is a global golden rule—that we must compete to survive—and it is a golden rule that even this Chancellor and this Budget cannot fiddle.

The Budget should and could have put stability first by making the assessment of the Chancellor's fiscal rules independent. It could have sent Britain in the right direction, but it did not do so, because this is an old-fashioned, tax-and-spend Chancellor who has run out of ideas and who is running out of time. Yesterday, he ran away from using his Budget to tackle the crisis in our health service. He is a Chancellor who is preparing himself for the premiership and not preparing Britain for the future. This is a Budget for Brown, not a Budget for Britain.

5.39 pm

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The past two days of the Budget debate have covered a great deal of ground, with hon. Members asking several questions that I will do my best to answer in the remaining time. Let me start by mentioning the specific questions that the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) asked about the announcement of the new fund to support victims of terrorist attacks here and outside the UK. I hope that he accepts that it would be better if I wrote to him in order to do justice to a subject about which he is very concerned and with which he has been deeply associated, because I could not do it justice in this short time.

This has been a wide-ranging debate to which the contributions made by Conservative Members can be summed up thus: "We want to discuss climate change but we've got nothing to add, we want to discuss pension policy but we've got nothing to add, we want to discuss the national health service but we've got nothing to add, and we want to discuss education but we've got three different commitments." First, we had the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) telling us that the Conservatives will not honour the commitment on the expansion of education. Then we had the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) saying today, "It sounds like a nice idea—we'll think about it." Then, by this evening, we had the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) saying, "Yes, we will match it." The problem throughout the debate has been that the Conservatives have no policy with which to engage in it.

Keith Vaz: On the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers), who was of course missing from her Front Bench during the opening speech, I was e-mailed a copy of "In Touch", the Conservatives' newsletter in Oakleigh ward, with a picture of her and the caption,

"Theresa gains another signature for her petition for more police".

Is not that a call by the hon. Lady for more expenditure, not less?

Dawn Primarolo: I think that the case is made. The hon. Lady, like many Conservative Members, wants to stand in this Chamber and decry public expenditure and call for it to be cut, then they go back to their constituencies and demand more expenditure and investment in public services. During today's debate, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) was the only Conservative Member to show the good grace to give credit to the Government where it is due.

The Budget announced yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor demonstrated a vision for a modern Britain leading on enterprise and prosperity and leading in opportunities and fairness. It sets out world-class public services and an ambition to build on a platform of stability and growth. As my right hon. Friend said, we have had 54 quarters of consecutive growth—the longest expansion in British history. This is a stable economy, with inflation at the 2 per cent. target, interest rates low and record employment. The crucial difference between this Government and the previous Government is record levels of employment, with more than 2.3 million more jobs since 1997.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), who spoke eloquently in support of the success of the Budget, referred specifically to the textile industry, on which he has campaigned a great deal in this House. The UK remains a good place to start and grow a business, with the World Bank study, "Doing Business in 2006", placing the UK at the top in the European Union, with the best business conditions. Support for local business environments through the local enterprise growth initiative, worth £50 million next year, is an important contribution to that, as is the improved access to finance for small businesses through the enhanced incentives to invest in small businesses through venture capital trusts.

Gregory Barker rose—

Dawn Primarolo: If the hon. Gentleman will let me make a little progress, I will certainly give way to him if I have time.

Yesterday, my right hon. Friend revealed a vision for modern Britain and detailed the reforms that will effect it and make the UK the location of choice for business, with more investment in skills and education. Those reforms will help us to meet the challenge of climate change. I shall deal with the points that hon. Members made about that shortly. The reforms will be embedded in our public services for long-term efficiency.

Let us be clear about the economy's current position. The UK economy has coped well with the challenges in 2005. They include sustained higher oil prices, weak euro area demand and a subdued housing market. Under the stewardship of the Conservative party, all those factors would have driven the economy into recession. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development described the UK economy as a paragon of stability. The International Monetary Fund emphasised that macro-economic stability remains remarkable in the UK. In the nine years since 1997, the UK economy has grown by 24 per cent. In the previous nine years, under a Conservative Government, it grew by 15 per cent. If growth in the past nine years had been the same as in the preceding nine years, the average household would be more than £3,300 worse off than it is today.

Conservative Members also try to manipulate figures when describing tax revenues and rises. It is crazy and demonstrates why they are not fit to run the economy. They tell us that, by excluding North sea oil revenues, we somehow have the highest tax take. That is simply not sensible. What are they thinking about? If they take out North sea oil, will they also take out the financial sector and its receipts when it is doing well? Of course not.

Gregory Barker: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: No, not at the moment. When North sea oil is included, the tax take is not as high as the peak in 1984. The OECD measure—the approved, internationally comparable measure of the tax burden—states that, in the UK, we rank below the OECD average and the European average. Indeed, every year since 1997, the tax burden has been below the peaks that were reached in 1984–85. Let me remind Conservative Members that some of the choice measures that they included in their previous Budgets included VAT on fuel and increasing VAT to 17.5 per cent. The Conservative Government cut advance corporation tax in 1993 and had the same effect on funds as they claim that the Government are now having.

Gregory Barker: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: No, I shall answer the questions that hon. Members have asked and, if I have time, give way to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex made many points about pensioners. I agree that every hon. Member should be concerned about that, but I want to remind him of a few factors. Reforms to pensioners' tax and benefits since 1997 have meant that pensioners are, on average, £27 a week better off and the poorest third of pensioners are £39 a week better off. Let me put it another way: 2.1 million pensioners have been lifted out of absolute low income between 1996–97 and 2004–05, and more than 1 million have been lifted out of relative low income in the same period. They became the victims of low income and poverty under the previous Government's policies.

I stress to the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex that, of course, it is important to have an effective pensions system in future. Lord Turner's contribution to the debate and the Government's response will ensure that a carefully considered programme that balances the principles of personal responsibility, fairness, simplicity, affordability and sustainability, is implemented.

The hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) also asked about the ombudsman's report. He acknowledged that the Department for Work and Pensions had made a considered response to it and I do not believe that I can add anything to that. However, in May 2004, the Government set up the financial assistance scheme, covering 15,000 people, and we have made a commitment to review the fund for the scheme.

The health service was mentioned repeatedly. Let us get a few things straight. The Government's plans for the NHS were set out in the Budget of 2002, providing clear plans for right up to 2008, offering long-term certainty for the NHS in order for it to plan. Since 1997, UK health spending has risen from the £33 billion that we inherited from the previous Conservative Government to £97 billion, representing a 7 per cent. real-terms increase per year. Now, 99 per cent. of people suspected of having cancer are seen by a specialist within two weeks, and we no longer have to listen to horrendous stories in our surgeries resulting from Conservative Government policy. If the Conservatives want to know where the money went, I shall tell them. It has gone towards 660,000 more operations and 1 million more elective admissions each year. These represent increases of 88 per cent., 89 per cent. and 108 per cent. in people's treatment.

Alongside that, there are now 79,000 more nurses and 27,000 more doctors. By the end of the 2004 spending round, the NHS will have 90 per cent. higher spending in real terms than it did in 1997. The money has not gone to pay for managers' salaries, as Conservative Members insist on saying. NHS managers now comprise 3 per cent. of the staff, whereas that figure was 5 per cent in 1997, so the percentage is falling under this Government.

The hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) made a measured contribution, in which he mentioned productivity. He had the good grace to acknowledge that, in the public services—including the national health service—measuring and improving productivity presented a challenge. However, the NHS report shows improved productivity as a result of lower levels of staff sickness and the reduced use of agency staff in 2004–05, which freed up about £60 million more for patient care. But, of course, it cannot end there.

Mr. Gauke: I think that I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for her kind words, although they will probably not do my career any good. None the less, there is still a problem with productivity in the health service. I am grateful to her for saying that I made a measured contribution, but I have to tell her that productivity is very poor in the health service, just as it is in the education system. I accept that it is difficult to measure, but according to any measurement, we have a problem in our public sector.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman must know, because he appears to follow these discussions closely, that the Office for National Statistics has done some work with us on this matter and that it has produced a paper showing a range of measures to illustrate where productivity is increasing in education and in health. The ONS acknowledges that these measures represent staging posts towards an ongoing programme to improve productivity in regard to information, so that we can get a much fairer picture of what is going on. We are clearly flagging up that this is about getting accurate and timely information to give us a proper assessment of the productivity.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) said that there was no encouragement in the Budget for first-time buyers. Mortgage rates are at their lowest levels since the 1950s and the cut in the cost of mortgages has resulted in a level that is now about £4,000 a year. Interest rates, at 4.5 per cent., remain close to their historic low levels and it is estimated that there will be about 2 million more home owners by the end of 2006 than there were in 1997. That shows that the Government are introducing precisely the kind of measures that assist home owners by providing stability, low interest rates and certainty.

[Dawn Primarolo]

The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex raised the question of spending on housing, and he was right to do so. It is important that we invest in social housing as well. I can tell him that investment in housing is growing at 4.1 per cent. in real terms from 2004–05 to 2007–08. That compares with 0.2 per cent. from 1979 to 1997. The extra resources are going to every area in England, and the devolved Administrations will receive the Barnett consequential rises.

The hon. Gentleman also made a number of eloquent and pertinent points about defence, diplomacy, the role of the Foreign Office, the importance of the diplomatic service and the contribution made by our armed forces. I entirely agree with him. Such issues are very much in the minds of Ministers as they come forward in the negotiations and discussions with the Chief Secretary on the spending reviews and consider carefully how we balance all our commitments.

There was a great deal of discussion about the environment and the contributions of Opposition Members can be characterised by the words, "We wish the environment were better, but we don't know how to do that." The Budget has set out the next stages in the Government's strategy to tackle the global challenge of climate change, and that includes measures to encourage energy efficiency in the business sector and an increase in the climate change levy in line with inflation as from April 2004.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Dawn Primarolo: Will my hon. Friend forgive me if I do not give way? [HON. MEMBERS: "Aah."] Okay, he has charmed me.

Stephen Pound: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend, but I fear I may disappoint her. She will be as familiar as the rest of the House with the theoretical journal of the Conservatives in Oakleigh ward. In view of what she has just said, did she realise that Councillor Gerard Silverstone, who lives in Brighton but represents constituents in Barnet, is somehow taking advantage of the very transport policies that she has just shared with the House? Does she think that it is an unexpected consequence of our policy and is it one that she now regrets?

Dawn Primarolo: My hon. Friend makes a very interesting point, which I may need a little longer to reflect on than I have this evening. The climate change levy package has made a significant impact on energy consumption if not the travel arrangements of the councillor whom my hon. Friend mentions.

The levy is encouraging businesses to improve their energy efficiency and, as a country, we are reaching our Kyoto targets. We will publish shortly a climate change programme review that will set out the way forward. As Members have rightly pointed out, we need to do more than our Kyoto targets.

The Government are also using the "polluter pays" principle in the implementation of our environment policies. This principle ensures that, by using tax, we can influence behaviour. That is precisely what we have done. As my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) said, far more needs to be done to achieve our objectives.

This has been an interesting two days of the Budget debate. I regret that, because of time, I cannot answer every point that Members made, but I look forward to their participation in considering the Finance Bill, so that we can discuss it in detail. I commend the Budget, which adds measures to enhance our national position as a prime location for inward investment, promotes London, invests in skills, reforms our education and training programme, makes sure that we have the employment skills that we need for the future—

It being Six o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Monday 27 March.

PETITION

Pelican Crossings

6 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Over the last decade, there has been an increasing acceptance by both the public and politicians that road safety for pedestrians, particularly children, the elderly and disabled people, must come above convenience for the motorist, especially around schools and shopping areas and where fast roads must be crossed. I pay tribute to Mrs. Johnson and each of the 400 or 500 signatories to her petition, which states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of the residents of Canvey and others,

Declares that we the residents of Canvey Island and surrounding areas wish to formally record our concerns regarding the lack of safe crossing points on High Road, Canvey Island for pedestrians, particularly the elderly, disabled and those with children.

The Petitioners therefore call on the House of Commons to urge the Government to impress upon Castle Point Borough Council the need to install a new pelican crossing on High Road, Canvey Island, as requested by the Member of Parliament, to improve safety for all pedestrians.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Omid Farivar

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

6.1 pm

Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) (Lab): I want to raise the case of Omid Farivar and his family, who are asylum seekers from Iran living in my constituency. Over the years that I have been in the House, I have dealt with many hundreds and probably thousands of asylum cases. Some have been distressing, and some disturbing, but probably none has been worse and more worrying than this one. I have therefore written to the Home Office and the Minister on a number of occasions, and have asked for a meeting with the Minister, which he refused. I am therefore bringing the case to the Floor of the House to try to draw the Minister's attention to this case's extremely distressing features, which inspire compassion, in the hope that I can get him to reconsider.

All of us who deal regularly with asylum cases know that there has been a continuing hardening of attitudes in the Home Office in recent years, and a growing unwillingness on the part of Ministers to use the discretion given them by Parliament to deal with cases that truly arouse compassion. I still find it hard to believe, however, that any UK Minister, let alone one who claims to be a Labour Minister, can possibly refuse this case. If I do not achieve a reconsideration by the Minister, my concern is that the doctors of my constituent's 13-year-old daughter fear that she is unlikely to reach the age of 14 and extremely likely to commit suicide. I will come to the evidence of that in a moment. In addition, her father, if returned to Iran, is very likely to be executed.

I should stress that I am anxious not to identify the family too closely. I have given the name of my constituent, and I hope that that will not cause ramifications. The obvious reasons for my hesitation are those of privacy and concern for the mental health of the daughter, but also that the family are fearful of any consequences of publicity here for their family in Iran. My regional television company, Central television, was anxious to take up the case and interview the family. Although that might have helped them, they refused, because they fear what might happen at home if they draw attention to themselves.

My constituent is a graduate in chemical engineering. For a time, he was a lecturer, and then became a development and research manager in a substantial factory. His wife is also a chemical engineering graduate, production manager and part-time chemistry teacher. Obviously, the family are highly educated and were living comfortably in Iran.

In February 2003, however, my constituent was involved in a road traffic accident in which a child was seriously injured. That was obviously a tragedy, but it turned into a nightmare for the family, because the boy was the son of a high-ranking member of an Islamist group referred to in Iran as Hizbullahi—as I understand it, all such groups are funatically supportive of the Government, but this particular group is especially fanatical, tends to enforce Government rules, and is known as Feshar. My constituent tells me that its members are hard-line militant enforcers of Islamist rules.

After the accident the police went to the scene, talked to witnesses and took my constituent to a police station, where he was held for three days. The father of the boy then went to the police station and claimed that my constituent had knocked the boy over on purpose. He kicked and beat him. At first the police were inclined to stop that, but when the political-activist senior figure said that my constituent had knocked the boy over on purpose they joined in, and he was beaten very severely.

On the second day, my constituent was asked to sign a confession. He resisted, but was beaten more and then gave in. The confession stated that he had deliberately injured the boy because he was trying to harm the father, and that he had been drinking alcohol. That was all completely untrue, but he signed the confession because he was beaten. He was then taken to court, and was detained while they waited to see what would happen to the boy. He was in prison for two to three weeks; then the boy sadly died.

My constituent's family experienced great difficulty in getting any solicitor to represent him because of the political position of the boy's father, but eventually they found a solicitor who secured his release from prison on bail. When the boy died, however, he was detained again. The court then ordered him to pay blood money or be executed. Obviously he accepted the order to pay blood money, but in such cases the offended party must agree. The boy's family would not accept blood money, but said they would agree to accept it and would not demand execution if my constituent agreed to engage his 11-year-old daughter to the brother of the boy's father, a 42-year-old. The boy's father also went to see my constituent, and said that even if my constituent was executed he would follow his family and take the life of a young person to pay for the life that his own family had lost.

My constituent then talked to his wife and father about what he should do. He thought that perhaps he should accept execution to release his family from the pressure that they were under, but they said "No: agree to the deal. Then at least we can get you out of prison, and try to find a way forward." He therefore accepted the deal and paid the blood money, which he tells me was 15 million toman. I have no idea how much that is, but I imagine that it is a substantial sum.

Then the daughter was engaged to the brother, but whenever the man called at their house she would shake in fear. Her father felt absolutely dreadful, and decided that he could not do it: she was too young. Then his father paid a people-smuggler—one of those people who now run the asylum system of the world—to take the family out of the country. But the smuggler was arrested—I do not think that it was to do with this case—and put in prison, so the money was lost and that plan did not work.

The fiancé—the 42-year-old brother—kept calling at my constituent's house to see his daughter. My constituent said that he could not accept it any more. He dismissed the engagement, and returned the presents that the fiancé had brought.

Before the engagement, the family of the boy who had died in the accident had come to my constituent's house, broken windows and harassed and threatened the family. All that stopped when the engagement was on, but after it was broken off the attacks started again.

[Clare Short]

That led to an invasion of the house. The invaders found the satellite television, which is illegal in Iran. They also claimed to have found political books and alcohol. My constituent tells me that he did have a satellite television, but did not have political books or alcohol. He was not involved in any political activity in Iran. However, the allegations were being made by a political faction, which made him into a political prisoner.

My constituent was then taken to the fanatical group's own prison, which he tells me was very nasty, like a cage, with sharp needle-like pieces of metal embedded in the cement of the floor. He was there for 10 to 12 days. There was no light, and he did not know whether it was day or night. He was taken out of the cage and beaten, then put back, many times. He was then released, because his father had paid a lot of money for him to be released, and told to report to the group daily. He tells me that there are special courts to deal with political offences—Islamic revolutionary courts.

Given the doubts of the regrettably misinformed adjudicator in the case, let me say that Human Rights Watch is very clear about the fact that there are political courts in Iran: there is no question about that. My constituent was not politically active, but he was accused by a political faction of being politically motivated, and was therefore treated as a political prisoner.

My constituent's father, having got him released from prison, looked for a way to get him and his wife, son and daughter out of the country. They found and paid a people-smuggler, who got them false visas on their real passports. By now, they were not staying at home but moving between friends and family. Then, they got the message to go to the airport very early on a fixed day. The smuggler gave them their passports and told them which passport check-line and door to go through. My constituent assumes that people were bribed to let them through. They did not know until that morning where they were going. They had no motivation to get to the UK; they just wanted to get out of the country and the danger that they were in. They were given tickets and told to rip up their passports on the plane and to apply to UK authorities when they arrived, which they did. My constituent knew nothing whatsoever of asylum or any asylum seekers before he came to the UK.

Since the family have been in this country, the daughter has had constant nightmares and will not eat. Her doctors have written medical letters to me; indeed, they are so worried about her that they have even come to see me at my advice bureau. They are extremely fearful that she will commit suicide. I have provided the Home Office with copies of those letters. Dr. Usha Jayarajan, clinical psychologist, and Dr. Irene Lampert, consultant child and adolescent psychiatrist, of Birmingham Children's hospital—a fine and prestigious hospital—say that the girl

"suffers from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder and associated Mood Disorders."

She

"has difficulty sleeping, waking frequently from frightening nightmares where she sees the cyclist who died in the accident in Iran, covered with blood and chasing her with knives in his hands, threatening to kill her and her family."

When she is awake

"she sees people who are walking towards her as the cyclist covered in blood and becomes afraid that he is going to kill her".

She

"experiences many symptoms of acute anxiety; she is sweaty, dizzy, trembling hands, fidgety, palpitations and suffers from headaches."

On one occasion, she "became dizzy resulting in her falling and breaking her leg in three places."

She

"is visibly very tense and has a constant sense of dread"

and

"is unable to eat as it makes her feel nauseous."

When she is awake,

"she reports finding it difficult to think about anything other than the events that led them to flee Iran and how terrible their situation is now, compared to the comfortable life that they had prior to the accident."

She

"has a sense of despair and hopelessness resulting in a persistent wish that she were dead. She has tried to persuade her mother to agree to a suicide pact for the whole family."

The letter continues:

"As we have already indicated, a strong feature of"

the girl's case

"is her persistent wish to kill herself. It is our strong belief that if"

she

"believed that she was to be returned to Iran she would make a serious attempt to kill herself, and would quite possibly succeed, before she ever reached there."

Since that letter was written, I have received a further letter from the doctors. It states that "the situation has gone from bad to worse."

The father is now deeply depressed and there is a lot of blame between daughter and father for what has taken place. The letter continues:

"We have a very real worry, that if the situation is not swiftly resolved, i.e. the family are given permanent permission to stay, then"

she

"is not going to make a recovery."

The doctors have discussed the case with a senior hospital figure, and they are all worried that she

"will not see her 14th birthday. If this were to be the case, then the subsequent impact on the rest of the family is too horrific to contemplate."

As if that were not bad enough, since the family has been in the UK the son has developed leukaemia. A letter from a consultant paediatric haematologist at Birmingham Children's hospital—I have sent a copy of it to the Home Office—dated 7 June 2005 states that the son

"was first diagnosed with acute myeloid leukaemia at the beginning of March 2004 and he received intensive chemotherapy until August 2004. He is currently in remission and on regular follow up. He is not requiring any active treatment at present although there still does remain a significant risk of disease relapse, particularly over the next two to three years . . . treatment was quite intensive and we are continuing to monitor him in the Outpatient Department for any sign of toxic effects following this treatment. He does have a significant risk of relapse and if this occurs he will need intensive further treatment and bone marrow transplant. Were he to return to Iran it is unlikely he would get the sort of follow up that would pick up complications following his treatment and secondly should his disease relapse, he will not have access to multi-agent chemotherapy and transplant as would be available in the U.K. Even should he relapse, he has a good chance of being cured with further intensive treatment."

The tragedy of the boy comes on top of the rest of the tragedy for that family.

Since they have been in the UK, they have kept in touch with the father and mother of my constituent. Their house has been invaded twice by that fanatical group and they have been beaten on both occasions. After the second invasion, the mother had a heart attack, but is still alive.

My constituent is a very intelligent, calm and reflective man. There is no doubt about the sincerity of his belief—I have been to their house and spoken with them at some length—that if he is sent back he would be sent before a political court, because he has been accused of political activity, and probably executed. His children would also be targeted, as was threatened.

I have written to my hon. Friend the Minister and asked for a meeting. His letter of 6 March relies on an adjudication that turned down the family's case. Some of the medical evidence that I have given today was not put before the adjudicator, but the adjudicator simply did not believe the story. There is no doubt in my mind that the adjudicator was simply wrong. The reason Parliament gives Ministers discretion is so that they have the right to overturn a decision when the adjudicator gets it wrong.

It is notable also that in October 2003, before the adjudication, the Home Office argued that the general human rights situation and freedom of speech in Iran were improving, and the country was in a state of transition. I hope it is accepted—it is certainly the rhetoric of our Government—that since the 2005 elections and the appointment, in particular, of Mostafa Pour-Mohammadi as Minister of the Interior, that is emphatically no longer the case. He was previously involved in a decision to execute thousands of political prisoners in 1983, an event that Human Rights Watch considers a serious crime against humanity under international human rights law.

That is the case that I am bringing to the Floor of the House and before the Minister tonight. I am sure that he is very busy and has many cases to consider. Perhaps he has not in the past had time to consider all the details of this case, but I ask him to please, please use his discretion to allow the family to remain in the UK on compassionate grounds because that would save their lives. They are a very nice and highly educated family and, if allowed to stay, I am sure that they would be very good citizens of our country.

6.18 pm

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) on her success in securing the slot for an Adjournment debate today. As she knows, these occasions provide Members with an opportunity to raise in some detail on the Floor of the House issues of a constituency nature. I have to say, for reasons that I will discuss, that I was a little disappointed by her choice of subject, not least because, as she knows only too well, we have been in fairly regular correspondence about the case to which she refers.

I have, as my right hon. Friend knows, taken the time to respond in some detail about the case. However, as a matter of principle, it would not be right for me to discuss on the Floor of the House or in any other public forum the particular circumstances of this or any other asylum case, and I will not do so today. I also consider it inappropriate to discuss this case on the Floor of the House because the applicant's legal representatives have applied for the case to be heard before the High Court under judicial review, and that application remains outstanding. In that context, it simply is not proper for me to discuss the substance or the individual circumstances of the case. I receive numerous requests from MPs to meet and discuss specific cases, and where appropriate I do so. I also receive numerous requests to use my limited discretion, and where appropriate I do so.

I do not agree with my right hon. Friend's contention that there is a growing unwillingness to listen to cases or a hardening of attitude at the Home Office, for reasons that I shall outline as I set out the broad general principles.

My right hon. Friend is more than aware that asylum and human rights applications are considered by the Home Office on their individual merits, in accordance with our obligations under the 1951 UN refugee convention and the European convention on human rights. When cases are assessed as well founded, we provide protection by granting asylum to those who meet the definition of a refugee under the 1951 convention, and by granting humanitarian protection to people who are not refugees but who would face a serious risk to life or person arising from torture, inhumane or degrading treatment or punishment, the death penalty or unlawful killing, and who are not subject to specified exclusion criteria.

Each application is considered against the background of the latest available information about the situation in the country of origin. Full account is taken of the ability of the individual concerned to reside safely in other parts of their country when it is not safe for them to return to their home area. By the bye, however busy I am—and I do not deny that everyone is busy—I take each and every case that comes before me extremely seriously, and read them in as much detail as necessary.

The Government firmly believe that the right approach is to continue to assess carefully the protection needs of individuals on an individual basis. Similarly, returns are taken forward on a case-by-case basis. We enforce the return of an individual only when we are satisfied that to do so would not put the person at risk.

As my right hon. Friend knows, since the new single-tier appeal system was introduced in April 2005, unsuccessful applicants have been able to appeal to the Asylum and Immigration Tribunal. If unsuccessful at appeal, an applicant may submit an application to the tribunal for a review of the decision. The AIT is an independent body established by Parliament to adjudicate on matters of that kind, and I would not normally intervene where an applicant's appeal had been dismissed by the tribunal, except in the most compelling circumstances. In cases where an applicant still has an avenue of appeal, such as an application for judicial review of an immigration decision, it would not be appropriate for a Minister to intervene.

[Mr. Tony McNulty]

As my right hon. Friend knows, the Government expect all asylum seekers found not to be in need of international protection to return to their country of origin. Help and advice for those who want to return voluntarily can be obtained from the immigration office dealing with the applicant's case. Alternatively, such help and advice can be obtained from the International Organisation for Migration, which is an independent body.

Clare Short: I did not know that there was a judicial process, but I have two questions for my hon. Friend. In a case such as this, when he will not agree to meet me and has turned everything down, yet I genuinely and sincerely believe—as do her doctors—that a child is likely to kill herself because her father's life is in danger, how does he recommend that I take the case forward? Secondly, if the judicial process does not lead to success, will he agree to meet me to discuss the case?

Mr. McNulty: Members find ways and means of raising aspects of cases each and every day. I shall not comment directly on the outcome of the judicial process until it is complete. We are doing all we can through the immigration and nationality directorate, to ensure through correspondence, e-mail, hot lines and so on, that any subsequent information that a Member wants to submit about an individual case can be taken fully into consideration. I spend much of my time deferring decisions on removal directions or other aspects of cases so that new information—if it is genuinely new—can be put before the caseworker concerned, or me.

With the greatest respect, I have to point out that with the best will in the world, the issue is not simply about meeting the Minister in every instance. I meet individual MPs and they talk to me about cases and raise specific points with me every time I am in the House. It is right and proper that I should make myself available in that way. As and when appropriate I meet MPs on a regular basis, but I do not do so in every case where a Member has requested a meeting. I do not think that doing so would be fair on the MPs, given the expectations that may or may not be raised with the applications or the general process that I undertake in dealing with cases.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept that things are improving in our interactions with MPs in such cases. We are doing all we can to improve not only the decision-making process and the information made available during that process, and how the IND and the Home Office work with MPs and their caseworkers and correspond about cases, but more broadly in creating a more robust asylum process, rooted in the 1951 convention, which is and must be our starting point.

In conclusion, the IND and the Home Office are doing things far more efficiently, but not in the context of a more hard-headed approach or a growing unwillingness to use discretion. Of course the asylum system, rooted in the 1951 convention and the European convention on human rights, is and should be about dealing with political repression and the circumstances of specific cases and their ins and outs. Rather than going into the specifics of the case—to be perfectly honest, it would be inappropriate to do so on the Floor of the House or in any public forum—it is right and proper that I have dwelt on the broader issues that I hope will be of some use to my right hon. Friend.

Question put and agreed to.

DEATH OF CHRISTOPHER ALDER

Resolved,

That an Humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Return of the Report dated 27th February 2006 of the Review by the Independent Police Complaints Commission into the events leading up to and following the death of Christopher Alder on 1st April 1998.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Joint Strike Fighter

2. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What progress has been made in discussions with the United States about the joint strike fighter. [60957]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): We continue to make good progress with the US to ensure that the UK's military and industrial requirements for the joint strike fighter programme will be met. In the past 10 days, there have been no fewer than three meetings on those very issues with the Senate Committee on Armed Services, involving the Secretary of State and my noble Friend Lord Drayson, the Minister for Defence Procurement; one took place in Washington and two in London. Following those discussions, we remain optimistic that we will be in a position to sign a production, sustainment and follow-on development memorandum of understanding in December, as planned.

Mr. Bone: Does the Minister really believe that the joint strike fighter will ever enter service? If so, when will it do so, and by how much will it be over budget?

Mr. Ingram: Yes, I do, and it will be on programme.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Of course my right hon. Friend is aware of the need to ensure that the contract goes ahead, but as part of that contract we need to see final assembly for the north-west and full heavy maintenance in the United Kingdom. Those are the reassurances that we need, as well as the hope of a short take-off and vertical landing version of the joint strike fighter. Can my right hon. Friend enlighten the House on what progress has been made?

Mr. Ingram: I would love to be able to enlighten my hon. Friend, but no final decisions have yet been made on the points that he raises.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): On the basis of a briefing that I received from our embassy in Washington, may I record my appreciation for what Lord Drayson has done by way of representation on Capitol Hill?

While the Minister pursues his objective of ensuring that the memorandum of understanding is signed in November, what steps are being taken to bring the armed forces committee and the House of Representatives on side? They appear still to be the ultimate logjam.

Mr. Ingram: I know that the right hon. Gentleman has taken a close interest in the matter, and that senior members of his party were present during the representations made in Washington. All the representations are being made as strenuously, as pointedly and, I believe, as constructively as we can make them. Every effort will be made to ensure that that continues, and I know that the right hon. Gentleman will take the opportunity to express his view to those in Washington with whom he is in contact.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that the decision by the United States to cancel the development and construction of the second engine, apart from delivering a blow to British jobs, was shortsighted? In creating competition by developing two engines, we could have driven down costs in the whole project and secured a better engine design.

Mr. Ingram: That was an important part of our earlier approach, and we still believe that it would confer added enhancement and benefits to the programme. We will continue to make that view known. It was raised when my noble Friend Lord Drayson met the US Senate Committee on Armed Services about 10 days ago, and we continue to raise it, along with all the other representations that we make about the need for transfer of the technology.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): I commend the robust attitude that Ministers are taking on the issue of technology transfer, but may I ask how much money has been spent on the programme so far, and what conditions were established at the outset in relation to technology transfer? Clearly we are talking about huge sums, and I presume that the Government must have included some guarantees in the original agreement that they negotiated.

Mr. Ingram: I do not have the precise figure to date, but I can say from memory that it is about $1 billion. I will write to the hon. Gentleman with a more up-to-date figure.

The other issue that has been raised is "Government to Government". We have very good relations with the United States Administration, although obviously we have differences with them as well, and express ourselves forcefully when those differences arise. When agreements are reached, they are reached by two mutual and close partners. I do not see the worries that the hon. Gentleman is trying to raise. I know that there is a bit of anti-Americanism in certain parts of politics today; I think that that is to be regretted, and that it detracts from what we are seeking to do.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): I am sure that the Minister would agree that the JSF is the best aircraft for the roles that are currently envisaged, and that defence technology transfer should not be an issue, given the intelligence co-operation and nuclear weapon technology exchange between the UK and the US. Does he also agree that failure could drive the UK into further European procurement that is not, in this instance, in the strategic interests of either the UK or the United States?

Does the Minister understand the fears of the United States about the leakage of defence technology? Would he care to reflect on the damage done by today's news that 41 German companies are being investigated over sales of equipment and technology to Iran for potential use in its nuclear programme, and the impact that that will have on Capitol Hill?

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his efforts, particularly during his visit to Washington, in trying to ensure that we do what is required to take this programme forward. We have made it clear that we want to win the contract on the proposed basis and we are making every effort to achieve that. The US Administration—and, indeed, beyond that—well understand the strength of our case, but it does not help to point out that other nations are allegedly involved in things that they should not be doing, as such a claim has been the basis of press reports. Clearly, there are some concerns within the US about this matter. As I said in my earlier answer to the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey), the issue will be settled on the basis of the good relationship that exists between very close allies and partners. If we strike the deal that we want, I am sure that every aspect will be honoured on both sides of the relationship.

Veterans Badge

3. Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): What progress he has made with his plans for the veterans badge now that the one year trial period has come to an end. [60958]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I can confirm that, following the trial, which proved its popularity, we will continue to issue the veterans badge to service leavers. I can also tell the House that more than 200,000 badges have been issued to date and eligibility to apply will be extended to all qualifying veterans as soon as it is practicable to do so, so that all generations can have the privilege and honour of wearing it.

Mr. Wright: Of all the issues that I have dealt with during my time in the House the veterans badge has had the greatest impact in respect of take-up among constituents—and rightly so. Will the Minister expand on his answer and tell us what plans he has to extend the scope of the badge to other campaigns—perhaps to include widows of veterans, too?

Mr. Touhig: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced on 13 February that we will extend eligibility to veterans who served in our forces up to 31 December 1959. They are now able to apply for the veterans badge. I can tell my hon. Friend that those eligible to apply for it are members of the armed forces, the merchant navy, the Home Guard, the Polish forces and the UK command in the Cyprus Regiment. The badge can also be awarded posthumously to widows who are in receipt of a service pension. I have letters almost every day from people across the country who are hugely grateful for the opportunity to wear the badge. It was a fantastic idea that has been a huge success and it demonstrates how much the whole House and the whole nation value our veterans.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): While I recognise that, is not the present position unfair to people who served the country during the last war, but who were precluded from joining the armed forces because they had to work in reserved industries and other such areas? If it is inappropriate to give them a veterans badge, does not the Minister believe that something should be done to reward people who served their country well, but not necessarily in the armed forces?

Mr. Touhig: Our success in prosecuting and winning the last war was the result of the whole nation's efforts, and I am sure that the whole House recognises that. Our responsibilities, however, relate to those who served in His Majesty's armed forces at the time. That is why the veterans badge is awarded in the way that it is. I am aware of the contribution of the Bevin boys, the land army and others and I understand that some people believe that they should also qualify—a matter for my ministerial colleagues in other Departments as well as me—but I certainly share the sentiment behind the hon. Gentleman's point.

Royal Regiment of Scotland (Kilts)

4. Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): What guidelines he has laid down for the procurement of the tartan material required for the production of the new Royal Regiment of Scotland kilts. [60959]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Procurement of kilts for the Royal Regiment of Scotland will be carried out under public procurement regulations, which are applicable under United Kingdom and European Union law. Sourcing the tartan will be the responsibility of the successful bidder. Award of the contract for the kilts will be based on a thorough assessment of quality and technical standards as defined by the user, as well as on cost in order to ensure best value for money for the taxpayer.

Mr. McGovern: I thank the Minister for his response and for the correspondence that he sent me on this matter. However, there remains considerable concern in Scotland that the new tartan might well be manufactured outwith Scotland, possibly in eastern Europe. On this, the very day before the official formation of the new Royal Regiment of Scotland, will the Minister assure the House that, just as Jersey potatoes must come from Jersey and Newcastle brown ale from Newcastle, the new Scottish tartan for the new Scottish regiment will be manufactured in Scotland?

Mr. Ingram: I know that my hon. Friend is trying valiantly on this issue, but we are constrained by European regulation. [Interruption.] Perhaps I should explain that the current prime contractor for the kilts is based in England.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I am astonished by the Minister's last remark. My understanding is that the firm of John Noble and Co., in Peebles, has made the kilt for the British Army in Scotland since the late 18th century, and that the contract is for 5,000 kilts at a cost of £300,000. The Minister must appreciate that the Scottish soldier's kilt has always been made in Scotland. It is made there now by John Noble and Co., and surely the Minister can see that both its weaving and manufacture should continue to be done in Scotland.

Mr. Ingram: On a point of accuracy, Robert Noble and Co. makes the tartan, the prime contractor is a Yorkshire-based company and a company in Alexandria manufactures the kilts. The contract, which is a £1 million contract for 5,000 kilts, will go out to tender. There will be a repeat contract for 300 kilts each year. The material in question is not being changed; it is already in use. We are simply standardising the use of a material that used to apply only to certain officers throughout all the ranks.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Army kit that used to be made in Lancashire is now being made in China. It is simply unacceptable for the tartan for Scottish kilts to be sourced from Shanghai or any place in eastern Europe, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. McGovern) suggests.

Mr. Ingram: I do not know whether that was a question. There were a number of bidders for the contract to which my hon. Friend refers and, from memory, they all outsourced outside the United Kingdom for the material and its manufacturing. Indeed, the company that previously had responsibility for the manufacture of the uniform in question—it was one of the two main competitors in the bid—was also seeking to outsource in China.

Housing

5. Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the housing needs of former servicemen and women and their families. [60960]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): We recognise that many service personnel and their families need assistance with, and advice on, housing matters. Through the Joint Service Housing Advice Office, we provide comprehensive advice on housing options and, in some cases, assistance with housing placement where personnel are about to return to civilian life. In addition, we work closely with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, ex-service charities and other specialist services to help identify those who might be at risk of homelessness.

Mrs. Dorries: The situation that servicemen and women find themselves in before discharge has been highlighted by my serving constituent, Mr. Nick Cowan. Housing associations are able to step in only when such people are officially declared homeless—28 days before discharge—and charities are left to pick up the pieces. The JSHAO to which the Minister just referred provides only advice, not, as he stated, assistance. Is this the way to repay loyal servicemen and women?

Mr. Touhig: I am of course familiar with the case that the hon. Lady mentions; she has corresponded with me about it and I have answered some of her questions. I do not doubt her commitment to her constituent and the hard work that she has done on this issue, but I suggest that she look at her website, on which she says that one of her priorities is opposing the Government's "damaging" house building plans. Well, we have to have houses to house people in the first place; nevertheless, she makes an important point. [Interruption.] If the hon. Lady will listen, I will give an answer. We have been working across the board to try to deal with these issues but, as she knows, questions of housing priority are often a matter for local housing authorities. The council in the area represented by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State gives housing priority to those who have served in the armed forces, and I urge councils throughout the country to think on that.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): When a member of the armed forces is discharged and is looking for a roof over their head, they are at a disadvantage in gaining access to social housing. No matter how long they have been based in a particular area, their residence does not establish a local connection in the eyes of many councils, although there are honourable exceptions. Effectively, such people are treated in the same way as those who are resident in prisons. Why, in the light of the Minister's concerns, have Ministers from the Ministry of Defence and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister not met to discuss the local housing connection?

Mr. Touhig: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that we have ongoing discussions with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister so that we can overcome some of the problems, but as I pointed out a moment ago the allocation of priority housing is a matter for local housing authorities. When I was a young councillor in my 20s, my council gave priority housing to key workers and those who had served in our forces. We understand the problems experienced by those who have served in our forces as they move into civilian life and we do everything possible to make sure that the transition is smooth. We give every support that we possibly can, but often people want to be housed in an area to which the local authority feels that they have no particular links or connection so they do not receive priority. We shall do all that we can to bring the matter to the attention of the Local Government Association and others. At present, the LGA is run by a member of the hon. Gentleman's party, so he might care to make representations to the association to urge local authorities across Britain to give priority to our ex-servicemen and women who apply for housing.

Afghanistan

6. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If he will make a statement on the deployment of troops to Afghanistan. [60961]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): I offer my condolences to the family and friends of Corporal Mark Cridge who died last week in Afghanistan. I have today learned of another fatality in Afghanistan, believed to be a road traffic accident and my thoughts are also with his family and friends—as, I am sure, are the thoughts of the whole House.

We are in Afghanistan under United Nations Security Council resolution 1623 and at the invitation of the democratically elected Government to prevent that country from ever again reverting to being a haven for terrorists, by helping the Afghan people build their own democracy, security and legitimate economy.

Miss McIntosh: I join the Secretary of State in expressing my condolences to the bereaved and their loved ones.

Does the Secretary of State agree that the developments pose further questions about the security of the theatre where UK service personnel are based? Why did he write to me on 27 February to tell me that no one was being deployed from the Vale of York, yet I have learned subsequently that 215 personnel from one base in the Vale of York are going to Afghanistan and that a number from another base who were supposed to go there are being redirected to Iraq? Does not that pose serious questions about the Ministry of Defence's knowledge of what is going on and who is currently being deployed to Afghanistan?

John Reid: First, I thank the hon. Lady for her shared condolences for Corporal Cridge and his family and the family of the second deceased to whom I referred.

We are in Afghanistan for a clear reason: to assist the people of Afghanistan to build their own democracy, security and economy, thereby preventing the country from falling back under the heel of the Taliban and the terrorists, since it was from there that the worst-ever terrorist atrocity was launched. I fully accept that it is more dangerous in the south than anywhere else where we have been present hitherto, but whatever the dangers, they are less than the danger of the Taliban and the terrorists taking over Afghanistan again, which would be a danger to not only our forces but the people of that country.

I apologise if I have given the hon. Lady wrong information and will check immediately after Question Time and write to her again. From memory, I am not aware of the specific details of the letter, but I shall check the position and rectify it as necessary.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): As the Secretary of State has told the Select Committee on Defence, if British troops in Afghanistan take people into detention, it is the Government's policy that they be handed over to the Afghan authorities. Is it the Secretary of State's understanding that the United Kingdom maintains a duty of care for such people even after they have been handed to the Afghan authorities?

John Reid: Obviously, the British authorities' duty of care is primarily while people are in their custody, which is, as the right hon. Gentleman said, for only a limited period. I think that we can detain someone for up to 96 hours before handing them over to the Afghan authorities, which now operate under the sovereignty of a democratically elected Government who bear prime responsibility for the custody of such detainees—as any Government must.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): Yesterday, the international security think-tank the Senlis Council reported that millions of pounds of compensation promised by British officials to farmers in the Helmand province has not been paid. Some 400 cheques, drawn on a British Government account, have even bounced because of insufficient funds. Does the Secretary of State accept that the resultant damage to good will in the province will make the British deployment in Afghanistan even more difficult and dangerous than it could have been?

John Reid: What I do accept is that if part of the building of a legitimate economy is the interdiction of an illegitimate economy—the production of opium and narcotics—it must be accompanied by some alternative income and livelihood for the farmers. What I do not necessarily accept are the views of the group to which the hon. Gentleman referred. As he will know, it campaigns for the legitimising of the production of opium and drugs on the grounds that they could be used for medicinal purposes. We have considered that, but we do not believe that it is viable in the present situation in Afghanistan. More importantly, the Government of Afghanistan do not believe that that is viable. We must be a little careful about accepting the assertions of people who have an agenda to promote. They are entitled to promote it, but we are entitled to regard it as incompatible in the present situation.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): May I first associate the Opposition with the remarks made by the Secretary of State following the further loss of life, albeit not as a result of conflict? It nevertheless illustrates the risks facing our armed forces and the courage with which they are undertaking the missions that we ask of them.

Does the Secretary of State believe that the two strategic aims of suppressing the insurgents and seeking simultaneously to eliminate the poppy supply in Helmand province are compatible, or does he share my concern about the grave risk of creating an unholy alliance between the Taliban, the warlords and the poppy farmers? If the latter's livelihoods are destroyed, they may vent their spleen not only on Afghan forces but on British troops acting in their support.

John Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his condolences. The strategic aim of the international security assistance force is not to suppress the insurgents and eliminate the poppy trade. That is the strategic aim of Operation Enduring Freedom, which is the American-led exercise to chase the terrorists and the insurgents. The strategic aim of ISAF is to provide the security umbrella within which the Afghan Government can extend their control, the security forces to protect that democratic control can be built up and the economy can be built up. It is in the course of that that we have to tackle the drugs trade.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman wholeheartedly that in doing that latter task, it is necessary to ensure that if the farmers are, to a greater or lesser extent, dependent on income from narcotics—let us remember that they are Afghan farmers and have nowhere else to go—it would be unwise to remove that income without a replacement income in the short term and a replacement livelihood in the longer term. We would then create not stability, but insurgency. I therefore agree with the hon. Gentleman that that is a very important task in the pursuit of our strategic objectives.

Cadet Forces

7. Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to support the cadet forces. [60962]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): The Ministry of Defence provides direct funding of approximately £95 million a year to allow the cadet forces to offer a vast range of personal development and educational opportunities for young people and, with their nationwide reach, act as a genuine force for good, both for the youngsters who join and the communities in which they are based. In addition, the armed forces support the cadet forces with a significant benefit in kind in the form of training facilities, matériel and some manpower resources.

Ms Johnson: Given the success of project outreach, does my hon. Friend agree that even more encouragement of young people to engage with cadet projects would not only benefit the young people but would fit very well into the Government's respect agenda?

Mr. Touhig: I certainly endorse the point that my hon. Friend makes. Indeed, just a week or so ago, on 19 March, I had the opportunity to visit an outreach project at Sennybridge. It was a dry and beautiful day. [Interruption.] I should add that there was no rain in the Brecon Beacons on that day, given comments made by Opposition Members. The programme is run by the Army cadet force. It is a project that helps youngsters build confidence and raise self-esteem, and it offers them a positive purpose. Many of them who come from disadvantaged backgrounds certainly benefit from it. Those values are part of the Government's respect agenda, which we can all endorse. I pay tribute to those people whom I saw that day. They work very hard with those youngsters, some of whom come from difficult backgrounds who saw the programme as a second chance—perhaps their only chance—and I pay tribute to those who work in project outreach: it is a great success.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): As president of the Ellesmere cadets, I wholeheartedly support the cadets and their expansion into state schools—something that the Chancellor said in February he wanted to take place. How and when will that happen, and who will pay?

Mr. Touhig: The hon. Gentleman refers to one of the most exciting developments in the cadet forces at present. There have been discussions between my Department and officials at the Department for Education and Skills for some time, and we have now extended those discussions to include the Treasury. We hope to announce a series of pilot schemes across the country that will extend the combined cadet force into state schools. We hope that some of the funding will come from the private sector and some from the Government. We have to resolve a number of key issues. Obviously, funding is one of them. We need to identify the schools and ensure that there is appropriate support for the project. We need to ensure that we have enough people to train and take part in those schemes, but we are working very hard, and I hope that, before too long, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will be able to make a further announcement on the issue.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): I have in my constituency TS Fort Grange, with 66 youngsters on the books and a waiting list—of course, the RAF and the Army have a similar story—but does my hon. Friend recognise that the biggest stumbling block that cadet forces come up against relates to adult civilian volunteers? How can we hope to expand the scheme, which I would love to expand, if we cannot find ways to encourage more adults to help those youngsters in a very important part of their development?

Mr. Touhig: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We now have 3,300 units across the country, with 130,000 cadets and 23,000 adult volunteers, but I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise the fact that the success of the whole cadet movement is dependent on the ability to attract and retain sufficient adult instructors who are willing to take part. As part of the work that we are now undertaking with the Department for Education and Skills and the Treasury, we hope to address this matter so that we can take forward the agenda. We recognise the difficulties and shortfalls, and it is a major objective of ours to try to correct them.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): How much of the funding that the Minister mentioned goes to the sea cadets?

Mr. Touhig: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the precise figures to break down the £95 million that we give to our cadet forces. I am conscious of the various ways in which we raise funding for the cadet forces. That is somewhat haphazard and we should look at it. I am exploring one or two ideas of my own, and perhaps we can consider better longer-term funding by which the cadet forces might be able to apply to a trust of some sort, so that we could ensure that they have a proper stream of funding. I do not underestimate the great work done by the cadet forces—I pay tribute to them for it—and I am conscious of the fact that we have a responsibility to ensure that they are properly funded. I am actively looking at ways to try to improve that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I call Sharon Hodgson. I call Mr. David Crausby.

Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am getting ahead of myself. I call Edward Miliband.

Veterans Challenge Fund

8. Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): What projects the veterans challenge fund has supported in the last 12 months. [60963]

Mr. Touhig: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for keeping on track.

The veterans challenge fund offers £750,000 each year to pump-prime projects that support our veterans strategy. During the past 12 months, the fund has provided funding for a number of projects, including a study by Manchester university into suicide among veterans, support to the project that seeks to find employment for homeless veterans and advice for those who seek to work with veterans in prison.

Edward Miliband: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that the veterans challenge fund can play an important role in helping excellent organisations, such as the Dunscroft branch of the Royal British Legion in my constituency, at whose annual dinner I am speaking, as part of the veterans day celebrations? Does he further agree that all hon. Members have a responsibility to help to promote take-up and awareness of the veterans challenge fund, so that our most vulnerable veterans can get the support that they deserve?

Mr. Touhig: I am in the happy position of being a Minister who has money to give away. I want to make sure that more and more veterans organisations apply for funding from the challenge fund. Indeed, I spoke at the veterans forum only last week and urged more organisations to apply. I hope that Members on both sides of the House will recognise the important contribution that the challenge fund makes. There are funds available and I urge Members to look for opportunities for organisations that support the veterans agenda in their constituencies to bid for funding. The number to ring is 0800 1692277 or they can write directly to me and I will give them the address.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): I am genuinely confused about why that work cannot be done through the Royal British Legion. Will the Minister explain the difference between veterans day and Armistice Sunday? These veterans initiatives are all extremely worth while, but there is scope for some confusion. In a constituency such as mine, it is quite difficult and challenging to find sufficient volunteers to collect for poppy day. There may well be some scope for distraction if we have too many initiatives, rather than concentrating on those that are well established.

Mr. Touhig: We may be a bit ahead of ourselves: the next question is about veterans day. However, I will respond to the hon. Gentleman's point. We are determined that the 11 November commemoration should remain the national commemoration when the country comes together to remember those who gave their lives for the forces in defence of our freedom and way of life. We in no way wish to take from that important and historic event the solemnity that the whole country places on it and we pay tribute to the work done by the Royal British Legion in helping to promote and organise that event, and in particular in promoting poppy day. The purpose of veterans day follows on from last year's successful veterans awareness week. We wanted to set aside a day every year—we have chosen 27 June—on which the whole country can commemorate veterans and celebrate with veterans. That is more a day of celebration and of paying tribute to those who have given a great deal in support and defence of our country. It is quite clearly different from the 11 November memorial and that is how we want to keep it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: At the risk of repeating myself, I call Mrs. Sharon Hodgson.

Veterans Day

9. Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): What progress the Government have made with their plans to mark veterans day. [60964]

13. Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East) (Lab): What progress the Government have made with their plans to mark veterans day. [60969]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): The Government's decision to institute an annual veterans day on 27 June provides a major new opportunity to celebrate the enormous contribution that veterans have made to our country. Plans are progressing well for a London event, linked with the celebrations of the 150th anniversary of the institution of the Victoria cross, which will pick up on the qualities of supreme courage shown by those who are awarded that medal. I am also encouraging the involvement of school children, veterans and other members of the public right across the country so that we make this a truly national celebration of the contribution that veterans have made to life in our country.

Mrs. Hodgson: What role can hon. Members play in encouraging their constituents to mark that important day?

Mr. Touhig: I hope that colleagues on both sides of the House will take the opportunity to talk to veterans organisations in their constituencies and to their local authorities and others so that we can organise all sorts of events to commemorate veterans day. It is important that we recognise that veterans come in all ages, shapes and sizes. In Newcastle recently, when I did a radio interview about the advertising campaign that we were launching for the Veterans Agency, it was put to me that veterans are generally people who fought in the last war, but I was alongside a veteran who was in her 30s and had two young children. Veterans come in all ages, shapes and sizes and have made a huge contribution to our country. I hope that veterans day this year will raise awareness across the country that a veteran is someone who has served in our armed forces. Some 23,000 people leave our armed forces every year and they should be honoured as veterans as much as anybody else.

Mr. Crausby: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware that Bolton United Services Veterans Association was formed 100 years ago, in 1906, to provide welfare and comfort to servicemen who suffered in the Boer war? It continues to do a fantastic job to this very day. Will he see whether he can provide any additional help to it in celebrating its centenary?

Mr. Touhig: Yes, of course I will. Indeed, I invite colleagues on both sides of the House to come forward with ideas. If we are able to provide support and encouragement, and even help to look for some funding, we will certainly do that. We want the day to be an annual commemoration and celebration of veterans. I pay tribute to the organisation to which my hon. Friend refers. If he would like to get in touch with me directly, I will do everything I can to help the commemorations and celebrations in his constituency.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Is veterans day going to be a public holiday; and if not, why not?

Mr. Touhig: I had to answer such a question about St. David's day when I was a Wales Minister. It is a problem, but there are no plans to make veterans day a public holiday. However, I would say that we see this as a process, not an event. We think that the day will evolve year after year. We will stick to commemorating and celebrating veterans on 27 June, and I have no doubt that in time there will be a great many events throughout the country that will lead us to celebrate and cherish what our veterans have done. Who knows? At some time in the future the hon. Gentleman's point might well be on the agenda, but it is not at present.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): May I express a degree of surprise and puzzlement about the origins of veterans day? Does the Minister accept that the Government have received strong support from the Opposition for a whole raft of commemoration events, whether they be for the battle of the Atlantic, or the end of world war two—VE-day and VJ-day? Can he honestly say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had serious discussions with the Ministry of Defence and the Veterans Agency before making the announcement? The Chancellor did not seem to be aware that there was already an archive of veterans' memories when he talked of children going round with tape recorders recording them—as the Minister knows, the Imperial War museum does that very well. Did the Chancellor realise that, in America, veterans day is the same as Armistice day, and does the Minister accept that veterans day could, to some extent, undermine Armistice day in this country?

Mr. Touhig: On the last point, I do not. As I said earlier, I am very keen that we hold 11 November in a special place in the hearts of the whole country as a day on which we solemnly remember those who made a sacrifice for our country to defend the freedoms that we enjoy today. Veterans day is meant as a celebration for veterans of all ages who have served our country at all times in the past.

I can tell the hon. Gentleman that I welcome the support of the Opposition—all parties in the House—for the various decisions and acts that we have taken to commemorate and celebrate veterans. However, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence launched veterans awareness week last year, he made it quite clear that it would not be a one-off event and that we would have ongoing events. We have concluded—this was the reason for his announcement—that we will have a veterans day this year. We think that 27 June is the appropriate time of year to hold it for various reasons, such as the fact that it is away from 11 November and the time at which we celebrate Her Majesty's official birthday. I hope that everyone will see the day as a significant move forward to recognise our veterans' contributions, support it and do all that they can to make it a success.

Educational Qualifications

11. Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): How many members of the armed forces gained a recognised educational qualification in the last 12 months. [60966]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): The armed forces provide opportunities to gain recognised qualifications through the accreditation of military education and training programmes and attendance on full-time courses. In the first six months of the financial year, some 13,000 qualifications were achieved, ranging from apprenticeships to post-graduate awards. In addition, approximately 13,500 level 1 awards in either literacy or numeracy were achieved during 2005.

Mr. McFadden: I thank the Minister for his reply. I am sure that he agrees that education and training make an extremely important contribution to our armed forces. Does he agree that the combination of future defence training on a single site could offer huge educational benefits to the armed forces? Does he further agree that RAF Cosford in the west midlands—it is in the constituency of the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard)—with its excellent transport links, the value-for-money bid behind it and its location in an existing network of excellent aerospace, engineering and technological skills, is the ideal place for such future combined defence training?

Mr. Touhig: I do not know why, but I thought that my hon. Friend would refer to the defence training review. It was at the back of my mind.

The defence training review programme is at an advanced stage. Bidders' proposals for both packages of training have been received and are being evaluated. All bidders understand the potential of Cosford and St. Athan, the other possible location. Naturally, this is a competitive phase. We will go through the process in an open and transparent way. A decision will be made at the appropriate time on the future of the defence training review. I acknowledge the importance of training, and the important contribution that defence training makes to our whole economy.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Is the Minister concerned that the increased speed of turnaround for overseas deployments is having an impact on educational opportunities, in particular for younger soldiers?

Mr. Touhig: No, I am not.

John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): Given the importance of educational achievement in the military, will my hon. Friend give a categorical assurance that no single service will unduly influence the evaluation process taking place for the defence training rationalisation programme and threaten to undermine the Government's policy of achieving a modern, flexible, agile and new system of training that is genuinely tri-service and based on one site?

Mr. Touhig: Let me make it clear that an extensive and robust evaluation process is in place to examine the bidders that seek to win the defence training review programme. The recommendation will come to me later than I had anticipated, and it is more likely that a decision will now be announced in October. However, I want to make it clear that that will be open and transparent. There is an independent evaluation at every stage of the operation, and I want everyone to be assured that the decision will be taken in the best interests of defence training and the best interests of Britain plc.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The Minister's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) was insubstantial and unsatisfactory. The time between infantry deployments is three months shorter than the publicly stated target of the Ministry of Defence. That must have some impact. What quantitative or qualitative assessment has the hon. Gentleman made?

Mr. Touhig: The shortness of the answer does not in any way undermine its quality. I hope the hon. Gentleman accepts that. However, I will take his point on board and further consider his comments and those of the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone). If appropriate action is needed in terms of writing to them, I will certainly do that.

India

12. Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): If he will make a statement on co-operation with India on defence issues. [60967]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): In September 2004, the United Kingdom and India signed a joint declaration reaffirming the commitment to the comprehensive strategic partnership that exists between our two countries. Co-operation on defence and security issues forms an important aspect of this partnership, and we have excellent defence relations on a range of activities, including joint exercises, the co-production of defence equipment and high-level strategic dialogue.

Dr. Kumar: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. I praise the Government for their efforts in building relations between Britain and India. Our relationship is the strongest it has ever been, certainly in all the years of my adult life. Given that the declaration was agreed nearly 18 months ago, what real progress has been made between us and India on defence co-operation?

John Reid: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments, which recognise the closeness of the relationship, not only because we have a strong bilateral link with our Indian colleagues, but because we fully recognise the strategic importance of India and its emergence as a great world power.

Our defence engagement with India is growing significantly. Last year, for instance, we held the first joint Army exercise, and we are now planning for joint naval and air exercises later this year. We have a number of other bilateral relations. On the industrial side, there has been a major contract for the Hawk jet trainer, and there are other aspects, too. We have also formed an excellent platform, through the purchase of the Hawk, for co-operating on other defence matters, such as the joint training of Indian pilots alongside their British counterparts at RAF Valley. Of course, we have strongly supported the US-Indian nuclear initiative from its inception. We are beginning to put a lot of flesh on the bones of our partnership.

Afghanistan

14. David Wright (Telford) (Lab): What discussions he has had with NATO and other allies on the deployment of British troops in Afghanistan. [60970]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): I have regular discussions with NATO and other allies regarding the deployment of forces into Afghanistan, including a recent informal meeting of NATO Defence Ministers at Taormina.

David Wright: Further to the Secretary of State's earlier reply about British forces in Afghanistan undertaking predominantly a policing role, will he tell the House what discussions he has had with neighbouring nations, and indeed NATO forces, about Afghanistan's fairly porous borders, where insurgents come across from other countries and then escape and evade capture? How does he ensure in those discussions that British troops on the ground are protected effectively?

John Reid: I would not accept the description of a policing role, although my hon. Friend is correct in that I did make the point that we are not in Afghanistan primarily to wage war or to search for and destroy terrorists. Rather, we are there to act as a protective military force, protecting not only ourselves but the Afghan Government and those working with them to build their economy, their democracy and their security.

There are two elements to our force protection. The first is our force configuration—including air mobile components and Apache helicopters deployed for the first time in action—which was specified by our chiefs as the necessary one to defend our forces. Secondly, we are of course not going into the south of Afghanistan alone: to the east of us will be about 2,500 Canadian troops; and to the north in Oruzgan province there will be 1,400 Dutch troops, several hundred Australians, and Estonians and troops from the Afghan national army. There are around 9,000 troops there, and although I do not for one moment belittle the difficulties and dangers of deployment to the south, I am satisfied that, subject always to preliminary operations of our forces on the ground and what they discover, we have the configuration necessary to protect our troops.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): The Secretary of State has set out this afternoon three rather general aspirations that the deployment of our troops and NATO troops to Afghanistan is supposed to support—namely, promotion of democracy, economic infrastructure building and poppy eradication. Will he, perhaps by way of written answer, set out more detail on those three aspirations so that the House and the country at large can judge whether they have been achieved?

John Reid: On the first point, the House will accept that not only did my predecessor set out the origins of our intervention in Afghanistan but I made an oral statement clearly outlining those aspirations at the recent deployment of our troops to Afghanistan. Secondly, it is rather difficult to set out now what we have achieved there since we have hardly even got the troops there. A better time to do that would be after a period spent there.

RAF (Lift Capability)

17. Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): What assessment he has made of the lift capability of the Royal Air Force. [60973]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): We keep our air lift capability under review to ensure that we have access to sufficient capacity to support operations.

Mr. Hurd: I thank the Minister for that reply and remind him that on 26 January the Secretary of State confirmed to the House the "essential" role of both support and attack helicopters in our operations in Afghanistan. Will the Minister confirm the accuracy of reports in The Mail on Sunday this weekend suggesting that of 227 Lynx and Gazelle helicopters only 94 are fit for purpose and of use? If those reports are true, can the Minister explain how we have come to this sorry pass?

Mr. Ingram: Reluctant as I am to confirm anything in The Mail on Sunday because it is always hard to find anything that I would agree with in that newspaper, I can say that the report was based on a written answer that I gave—

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): That is why it is unreliable.

Mr. Ingram: What I was going to say was that "fit for purpose" means that there are a number of helicopters that are just short of attaining that, and one has to look at fleet availability in the round. In terms of what is required, the capability will be there and it will be sustained. Let us be clear: the Apache attack helicopter, which is a very important force, will play its part in Afghanistan if it is called upon to do so.

Combat Identification

18. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What steps his Department plans to take to improve combat identification. [60974]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The National Audit Office report on progress on combat identification published earlier this month identified a number of areas where we are pursuing improvements in combat identification, including working with international partners on compatible approaches and solutions; delivering new equipment capability; putting greater emphasis on human factors; improving data collection; and learning from operational and exercise experience. We shall continue to take that work forward to a conclusion.

Mr. Kidney: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Is he aware that David Clarke was 19 when he died in Iraq three years ago last weekend? David's tank was hit by a shell fired by another British tank, but obviously that is not the only incident of so-called blue on blue during the conflict in Iraq. Does my right hon. Friend agree with my summary of the NAO report that the Ministry of Defence is doing the right work on combat identification and has the right plan of action for the future? However, the report advises the Department to undertake that work with much more urgency. Does he agree that it would be a fitting tribute to David and all the brave troops who have died in Iraq in such incidents if we completed that work quickly?

Mr. Ingram: I know that my hon. Friend takes a close interest in the matter, and I am only too aware of his constituent's age. The board of inquiry into the Challenger incident made recommendations in eight specific areas, including operational doctrine and training and procedures, and they have all been accepted and followed up.

It takes time to ensure that there is interoperability and compatibility between allies. If we develop new technical solutions to deal with the problem, we must ensure that they stand the test of time, are robust and meet specific needs. Anyone who understands the issue, as my hon. Friend does, knows that it is not just about technical solutions but about situational awareness and dealing with the human factor. Lessons on training and approach have had to be learned from the tragic incidents that have taken place, and they will clearly help us to improve in all those areas.

Iraq

19. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): If he will make a statement on the safety of British soldiers in Iraq. [60976]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): I am deeply saddened by reports of a bomb at a United States-Iraqi facility near Mosul in Iraq. I understand that there are numerous casualties, although the situation is still developing. Such attacks not only identify the threat to our troops and those of the coalition but highlight the barbarism of terrorists who go to sickening lengths to prevent the progress of democracy and security in Iraq. We will not be cowed by the actions of the minority, nor will our troops. We will not leave under such threats, and we will stay in Iraq as long as the Iraqis need us. We will take all necessary measures to protect our own troops.

Mr. Robertson: I thank the Secretary of State for his reply, but the whole House will find it depressing. It has been said in Iraq at a senior level that if "this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is."

The Secretary of State disagreed with that comment, and he has access to far more information than I do. However, it is fair to say that the situation for our troops in Iraq is dangerous. Can he not give the House any further assurance than the answer that he has just given?

John Reid: First, on the question on the situation in Iraq, it was not me who denied that there was a civil war in Iraq but everyone to whom I spoke, including President Talabani, Prime Minister Ja'afari, the Foreign Minister, Defence Minister Delami, Al-Hakim, the head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, Tariq Al-Hashimi, the leader of the Sunni Iraqi Islamic party and, indeed, Ayad Allawi himself in private on the very day that he said something different in public. I have only conveyed the position presented to me by politicians from a range of backgrounds. Nevertheless, the point is not to argue about the definition of a conflict but to accept that as a result of deliberate provocation and the terrorists' intentional aim to provoke a civil war that is neither imminent nor inevitable there has been an increase in sectarian killings leading to a situation that no one can regard with complacency.

In that situation, as regards British troops and the area under our control, less than 3 per cent. of the terrorist attacks are carried out in our four provinces. Indeed, 14 out of the 18 provinces of Iraq are relatively unscathed by terrorist attacks. That is not to diminish the significance of the four areas where there are such difficult attacks. Today, again, we have seen some of the horrendous consequences of that. Finally, rather than be divided by the provocation of sectarian violence, the best thing the Iraqi politicians could do is what they are doing: come together in unity to form a Government of national unity. That should give heart to us all.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): Will the Secretary of State comment on reports about increasing Iranian involvement in anti-coalition activities, including the supply of improvised explosive devices, infiltration of the security forces, and the training of insurgents, all of which pose increased risks to British forces? Can he again assure the House that there will be no premature withdrawal of forces for domestic political reasons? If the answer to the question "Who won the Iraq war?" becomes "Iran", that would represent a catastrophic strategic failure.

John Reid: On the first point, I can do no better than repeat what I have said before about the linkage of the bombs that have in recent times been discovered in the south of Iraq. We believe that they are linked through Hezbollah to Iranian influence, though we have no concrete evidence that they are linked to the Iranian Government. The Iranian Government deny such linkage and we have made it plain that there should be no role for any country bordering Iraq other than to support the democratically elected Iraqi Government.

On the hon. Gentleman's second point, I can give an assurance, as I have done all along and did again today, that we will hand over to the Iraqis when the conditions on the ground permit. We will not stay one day longer than we are needed and wanted by them, but we will not leave one day too early against their wishes or under threat. The only thing that is achieved by continuing terrorist activities is to delay the day that the multinational forces withdraw, not to expedite it.

Rural Payments Agency

3.32 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the Rural Payments Agency.

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): In my written statement to the House on 16 March, I told the House that the Rural Payments Agency had advised me for the first time on 14 March that it would no longer be possible to make the bulk of single payment scheme payments by 31 March, and that in the light of this unacceptable situation a new chief executive would be appointed. I fully understand and share the anxieties that these events will cause to the farming community, and deeply regret that this unacceptable situation has arisen.

I received an initial report from the acting chief executive, Mark Addison, on the situation at the RPA on 21 March. There are substantial problems facing the RPA in getting SPS payments out to farmers—much greater than had previously been reported to Ministers. As I know the House and the farming community would expect, speeding up those payments remains the overwhelming priority of Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Ministers and of RPA staff. However, it remains essential that actions taken now in response to these problems are carefully considered but also sure-footed, to avoid making the problems still worse in the future.

Mr. Addison's report identified some initial steps to take, which should enable us to speed up payments without losing sight of the need to manage properly the disbursement of a large sum of public money. These are the initial steps that I have sanctioned: focusing resources in the RPA on making the 2005 payments as fast as is legally possible; removing disproportionate checks from the payment authorisations system to speed up the flow of payments once claims have been validated; prioritising work on the validation of claims to release the maximum value of payments as quickly as possible as opposed to the maximum number of claims, which is an action that will mainly benefit historical customers; centralising key mapping work at the most productive office, Reading; reviewing what further steps can be taken to simplify the process to allow decisions to be made later this week; strengthening the RPA's capacity in key areas; and changing the RPA's structure to streamline command and control.

The Minister with responsibility for sustainable farming and food—my noble Friend Lord Bach—and the RPA's acting chief executive have invited senior representatives of the industry to weekly meetings, the first of which took place on 22 March, so that close contact can be maintained. They will also urgently engage with the banks and other key stakeholders. The team at the RPA is central to the success of those steps. I am confident that with Mark Addison at the helm we have the right people in place for the job, and their work and commitment remain key to delivery. The staff of the RPA have worked with absolute dedication throughout, often in the face of considerable difficulties, and I know that the whole House hopes and expects that they will continue to do so.

Mr. Paice: I remind the House of my entry in the Register of Members' Interests, and I thank the Secretary of State for her answer. In a newspaper produced by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs that landed on the doorstep of every farmer in the country just six days ago, the headline stated, "Full payments on track for farmers". I hope that the Secretary of State is ashamed that that happened.

As the Secretary of State has rightly said, the first priority in this debacle is to get the money to the farmers who desperately need it. Tens of thousands of decent, hard-working family farmers were promised their payments, which in many cases cover up to one third of their income. In time they will need to stop relying on such payments to support their businesses, but this is the first year of painful transition. Will the Secretary of State tell us how many payments will now be made by the end of March? Exactly when will all the outstanding payments be completed? What is she doing about all the non-validated entitlements, and will she confirm that they will be paid on the same time scale? Will she consider making an interim payment for everyone who cannot receive the full amount by the end of March? That could be done manually, even if the computer cannot cope. The delays are costing the industry £10 million to £12 million a month. Will the Government repay the interest on any related loan until the RPA issues the payment? Will the Secretary of State seek a derogation from the EU to delay the 15 May deadline for next year's applications? The RPA should not be sending out next year's forms instead of last year's money.

We also need to know how the crisis arose. Given the continuing mapping problems and other issues, the crisis was obvious to us all, yet throughout those months the Government told us that we were scaremongering and that the targets would be met. In January Lord Bach told the Oxford farming conference that 96 per cent. of payments would be made by the end of March. In the same month, the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee report stated:

> "The Committee is dismayed at the complacency of Defra Minister, Lord Bach, who refused to admit that any mistakes had been made or that anything could have been done differently to avoid the problems."

Lord Bach called that report "shoddy" and said:

> "I am deeply disappointed with the timing of this report which could create unfounded alarm and uncertainty in the farming community."

On 2 February the Secretary of State told this House that the 96 per cent. target would not be met. Three days later, Lord Bach told me in a letter that he still expected "the bulk of payments" to be made, although he went on to tell Farmers Weekly that "the bulk" meant more than 50 per cent. Just a month ago the Secretary of State told the National Farmers Union conference:

> "Having demonstrated last week that its systems are working as planned, the RPA is now in the process of authorizing payments".

That is some plan!

If Ministers were misled by the chief executive of the RPA it is right that he should go, but that does not absolve Ministers from this catalogue of incompetence and ministerial denial. This House and the industry are entitled to an apology, because the chain of accountability reaches the top. It was the Secretary of State who decided, rightly, to introduce a complicated hybrid scheme, but then opened it up to 48,000 new applicants, with 360,000 new parcels of land that had not previously been receiving support. Then, to make it worse, she rammed it into place in the first year of the three-year window—and that is where the problem began. But even Germany and Denmark, which also have hybrid schemes, paid almost all their farmers months ago.

Sacking a civil servant is not the end of the matter. Ministers knew that there was a problem because they reduced the targets, but they appear to have done nothing until I challenged the Prime Minister two weeks ago. What questions were asked? How many Ministers actually went to the RPA to see what was happening? Did nobody have the gumption to ask why farmers were reporting so many problems? The Government's usual "blame somebody else" line will not wash. Lord Bach criticised others for saying what was abundantly clear to everybody, but he was wrong. A Minister who truly had his finger on the pulse of farming would have seen this coming and prevented it from happening. He has lost all credibility in the industry for which he is responsible, and he should go. This House and, more importantly, the farming industry deserve better.

Margaret Beckett: There are rather a large number of questions there, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I will do my best to answer as many of them as I can— subject to your wish to make progress.

First, yes, I am embarrassed and dismayed by the issue of the newsletter to which the hon. Gentleman referred. There is no doubt that when it was produced we were on track, payments were being produced on the date that we had been told—20 February—and validations were being issued to farmers, just as had been foreseen. It was anticipated, and continually reported to Ministers, that once that process had begun it would be speedily ramped up. Of course, that was the part that was not fulfilled.

I cannot give the hon. Gentleman answers on time lines and dates at the moment, but I assure him that I will keep Front Benchers and the House as informed as I can with reliable information. I am sure that the whole House will recognise the strong wish of the new acting chief executive not to be pinned down to proposals for the future until he has more information, because he does not wish to repeat what he views as previous over-promise and underperformance. The hon. Gentleman will know, as will the House, that the payment window ends at the end of June 2006, but I cannot give him a pattern of payment between then and now.

The hon. Gentleman asked about non-validated interim payments. We are looking at that whole issue. We are not ruling out the potential for interim payments, but we are reluctant to make interim payments if there is any possibility of their jeopardising the time scale for making full payments. I think that the whole House will understand that, and understand, too, our wish to keep the rest of the scheme on track.

The hon. Gentleman said that the situation was obvious to all. I genuinely think that he was quite unjust to my noble Friend Lord Bach, who has spent not just hours but days working on this over many, many months. [Interruption.] I say to the hon. Gentleman, and to the House, that when the scheme was initially being considered and the arrangements were being put in place, a substantial contingency of time was of course built in to allow for any hiccups and difficulties. Over time, that contingency was gradually whittled away. My noble Friend has maintained the closest possible interest, and I, like him, continue to reject any charge that there was complacency on the part of Ministers. Ministers are dependent, as is everyone in the House, on the information that they are given and the confidence that they can place in it. [Interruption.] I simply repeat to the hon. Gentleman what the proposal to us was. We published this more than a year ago; I cannot now recall exactly when, but it was a long time ago. The proposal to us was that the first payments would begin to flow in the week of 20 February, and they did. It was after that that the scheme began to break down.

There were repeated challenges by Ministers, and repeated demands for harder information about the number of payments that had been made. As a result of those challenges and demands the chief executive conveyed to me, on the evening of Tuesday 15 March, that he could no longer say that the bulk of payments would be made by the end of March—although he continued to insist that 96 per cent. would be made in the payment window, by the end of June. That is why we took the steps that I outlined. We will continue to keep hon. Members and the industry as fully informed as possible, and I anticipate a further report on the situation later this week.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): The Secretary of State talks about using up margins of contingency, but surely there is no way of describing the matter other than as a botched introduction of the single farm payment scheme in England. That is worrying for many tens of thousands of farmers who rely on the payments for their cash flow, and for maintaining their obligations.

I have no doubt that there were problems at the Rural Payments Agency of which Ministers were not aware. There can be no other explanation for the extraordinary contrast between the assurances of the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), at Question Time on 9 March and the sacking of the RPA chief executive only a week later. However, DEFRA Ministers must take their share of the blame.

First, Scotland and Wales have almost finished payments on the simpler historic basis, yet DEFRA Ministers decided to implement the more fancy scheme and they must surely bear responsibility. Do they accept that their decision to abandon the historic basis of payment has been a major cause of the difficulties in England in comparison with the relative success in Scotland and Wales?

Secondly, the new scheme could have been introduced with a delay, as happened in the Netherlands. Do Ministers accept that they made a mistake in trying to run before they could walk?

Thirdly, do Ministers accept that the scheme's implementation has been botched from the start, and that the evidence for that is not only in the delays that farmers are now suffering in the payments that they were promised but in the spiralling cost—from £18.1 million to £37. 4 million, as revealed by the Select Committee—of the IT system procured for the single farm payments?

The Secretary of State has given no assurances about the timing of the payments that are due. We must press her for assurances for farmers who expected the bulk of the payments to be made by the end of March about when they will be made. If she cannot give them, will Ministers authorise interim payments so that farm businesses can maintain their obligations to their suppliers and creditors? Will Ministers assure us that they have contacted the principal lending institutions to the farming community and accepted full responsibility for any delays in farmers' payments that may arise through DEFRA's broken promises?

Margaret Beckett: The hon. Gentleman drew on the experience of Scotland and Wales, and he is right to say that they have adopted a different system—although initially they made partial payments, and I am not certain whether Scotland is yet making full payments. Wales has begun to do that. However, those systems are not only different but involve a much smaller number of claimants. The hon. Gentleman described the scheme that we introduced in England as "more fancy"; a more accurate term would be "more sûstainable".

The hon. Gentleman spoke as if it would always be better to pursue the historic system. He is new to the portfolio and will not therefore have the subject at the front of his mind, but under the historic system, people continue, now and for the future, to be paid on the basis of what was received by someone farming the same land between 2000 and 2002. That appeared to be neither beneficial in driving farming forward to be receptive to the market, nor something with which taxpayers or farmers would be content for long. There are already rumblings in member states that have maintained the historic system about how unsatisfactory it is. This is not, therefore, a simple black-and-white question of why we did not do what it is claimed would be easier.

The hon. Gentleman made a further point, and I was not sure whether it was based on information from the Select Committee report. If it was, I regret that. There is a misunderstanding that the cost of the information technology system is somehow evidence of things going wrong. The RPA was already set to undergo a programme to provide it with new IT. That was the £18 million scheme that was initially intended to be put in place. However, that was agreed before the common agricultural policy reform proposals, which obviously resulted in the need not only for a new IT system but for one that would perform a different task. That is why there is a difference, and the two sums involved are not comparable. We are not talking about twice the money for the same scheme changes.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about interim payments. I can only repeat what I said earlier to the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), which is that we continue to keep that matter under review. I shall not be drawn into making forecasts, other than to draw attention to the scale of the payment window. The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire referred to the speech that I made to the National Farmers Union annual conference, at which I said that payments had begun to flow on 20 February—as they had—and that I had been advised that, very shortly, some £350 million would already have flowed.

When I saw the chief executive of the RPA on the evening of 14 March, however, he told me that only about £60 million had been paid by that date. That was the first intimation that DEFRA Ministers had had that those were the figures involved. However, that sum was disbursed over about three and a half weeks. In the period since that date—just over a week of payment days—some £75 million has already been disbursed. That is obviously not enough, but it is certainly a big improvement on the previous figures.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I seek the help of the House. There are two ministerial statements to follow, in addition to the resumed Budget debate, and I would very much appreciate single brief questions and short answers.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): The Secretary of State has made it clear that she regards the situation as unsatisfactory. Will she assure the House that the right approach is being taken in moving from production subsidies to payments for public goods? Is not the important thing now to ensure that farmers and landowners have a good idea of the new timetable for when payments will be made before June?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend is entirely right to say that the key issue now is to give farmers as much certainty as we can. Nothing would be worse than to give them information that was less than reliable. I would also say to my hon. Friend, as I should have said to the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) a moment ago, that we are in touch with the banks. They understand that the payment window runs until June, and they have hitherto given us no indication of any difficulties that they had not anticipated.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): In the light of the fact that the Select Committee, which I have the honour of chairing, has twice warned of the potential failings of the RPA and its computer system, may I seek an assurance from the Secretary of State that all reasonable requests from my Committee for full disclosure of information about this debacle—this failure of communication between officials and Ministers—will be complied with in any subsequent inquiry that we might hold to try to unearth what has caused this complete mess?

Margaret Beckett: I can certainly give the right hon. Gentleman that assurance. He knows that I have sought to keep him, as well as those on the Opposition Front Benches, fully informed of developments as they have unfolded. Hon. Members may not realise that we had already planned a long-term review of the RPA, or that it was scheduled to begin as soon as the bulk of the payments had been disbursed. I have now announced that review formally, to make it public, and we shall proceed with it as fast as we can.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): As has been said, Scottish farmers have already received their single farm payments. May I assure my right hon. Friend, however, that they derive no satisfaction whatever from the situation in England? They understand, as she does, how vital those payments are to the incomes of working farmers in England. Indeed, she has pointed out that failure to receive them could result in people being pushed above their bank borrowing limit. She has undertaken to keep the House informed of developments. Will she make a statement on the matter after the Easter recess?

Margaret Beckett: I do not rule that out; it will, of course, partly be a matter for the House.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that under the old integrated administration and control scheme introduced by the previous Government, each form was dealt with by a single official in a single payment centre? Is she aware that under the new system each form is divided into tasks, so it is not merely shuffled between officials but between centres—at the mercy of a failing computer system, which has managed to wipe off all the hill farm allowance payments for my constituency? Can we not revert to a system that gives the farmer accountability and the official efficiency, and liberates us from the tyranny of the computer?

Margaret Beckett: I always listen with great care to the right hon. Gentleman's observations, and frequently find great wisdom in them. I assure him that one of the reasons Ministers decided to commission a long-term review of the RPA—although we had not announced it—was our considerable concern that although there is no doubt that the organisation is customer-focused in that the staff care about their customers and are working hard and trying to do their best, its systems are not remotely customer-focused. That is one of the issues that I hope that we will address, perhaps even in the short term.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): Obviously, the situation is most regrettable, and I am grateful to the Secretary of State for the measures that she has announced this afternoon. Will she consider paying interest or financing costs for farmers beyond the end of March, if those arise because of late payments?

Margaret Beckett: I cannot give that undertaking—although, as I said, we are keeping the whole position under review, not least because the official payment window runs until the end of June. Although I understand the concerns and anxieties of farmers, my hon. Friend will know that extensive discussions have been held with people's banks, more are due, and there has been more than a year's notice that there would be some delay and payment would be made later in the window.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): Does the right hon. Lady agree that it might take a long time to recover from this managerial collapse and put the Rural Payments Agency on a sound footing? The most immediate problem is the hardship that will undoubtedly be suffered by many blameless farmers, who have no idea what they will do about the loss of this vital income over the next month or two? Does she accept that it is not good enough to say that interim payments will be kept under review? Her first priority must be to try to put in place some manual system that will get out interim payments as quickly as possible to people who will otherwise probably be forced to abandon their farms.

Margaret Beckett: I assure the House, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that that is being carefully considered. He will understand that there is no wish to do anything that will disrupt the likelihood of the majority of payments going out. I have instructed the acting chief executive that the large number of people who have an almost minuscule entitlement—on the whole, new claimants—should not be his priority. In so far as possible, he should perhaps worry slightly less about some of those for whom the level of the payment might not be a matter of immediate desperate concern. The whole focus of the RPA's attention should be on those who need the money, about whom the whole House is concerned.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): What steps are being taken to reduce the welfare dependency that seems to be exhibited by many farmers? Does she agree that we have not seen the Tories so excited for quite a long time, and that only when they are trying to get their snouts and those of their friends in the trough do we see them so motivated?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend has long been a critic of the system of farm support in this country. I know of his concern for ordinary people facing difficulties, however, which he will extend to people in any circumstances. In the longer term, the purpose and effect of the overall reforms of the common agricultural policy introduced in 2003 will be to link farmers more closely to the market and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) said a few moments ago, to put public money in payment for public good—things that the market will not reward.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): I think that the right hon. Lady will know that the entitlement statements being sent out do not show the methods of calculation. That means that the individual farmer cannot check whether the final figure is right or wrong. Will the right hon. Lady please examine the position?

Margaret Beckett: Yes.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Will the Secretary of State agree to meet a delegation of farmers from Shropshire? Is she aware of the suffering that has been caused over many months by the Government's dithering, delay and incompetence?

Margaret Beckett: As I have said, regular meetings are scheduled with stakeholder representatives of the farming community. I hope the hon. Gentleman will understand, however, that the priority of Ministers and officials is to concentrate all our efforts on making payments. Of course we will keep the House and all Members as well informed as we can, but getting the money out is the priority.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): When the south Staffordshire farmers who were reassured by Lord Bach's Oxford speech talk to me of Crichel Down, and ask what has happened to the doctrine of ministerial responsibility, what do I tell them?

Margaret Beckett: The hon. Gentleman can tell them that a bold move was made in the 1980s: the setting up of such things as agencies, which are at one remove from Government and carry out executive tasks. It is an agency that is carrying out this work.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): But the Secretary of State designed the scheme herself; she did not have to introduce it. She announced it more than a year ago. Now she is saying that it was not until 14 March that she was aware of how badly wrong it was going—although many of us had been writing to her for weeks telling her that exactly this was going to happen. If she thinks that her Minister has been doing a good job she had better get a grip on the issue personally, or the payments will not even be made by the end of June.

May I ask the Secretary of State specifically whether the Government will compensate farmers who have had to incur loans and pay interest because of the late payments? May I remind her how fast the Government are to extract interest from their debtors when they are late in paying their taxes?

Margaret Beckett: The hon. Gentleman is right to observe that Members were saying that the scheme was going badly wrong. Members were saying that payments would not begin on 20 February. They were saying that entitlement notices would not be sent out. [Interruption.] I am not sure whether those who are groaning attend agriculture questions very often.

Let me simply say to the hon. Gentleman that undoubtedly there were real concerns and anxieties, and that those were reflected at ministerial level. That is why the Minister in particular, and my officials, spent so much time working with the RPA. The fact is, however, that payments did begin when they were intended to, and notices did begin to go out when they were intended to. What did not happen was the dramatic ramping up of the speed of payments that was expected to follow. As late as 10 March, the RPA was still insisting to Ministers that more than 51 per cent. of payments would be made by the end of March, and 96 per cent. would be made by the end of June.

The issue of compensation has been raised before. I have already told the House that the payments window closes in June 2005—[HON. MEMBERS: "2006."] I am sorry, I meant 2006. Farmers are probably even more aware of that than Members. They know perfectly well that payments are made throughout the window; that is why the question of interest does not arise.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): The Secretary of State has attempted to slough off any ministerial responsibility, but if she looks at the report of the debate in Committee on the statutory instrument that set up the Rural Payments Agency she will find that I—along with many others, including some of her hon. Friends—questioned whether the agency's computer system would be able to handle what was being proposed then, let alone now. Given that that was five years ago, and most of her Ministers are still in place, where does the buck stop?

Margaret Beckett: If that was five years ago, it was long before the negotiations on CAP reform, for a start. Once the decisions had been made about the form and nature of the scheme, Ministers and stakeholder representatives of the industry spent time with the RPA seeking information and assurances on whether it could indeed handle the scheme within the time frame. Those assurances were given, and given categorically—to the extent that stakeholder representatives and Ministers came back immensely reassured and full of confidence that the RPA could handle the issues.

That was the position at the start. It has to some extent been asserted that the Government were warned from the beginning that the RPA could not handle the scheme. No, we were not: the RPA gave every assurance that it could indeed handle it. As for whether Ministers take responsibility, I am taking responsibility, which is why I removed the chief executive.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I refer to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. The Secretary of State will wish to apologise for the full answer given by the Minister with responsibility for farms, the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), at Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions on 9 March. He has apologised to me in person, but for the benefit of the House it should be placed on the record that his answer was incorrect and misleading in every particular. He said on 9 March that most of the payments had been made and that Scottish and Welsh farmers had been paid in full, when in fact no payments had been made to English farmers. Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to show her awareness of, and willingness to take action on, two related issues? The market in England has been distorted, in that Scottish and Welsh farmers have the cash in hand to pay more for farm animals than English farmers can possibly pay. Secondly, tenant farmers are suffering particular hardship because they have no assets against which to borrow.

Margaret Beckett: It was graceful of the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), to say what he did to the hon. Lady—outside this Chamber, no doubt—but knowing her as I do, I am sure that she is not implying any wrongdoing on his part.

Miss McIntosh indicated assent.

Margaret Beckett: I am pleased to see that the hon. Lady is not. Obviously Ministers must give correct information to the House, but they can do so only if the information that they have is correct. When my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary spoke to the House, at that stage he had no cause to think that what he was saying was in any way incorrect. There is perhaps a slight misunderstanding about the position in Scotland and Wales. Obviously I do not have responsibility for payments there, but I think that the hon. Lady will find that not all payments have been made in full, although they are doubtless proceeding. I entirely take her point about tenant farmers, and I am mindful that they are likely to be the most vulnerable people. I can assure her that if there were a way to single them out, I would look for it; however, the best thing to do is to try to get everybody's payments out as fast as possible.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I have repeatedly asked the Secretary of State questions about this issue at Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions, and I am not a bit surprised at the muddle that she finds herself in. Will she undertake to come to the House in a month's time to give us an update—and so that she does not have to eat further helpings of humble pie, will she guarantee that all valid claims will have been paid by then, or, if that it is not possible, that a substantial amount will have been paid on account? Finally, I should have declared my entry in the Register of Members' Interests before asking this question.

Margaret Beckett: The hon. Gentleman is right: Members did repeatedly ask such questions, and as has always been the practice in any Department of which I have been head, when Members ask awkward questions, Ministers do the same. The answers that Ministers gave to Members were those that Ministers got, no matter how hard they probed. The hon. Gentleman asked whether I would give the House an update in a month's time. I do not necessarily rule that out, but what I can say is that I will keep the House informed by whatever means exist as fully and speedily as I can. If I can give the House a quantified update in a month's time I will, and if I can do so earlier, I will.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Will the Secretary of State put back the deadline for the 2006 applications, or give a firm assurance that no farmer will be penalised for repeating an innocent mistake in his 2005 application, which, of course, he has had no opportunity to correct, not having had the result of that application?

Margaret Beckett: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting and valid point and I undertake to look into it.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Farmers in my Kettering constituency are as concerned about this disgraceful situation as any other farmers in the country. By what date are farmers guaranteed to receive these payments?

Margaret Beckett: As I have repeatedly explained to the House, I am not in the business of giving Members guarantees that I cannot substantiate, but I do guarantee to keep the House informed. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the payment window expires at the end of June, and it will be the earnest endeavour of everyone in my Department concerned with this issue to make the maximum number of payments as early as we can; we do not want to approach the payment window with payments still to make. But at the moment I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the firmer, clearer or more reliable answer that I know he wants.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I am grateful for what the right hon. Lady said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), but does she realise that not just farmers but the agricultural supply trade and many hauliers are also dependent on receipt of the payments? Does not she think it important that she gives a date by which, unless a substantial proportion of payments have been made, there will be interim payments? Many of those businesses simply cannot survive until 30 June.

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the issue that a wider community depends on farming. He is absolutely right, and we are extremely mindful of the pressures on those business. At this moment I cannot give him a date of the kind that he seeks, but I can certainly tell him that that is part of the consideration. When I told several hon. Members that we did not rule out making interim payments, that was one of the reasons why—so I can assure him that we shall keep the matter very much under review.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What would the Secretary of State say to Mr. Lonsdale, an elderly farmer in my constituency, who rang me this morning and said, "Without payments, I cannot pay my rent"?

Margaret Beckett: As I said a little while ago, we have been in touch with banks and with those who deal with the financial interests of the farming community, and so far they have told us that they do not anticipate a greater measure of difficulties than normally arise at about this time of year. They are mindful of the situation and will keep it in mind, but we are holding further talks with them to ensure that that continues to be the case.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Two of my farmer constituents, Messrs Caley and Leake, were refused any single farm payments because they were days late with their application. When they wrote to Lord Bach he replied that as they had failed to get their forms in on time they should properly receive nothing, and that was the price they should pay. What price will Ministers pay for failing to get payments to farmers throughout the country?

Margaret Beckett: I have already made it plain that Ministers are extremely concerned and dismayed about the position. The system is in the hands of the RPA and as the hon. Gentleman knows, the chief executive of the agency has been removed from his post.

European Council

4.12 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the European Council that took place in Brussels last Thursday and Friday. As the House is aware, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister normally makes the post-Council statement to the House. I have been asked to convey his apologies because he is on an official visit to Australia and New Zealand.

The Hampton Court informal summit in October during our presidency set the framework for the spring Council in Brussels. The economic challenges for many, though not all, member states of the Union are severe. Despite significant progress since the Lisbon agenda was launched, there are still about 20 million out of work in the EU. In some states, in contrast to the United Kingdom, unemployment is about 10 per cent. and almost one in five young people are without a job.

The British Government know that there is only one way to get Europe back to work and to deliver social justice in a global economy. We base that not on theory but on solid evidence. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of Exchequer pointed out in his Budget speech last Wednesday, in 1996 we had the lowest income per head of any of the G7 countries; today, we are second only to the United States. We have grown more quickly, created more jobs and provided more social benefits than most other member states. We have done so by liberalising markets, increasing our competitiveness and investing in the future, including in our public services. The European response to globalisation must emphatically not be a return to old-fashioned protectionism, whether by that or any other name.

Specific elements of the Hampton Court agenda were energy, research and development, and universities. The case for a more liberal energy market is overwhelming. Gas and electricity prices in the UK in the period between 1996 and 2004 fell much faster than they had done in EU states as a whole, which have kept their energy markets closed. Consumers in those countries will thus gain from a functioning internal market, but so too will consumers in this country. We currently do not have the access to gas that we would have in a more sensitised market. One of the first achievements of the Lisbon Agenda back in 2003 was the decision to liberalise energy markets by 2007. Last week, the European Council reaffirmed that timetable.

Completion of the internal market is one of four elements in a new approach to European energy policy. At the summit, we also agreed the programme relating to the other three areas, which are to intensify diversification of supply, to promote environmental sustainability and, by the next European Council, to develop a strategy for dealing with countries outside the EU. The Council asked the Commission to present a strategic energy review on a regular basis, starting in 2007.

On research and development, rising economies, such as China and India, are investing heavily in science and technology. The way for Europe to compete is to be ahead of them and to lead the knowledge economy, rather than protecting old and uncompetitive industries, so the summit agreed the establishment of a European Research Council. That body will be run by scientists and its purpose will be to promote excellence in European research. We expect universities and research communities in Britain to benefit.

Linked to research and development is the third area: increased investment in universities, where currently only two of the top 20 universities in the world are European—both, I should say, are in the United Kingdom. The European Union has to produce enough graduates of the right calibre and improve links between business and universities if we are to open up and prosper in new global markets.

In addition to the Hampton Court agenda, the British presidency had taken forward valuable work on better regulation and on the services directive. There was further progress on both those areas at the Council. The summit tasked the Commission to report by the end of this year on measurable EU targets for removing administrative burdens on business, particularly small and medium-sized enterprises, and to press ahead with the reforms undertaken during our presidency, including more simplification of existing EU legislation, further withdrawal of unnecessary or outdated legislation, and more effective use of impact assessments.

The summit also agreed a way ahead on the services directive. That directive will be of great assistance to British service companies and to opening Europe up properly to a single market in services. The current proposals are not everything that we wanted, but a year ago, some European leaders were declaring the directive dead and buried. It is not and it will represent a significant advance in the process of making Europe globally competitive.

It is customary that the spring Council concentrates largely on the economic agenda of the European Union. However, all member states shared a deep concern about the recent elections in Belarus and a declaration relating to those elections is attached to the conclusions. We agreed a statement that condemned the actions of the Belarusian authorities in arresting peaceful demonstrators early in the morning of Friday 24 March. We restated our view, based on the assessment by the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, that the elections were fundamentally flawed. The European Union is now deciding on the restrictive measures that it will take with respect to the Belarusian authorities. The statement makes it clear that President Lukashenko should not escape responsibility. The European Union applauds those who stood up for democracy against the odds and is determined to support civil society and the Belarusian people.

The situation in Belarus stands in stark contrast to the situation in Ukraine. The OSCE said that yesterday's elections there had "enabled voters to make informed choices between distinct alternatives and to freely and fairly express their will"

and that they therefore

"further consolidated the breakthrough in the conduct of a democratic election process".

That is a testament to the remarkable progress made in Ukraine since the orange revolution of 2004.

[Mr. Jack Straw]

Finally, as I am on my feet on European business, the House will wish to be aware that earlier today I issued a written ministerial statement in respect of the successful conclusion of the Gibraltar constitutional reform negotiations on 17 March. The new constitution, which will be put before the people of Gibraltar in a referendum, strengthens the links between Gibraltar and the United Kingdom and thoroughly modernises the relationship between us, which I hope will be as welcome to the people of Gibraltar as it will to the people of the United Kingdom.

Last week's summit was a further step towards a more outward looking European Union that delivers concrete benefits to its citizens. There is still a long way to go. The British Government are in no doubt that Britain's best interests lie in a European Union that is open to the world, competitive and confident. We will continue to pursue that agenda vigorously.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): I warmly welcome the European Council's declaration on Belarus—in particular, the call to release those already detained—and we welcome the announcement that measures will be taken against those responsible in the regime. Can the Foreign Secretary tell us more about the measures being considered against Europe's last dictatorship? Does he agree that the free flow of information is a sure way to undermine tyranny? What more can be done to ensure that the people of Belarus are better able to learn what the outside world is really like and hear an alternative view to that of their Government?

I welcome the conclusion of talks with the Government of Gibraltar and the commitment to hold a referendum. Will the Foreign Secretary confirm whether all this means that his previous commitments to share sovereignty with Spain are now entirely null and void?

Can the Foreign Secretary tell us about some other important matters that were meant to be discussed in the margins of the Council? Will he confirm whether the Government are advocating a new round of talks between Iran, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China? What would be the conditions for such talks? What approach to aid and funding will be taken by the EU if the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority does not the meet the criteria set by the Quartet?

On economic reform and the Lisbon agenda, does the Foreign Secretary agree that it is now clear that the EU is regrettably not on course to become the world's most dynamic and competitive economy by 2010 and, since the Prime Minister started to admit mistakes over the weekend, that it was a mistake for him to describe the Lisbon agenda six years ago in the House as a "sea change in European economic thinking", with

"concrete measures with clear deadlines"?—[Official Report, 27 March 2000; Vol. 347, c. 21]—

just as the Prime Minister now thinks that it was a mistake for him to take the concrete measure of setting a date for his own resignation, albeit without the clear deadline long favoured by the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Will the Foreign Secretary acknowledge that the EU is now locked in a pattern of relative economic decline? Can he tell us why the Italian-led joint memorandum against protectionism did not go forward, whether the Government intended to sign such a memorandum and why the British Government did not press ahead with their own version? Does he not think that Britain can give a still stronger lead on such an important issue?

Is it not alarming that the figures hidden away in annexe 1 of the Council conclusions show that we are investing a smaller share of our national wealth in research and development than the Scandinavian countries, France, Germany or Belgium and that, far from closing the gap, Britain's R and D spending is falling?

Does the Foreign Secretary agree with the Chancellor that "it is unacceptable that fifty per cent or more of regulations come from the European Union"?

Can the Foreign Secretary tell us what specific EU regulations the Chancellor has pressed to be cut or blocked and what representations the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister made in that direction at the summit?

As for targets to reduce the burdens on business, which were also talked about at the summit, is not a rise in the burden of regulation on business of £50 billion since 1997 a poor way to convince our partners that the Government believe in making business more competitive?

On the services directive, will the Foreign Secretary now state a clearer view by agreeing with me that the removal of the country of origin principle was a grave mistake and that we need a strong liberalising directive with the freedom to provide cross-border services in the Commission's modified proposal? Is not a free market in services one of the things that the EU was supposed to be about?

We welcome the emphasis in the conclusions on a real, liberalised single market in energy, with better co-operation between national energy regulators. Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that the proposal for a European energy regulator has been rejected? Does he agree that the Commission's priority must be to ensure that the associated single market rules are enforced? On powers to negotiate energy supply agreements with third parties, although increased co-operation may bring benefits in some areas, does he agree that member states must retain the right to make their own arrangements? I welcome the insistence in the conclusions that energy mix is for member states to decide, but can he tell us how the energy policy for Europe will affect the Government's domestic energy review?

The EU constitution was also discussed at the summit. Did Ministers make it plain to our partners that it is the Government's view, as the Foreign Secretary has often tactfully expressed it to the House, that the constitution is dead, so that others are not tempted to try to revive a deeply flawed idea that has already been rejected by two of the founding member states of the EU? Will the Foreign Secretary now admit another of the Government's mistakes? Their lack of leadership at the time let others put forward a constitution that the Government did not really want. Will he accept that, if that mistake is not to be repeated, the Government must set out their view and their vision soon, and plainly, or others will again make the running?

Mr. Straw: Let me try to rattle through that long list of questions. On Belarus, the statement of conclusions spells out that the EU will consider restrictive measures against those responsible. I cannot anticipate precisely what will be decided, but there could be a range of measures, including travel bans and asset freezes. As the right hon. Gentleman said, it is a disgrace that Belarus remains a dictatorship—the last in Europe—and it cannot continue in that way.

On Gibraltar, both the joint statement between the Chief Minister of Gibraltar, Peter Caruana, QC, and myself—a copy of which will be in the Library—and my written ministerial statement make it clear that sovereignty remains British as long as the people of Gibraltar wish it to do so. Should they change their minds about that, which I do not anticipate for a second, the provisions of article 10 of the treaty of Utrecht would apply.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me about a new round of talks on Iran. There are in hand arrangements that we are trying to make for a meeting of the five permanent members of the UN Security Council and Germany later this week. Of course, I will inform the House once those arrangements are firm.

On aid and funding to Hamas, I have nothing further to add to what we discussed in First Order questions. The Quartet statement earlier in the year set out three principles that we expect Hamas to follow. At the same time—this is an issue for the whole House—we are wrestling with the need to ensure that the people of the occupied territories are not punished, by being deprived of humanitarian aid, for a vote that they freely and fairly exercised in elections that were regarded as free and fair. That is something that we have to work through.

On economic reform, the right hon. Gentleman asked me about the comment made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the time of Lisbon. As a matter of fact, I do think that Lisbon has involved a sea change in EU thinking. It is true that the sea is very large and rather thicker than the sea that we are used to and the tanker of the EU is so big that it takes some time to turn round. However, let us take the example of better regulation. Until two or three years ago, the European Commission was simply a machine for producing more and more regulation. The right hon. Gentleman asked me about conversations that I have had with commissioners and others. I have had endless conversations. When I first got this job, I tried to have conversations about ending gold-plating in the Foreign Office and doing the same in Brussels and it was as though I had said something indecent, but these days things are changing. Under Günter Verheugen, the commissioner with responsibility for better regulation, there has been a big change. Some 68 pending items of legislation have been withdrawn. There is a rolling programme to repeal, codify, recast or modify 228 further pieces of legislation and more than 1,400 related legal acts over the next three years, and much else besides.

On science, it is important to recognise that up until about 1997—I choose that date with care—the Government's record on investment in science was lamentable, but my recollection is that scientific investment has almost doubled since then. We will see the effect of that flowing through into research and development more widely.

On services, the right hon. Gentleman asked me about the country of origin. It has been replaced by the country of destination principle. Personally, having considered the matter pretty carefully, I am not sure that the country of origin principle was worth dying in a ditch for and I think there are advantages to the country of destination principle. There are no proposals for an EU energy regulator and no changes to the treaty base.

I was very tactful when I discussed our old friend the EU constitution with EU colleagues at a dinner on Thursday night. I repeated the comment that I made in the House a few weeks ago that it was, at best, in limbo. I drew attention to the fact that, at the time at which I said that, I understood that limbo could not take place until one was dead, but was not aware that His Holiness the Pope had abolished limbo in the meanwhile.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): May I take the Foreign Secretary back to what he said about the strategic energy review? Apparently it is said in Moscow that it is not so much remarkable that the EU enlarged eastwards, but that Gazprom enlarged westwards. Does he thus recognise that we must secure safety of supply and, in terms of the internal market, ensure that national cartels do not become European cartels and that there is a genuinely free market?

Mr. Straw: I agree with my hon. Friend on both those points. Ensuring a broader diversity of supply was one of the summit's key conclusions on energy. She is right about national cartels. It is curious that several member states have national energy companies that are highly protective of their own market, while being atavistic when it comes to the acquisition of other energy operators in other markets. That is unacceptable and, ultimately, not in the interests of the European Union.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): The House is united in its condemnation of the elections in Belarus, which were a travesty of democracy, in marked contrast to the experiences next door in Ukraine. The Foreign Secretary says that the matters being considered include travel bans, but exactly how watertight will they be, given the way in which people such as Mr. Mugabe have ignored or flouted similar efforts?

We welcome the summit's focus on research and development, universities, the gender pay gap and energy, but will the Foreign Secretary confirm that any future decisions on new nuclear power stations will remain a matter for the United Kingdom Government and not be passed off as somehow the responsibility of the European Union? Given the progress so far, how seriously does he take next year's deadline on energy market liberalisation, bearing in mind the rash of protectionism on the continent and the failures to date?

On Friday, the Foreign Secretary described the summit as workmanlike. Given the limited steps that were taken on energy, the watered-down services directive and the limited advances on the Lisbon agenda, was not the summit actually about missed opportunities, rather than any serious work in progress?

Mr. Straw: How watertight travel bans are partly depends on their exact terms, but I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's reservations about the travel bans on senior people in Zimbabwe. It is inevitable that the bans cannot prevent leaders of countries from travelling to the United Nations and other international meetings because that is required by international treaties to which all countries of the EU have signed up. We know from Zimbabwe that the bans have been both inconvenient to the leaders concerned and humiliating.

Future decisions on nuclear power stations will remain a matter for the United Kingdom Government. As I said, there has been no change—in the absence of a treaty change there could not be—to the basis for decisions in that respect. We wanted a decision about 2007 energy liberalisation in the conclusions to test, in a sense, whether European Heads of State and Government around the table were serious about that liberalisation, which is for consumers, not industrial users. It is my judgment that they are, although time will tell. Although sometimes we take three steps forward and two back, overall, including in countries with a protectionist past and present, the move is towards greater liberalisation because the benefits of that are perfectly plain to everyone.

On my remarks about the summit being workmanlike, I have always believed in litotes, rather than hyperbole, and 35 pages of conclusions sounds to me like being workmanlike.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): May I welcome the Foreign Secretary's words—and indeed, the shadow Foreign Secretary's words—on Belarus, although I would not be quite so sanguine about the election in Ukraine, where there has been a remarkable victory for old-style conservatives and oligarchs, which is always bad news anywhere in the world?

On Belarus and, to an extent, Ukraine, is not the problem that Europe does not know how to spread and promote democracy? Will the Foreign Secretary ask one of his bright young officials in the Foreign Office to produce a paper on creating a European foundation for democracy, roughly based on the way in which the Westminster Foundation for Democracy works? There are €140 million unspent in Brussels for democracy and human rights promotion. Both the Council and the Commission are not very good at that kind of work. I invite him to see whether Europe cannot be bolder and more original in promoting democracy in its near abroad.

Mr. Straw: I would pick my hon. Friend up on one thing. It does not automatically follow that just because old-style conservatives and oligarchs are elected, they have been elected undemocratically. Sometimes it is possible that the people want old-style conservatives and oligarchs. Indeed, that is the whole pitch of the Conservative party. I will follow up the request for a European foundation for democracy.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Six years ago, after the Lisbon summit, the Prime Minister specifically promised that Europe would move "away from heavy-handed intervention and regulation, towards a new approach based on enterprise, innovation and competition."—[Official Report, 27 March 2000; Vol. 347, c. 21.].

However, those of us on the European Scrutiny Committee have noticed no reduction in the volume of legislation or in the appetite of the EU for more business regulations. Why should we believe the statement this time around? In particular, why does paragraph 61, announcing the better regulation initiative this time, specifically exempt the 97,000 pages of the existing rules and regulations, known as the acquis communautaire?

Mr. Straw: I know that the right hon. Gentleman is a member of the European Scrutiny Committee, but my perception, from a position of some scepticism about whether the EU is moving, is that there is a real process of change. I have given some figures indicating that. The Commission is starting work on the most heavily regulated sectors—cars, waste and constructions. Other sectors—foodstuffs, cosmetics, pharmaceuticals and services—will follow.

One example is the directive on registration, evaluation and authorisation of chemicals. Had it gone through six or seven years ago, it would have meant very heavy regulation, which would have seriously damaged the Europe-wide chemical industry. We managed to get it agreed under our presidency in a form that was acceptable to most people representing the chemical industry. My notes tell me that it led to the cost of the proposal being reduced by up to €660 million. There are other proposals, too, that are aimed at improving EU competitiveness. Things are changing.

On the right hon. Gentleman's last point, I have had no discussion with Commissioner Verheugen to suggest that he intends to avoid the existing acquis, and nor do we.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I pay tribute to the Foreign Secretary, the Prime Minister and the Minister for Europe for their work in pushing forward the economic reform agenda. In response to Opposition Members, let me say that Lisbon was different because it set out benchmarks for the first time. The Foreign Secretary will know that, according to the Centre for European Reform, Britain has done extremely well against those benchmarks. Is he confident, however, that our European partners have learned the lessons of the Kok report, because many of them are lagging well behind on them? May I also welcome the establishment of the European Research Council and offer Leicester or Blackburn as a possible home?

Mr. Straw: I cannot speak for Blackburn as Secretary of State and my hon. Friend cannot speak for Leicester as its Member of Parliament. I think that that means he speaks for Blackburn as a Member of the House, and I am very grateful to him. I will do my best to establish the ERC there.

On the Kok report, some member states have been more resistant than others to its very clear messages. I was going to say in response to the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), who spoke about economic growth and relative economic decline, that, underneath the EU averages, there is a wide variation in economic performance. That is an indicator of the policies that will work, which are basically those where there is greater liberalisation as well as good underlying investment, and those that will not work, where there is a high degree of protectionism and a lack of liberalisation in the markets.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): Will the Foreign Secretary show greater urgency in pressing for diversification of gas supplies? Is he aware that some 50 per cent. of Europe's gas supplies come from only three countries—Russia, Algeria and Norway—and that that is going to increase to 80 per cent. over the next 20 years? Will he take into account the fact that, as 52 per cent. of Gazprom is owned by the Russian Government, any decision by Gazprom to withhold gas from Ukraine, Moldova or any other country must be deemed to have been taken on political, not business, grounds? Will he make it clear to his Russian colleagues that as long as that continues, Russia will not be seen as a reliable partner in energy matters?

Mr. Straw: The right hon. and learned Gentleman raises a very important issue. Our own gas supply is not nearly as vulnerable as that of Europe as a whole to just a handful of suppliers and Russian gas supplies are likely to account for only 5 per cent. of our supplies, compared with much higher dependency elsewhere in the European Union. However, I accept his overall point. Both the reliance on a few countries and the problems that arose between Russia and Ukraine and the rest of Europe are matters of concern. Energy security will dominate the G8 summit in St. Petersburg in the summer, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is very keen to secure real guarantees about energy security for the whole of Europe.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend say more about the discussions regarding the Palestinian Legislative Council? Does he agree that Hamas, by entering into the electoral process and joining the Palestinian Legislative Council, has implicitly accepted the Oslo peace route and we need to ensure that we cautiously encourage that development?

Mr. Straw: There was not, as I recall, discussion on the Palestinian situation in the summit itself. We discussed it earlier in the week, in the General Affairs and External Relations Council on Monday. We will get a better idea of Hamas's real intentions after the Arab League summit in Khartoum. If Hamas indicates that it supports, even tacitly, the proposals of the then Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia in the Beirut declaration of three years ago, which was in favour of accepting the reality of Israel, there may be a basis for moving forward, but Hamas, as well as the European Union and the international community, has to make moves.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): Will the Foreign Secretary give the House a modest assurance on the future of the constitution? I believe that Ministers agreed that they would discuss that again in mid-April, whether in its present form or whatever aftermath they are proposing. Does he agree that the only basis for a referendum on the EU constitution was that it represented a fundamental change and that if any such change, or part of such change, were proposed at a future mini-intergovernmental conference, a referendum would be appropriate?

Mr. Straw: I am not going to anticipate a rather abstract possibility. I certainly agree that a referendum in respect of this constitution was appropriate. In the event, it has not proved necessary.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will recall that the earlier proposed draft directive on services was widely opposed by trade unionists across the EU and particularly strongly opposed by major trade unions in Britain. It is very pleasing that the country of origin principle has been removed, but is the new proposal any more acceptable to trade unionists? Will he consult the TUC and British trade unionists to get their view?

Mr. Straw: Yes, indeed, we shall consult British trade unionists and the European Trade Union Confederation. Speaking from memory, I think that the current proposals, which were for a country of destination rule rather than a country of origin rule, are significantly more acceptable to the trade unions. If that turns out to be inaccurate—I do not think that it is—I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): The Foreign Secretary, like the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said that the British economy compared favourably with economies in the eurozone. Does he accept that that is despite, not because of, his policies and those of other Governments in the past? In fact, economic and monetary union and the exchange rate mechanism must be repudiated, so will he take the opportunity expressly to repudiate those policies to ensure that we can continue to govern ourselves and, indeed, repeal European legislation, as I proposed, with the support of 45 Members of Parliament, when I suggested that we repeal future European legislation and parts of the acquis communautaire to reduce the burden on business?

Mr. Straw: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman but, although he may not have spotted it, we did not join the euro, and I do not anticipate that we are likely to do so in the foreseeable future. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] In this case, that is a long time. In any event, if there were a recommendation that we join, it would have to pass, first, the famous five tests announced on 27 October 1997 by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and then a referendum. The hon. Gentleman can therefore remain calm.

On the more important point, the hon. Gentleman said that my claims about our economic progress had nothing to do with the Government. I am afraid that I disagree completely—it is to do with the Government. If, instead of advancing from the bottom of the G7 league table to second from top, we had gone the other way, he would say that that was all the Government's fault, so we are entitled to claim the credit when we go the right way.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): What steps does the right hon. Gentleman intend to take to encourage the Commission to use its extensive powers to challenge the rising tide of protectionism among companies and states in the European Union?

Mr. Straw: We are doing a great deal. In fairness to President Barroso, he does not need much encouragement, as the Commission has made it clear that the rising tide of protectionism is against EU policy and law, and not remotely in the interests of the European Union. We must try to ensure that there is greater political consensus to challenge the rising tide of protectionism, which masquerades as economic patriotism.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): On Belarus, may I strongly commend the Foreign Secretary's robust objections to the behaviour of the authorities in Minsk at the weekend that resulted in innocent protesters being attacked and imprisoned? I urge him to be more hawkish and vigilant in the weeks ahead, because on many occasions we have heard that the European Union objects to a breach of human rights and promises action, but action is not taken. He will therefore understand why some of us are a little cynical.

Mr. Straw: I do understand that. On Belarus, the European Union's view is strong and united, and I think that we will see action.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): The Foreign Secretary spoke proudly about the British sovereignty of Gibraltar, which is very welcome, but I am more concerned about the sovereignty of Britain. If he is winning the war against the over-centralising tendencies of the European Union, which powers are likely to be repatriated from the EU to this country? Many people here are sick to the back teeth of the majority of laws and rules in Britain being decided in Brussels, not Westminster.

Mr. Straw: To the extent that laws and orders are decided in Brussels, not Westminster, that is because treaties were signed, not under the present Government, but under the Government whom the hon. Gentleman himself supported until 1997. If he is proposing to the House and the country that we change those treaties, let him put that proposal to his party and the people, but I think that he will get short shrift from his Front-Bench team.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Since 1997, the British Government have been at the heart of Europe. Does the Foreign Secretary agree that, during those nine years, the other members of the EU have been thumbing their noses at the British Government, whether on budget contributions, common agricultural policy reform, energy reform or market liberalisation?

Mr. Straw: I am sorry to disagree with the hon. Gentleman, but the answer is no. The record also disproves his point. In that period, we have been at the heart of Europe. What is more, to take one profound change, Europe has expanded. There were 15 member states when we joined the EU. There are now 25 and soon there will be 27. That is a direct result of the policy led by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and by the Government as a whole. It would not have happened without my right hon. Friend's commitment and that alone is helping to change the whole climate and the economic policy of the EU.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Does the Foreign Secretary share my concern that the EU and its member states, particularly on the mainland of Europe, are not doing nearly enough to counter the vile trade of international human trafficking?

Mr. Straw: Yes, I do. That is all the more reason why EU Governments, with help from the Commission, must integrate and co-operate better in their efforts to deal with that vile trade, as the hon. Gentleman describes it.

Council Tax

4.51 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I would like to make a statement on council tax for 2006–07 and the action that the Government propose to take with regard to local authorities that have set excessive budgets. Figures released today show that, excluding the council tax element of the funding package for the 2012 Olympic games, the average council tax increase in England for 2006–07 is 4.2 per cent. With the council tax element of the Olympics, it is 4.5 per cent.

We have a mature working relationship with the Local Government Association. We have worked with the LGA to look at the pressures that councils face in the next two years, and how central and local government can manage those pressures. Under the settlement for 2006–07, which the House approved on 6 February, total support for local government, including specific grants, will rise by 4.5 per cent. compared with 2005–06. That includes an extra £305 million above previous plans. The provisional settlement for 2007–08 will provide an increase of a further 5 per cent., with £508 million above that previously planned. By introducing multi-year settlements, we are enabling authorities to plan ahead more effectively in budgeting for service delivery. We have now provided a framework for authorities to deliver effective local services over the next two years that takes account of the pressures that those authorities face.

By 2007–08, Government grant for local services will have increased by more than the rate of inflation for 10 years in succession. That represents an increase of 39 per cent. in real terms since 1997. It can be compared very favourably with a real-term reduction of 7 per cent. in the four years up to 1997. I also remind the House of the council tax support that the Government provide to those on low incomes. Indeed, 14 per cent. of total council tax is paid through council tax benefit. Nobody who is unable to pay is made to pay, and we are working to ensure that all who are eligible do claim the benefit.

Given our significant extra investment of grant, and the continuing scope for efficiency savings, we made it very clear again this year that we expected authorities to budget prudently. It was only with the greatest reluctance, following the 12.9 per cent. rise in council tax in 2003–04, that we first made use of our reserve capping powers. However, as we said in our 2005 election manifesto, we will use capping to protect council tax payers from excessive increases. There can be no doubt that the recent, more modest increases in council tax could not have occurred without the Government making judicious use of those powers.

When we announced the provisional settlement in December, we said that we expected the average increase in council tax in England to be less than 5 per cent. for each of the two years 2006–07 and 2007–08. I set that out in a letter to all authorities. Ministers later wrote to those authorities reported to be considering setting increases of more than 5 per cent. I also wrote jointly with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety to all police authorities reaffirming the Government's expectations.

I am pleased to report that the overwhelming majority of authorities have responded positively to our messages. Most authorities fully recognise the need to minimise the demands that they place on council tax payers. Regrettably, however, a very small number of them have set excessive budget and council tax increases, and it is for that reason that I am making a statement to the House today about the action that we propose to take.

I should like to remind hon. Members of the provisions of the capping legislation set out in the Local Government Finance Act 1992, as amended by the Local Government Act 1999. In order to determine whether each authority's budgeted expenditure as defined in the legislation is excessive, we must compare the authority's budget requirement for 2006–07 with that of the previous year. The legislation also allows us to determine other principles, such as the level of increases in council tax.

This year, the increase in budget requirement for authorities providing education, police and fire services is measured using the alternative notional amounts given in the "The Limitation of Council Tax and Precepts (Alternative Notional Amounts) Report (England) 2006/07", which the House approved on 6 February. Alternative notional amounts are notional figures used for capping purposes to help give a like-for-like comparison of budget requirements between years.

Our view is that authorities' 2006–07 budgets are excessive if they show, first, an increase of more than 6 per cent. in budget requirement compared with 2005–06, and, secondly, if council tax has increased by more than 5 per cent. in the same period. As was the case in 2005–06, a single set of principles has been applied to all authorities.

Despite the principles being more stringent than in 2005–06, when authorities' budgets were judged excessive if they showed an increase of more than 6 per cent. in budget requirement compared with 2004–05 and if council tax had increased by more than 5.5 per cent, we are proposing to take action against only two unitary authorities this year, compared with 2004–05, when we took action against 14 authorities, and 2005–06, when we took action against nine authorities. The two authorities in question are Medway borough council and York city council, which have both set excessive budgets according to the principles that I have described. We are writing to those authorities today, informing them of our decision to designate them with a view to capping them in-year, and notifying them of the maximum budget that we propose to set for them.

The authorities have a statutory right to challenge the proposed caps, and they have 21 days in which to do so. If they want to challenge, we will carefully consider the information that we have required them to send us, along with any other representations they make, before we take final decisions. We will then either make an order, to be approved by this House, designating the authorities at the level of the proposed maximum budget or another level, or we will withdraw the designation and nominate them instead. Nomination would allow us either to set them notional budgets for 2006–07 for future capping comparisons or to cap them in advance for 2007–08.

[Mr. Phil Woolas]

Two shire districts, Aylesbury Vale district council and Wellingborough borough council have also breached the limits. However, as they have done so by very small amounts—only 12p and 9p respectively in terms of band D council tax—we are not proposing to take action against them. We have always made clear our reluctance to take capping action, because these are powers of last resort and we would prefer not to have to use them, but the public have a right to be protected from excessive council tax increases.

Under our wider localism agenda, we are giving local authorities more freedom over how they deliver services. However, that must be set within a framework of prudent financial management and value for money. The vast majority of authorities—99 per cent.—have responded well to our clear message for council tax in 2006–07, and no one would have been happier than me if the figure had been 100 per cent. However, we remain committed to taking action against those increases that we believe to be excessive.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): I thank the Minister for sending me an advance copy of his statement. That is much appreciated and entirely in line with the courtesy that we have come to expect from him. I also thank him for delivering it almost a month earlier than expected. I hope that that sets a precedent and that, in future, we can see statements in plenty of time for the local elections.

The Minister talked about the amount of extra resources that he claims to have put into local authorities. Can he put a figure on the extra burdens that have been placed on local authorities? That would be interesting to know.

The figures released represent an 84 per cent. increase in council tax in the period since Labour came to office. From 1997 to 2006, the average council tax on band D properties has soared to £1,268—the equivalent of £106 a month. It is a measure of how great is the council tax burden that the current increase is £4 short of being the fourth largest increase that this Government have made in the course of their massive increases in council tax. The current increase is £5 more than last year's increase. The Minister can talk in terms of percentages, but £54 is a lot for a hard-working family. As the Chancellor might say, in his own inimitable way, "We have had increases of £59, £50, £49, £54, £75, £126, £65, £47 and £54, making a total increase of £579 since Labour came to power"—although he would probably have rattled through it much more quickly. That represents a considerable burden on hard-working families.

But one section of the community faces increases of more than £54 on this year's bill—pensioners, who face an increase of £254. Where does the Minister seriously expect pensioners just above the benefit level to find an extra £254? Can he explain why the £200 pensioners' payment has mysteriously disappeared this year? Last year, when council tax had increased by £525 since 1997, the Government felt that pensioners needed extra protection. This year, it has increased by £579 since 1997, so why do they now feel that pensioners no longer require that protection? The House can only draw the conclusion that that money was a cynical election bribe.

I have heard the Minister express concern that council tax might be a tad regressive, but are not the current figures taking his case to the extreme? When a billionaire donor to the Labour party faces an increase of £54—perhaps a bit more in other bands—and a pensioner just above the benefit level faces an increase of £253-plus, is there no better indication of the true state of the Labour party? Aneurin Bevan and Keir Hardie must be turning in their graves. This is a complete sell-out of pensioners.

Not only did I get the statement in good time, but I have also had the benefit of the Minister's press release, courtesy of "Gallery News". In it, he makes the most extraordinary statement, which I note he did not repeat on the Floor of the House. For the benefit of colleagues, it says:

> "Labour councils are once again leading the way. Labour councils cost on average £190 less than Tory controlled councils and £96 less than Lib Dem councils."

What is the basis for those figures? Surely they are not the discredited figures that do not take account of the relative property values of traditional Labour and Conservative authorities. Surely they are not the discredited figures that rely on Labour authorities having a lower valuation than Conservative authorities. Surely they are not the figures that no one else uses because they fail to convey a fair picture. That marvellous set of accounts and such creative accountancy show that the Minister for Local Government is wasted in his job. He should be a fundraiser for the Labour party.

If we use the comparison on band D that the rest of the country and the House of Commons Library use, we realise that Conservative councils charge £81 a year less than Labour-controlled councils and £88 a year less than Liberal Democrat councils, despite the fact that Labour has fiddled the grant to give more money to its councils. As the independent Audit Commission put it,

> "grant redistribution . . . led to some councils putting up council tax more than others. We found a clear association between the size of grant increase a council received and their increase in council tax."

Yet Conservative councils still manage to charge lower council tax. The figures that the Minister produced are the clearest manifestation that Labour is in retreat and being pushed into its heartland.

The Minister made some announcements about capping. After last year's fiasco, when re-billing cost more than the money saved, he again targets minnows. Both authorities have increases in absolute terms that are below the average increase. The Minister appears to be blinded by percentages and to have forgotten that people pay in pound notes.

In Medway, a Conservative-controlled council, this year's increase is £50, which is a 5.5 per cent. increase. That is £4 less than the average council tax increase. In York, a Liberal Democrat-controlled council, this year's increase is £49 or 5.5 per cent. That is £5 less than the average. Yet the Minister does not seem to be obsessed by percentages when it comes to his friend—and the Standard Board's friend—Mr. Ken Livingstone. The Greater London authority's increase, before the addition of the Olympic precept, is 5.5 per cent.—exactly the same figure as Medway and York.

Medway and York are capped because they have introduced increases that are below the average. Let us contrast that with three other councils. Oldham's increase for band D is £59, that of Hartlepool is £57 and that of North Tyneside is £55. What makes those increases acceptable to the Minister? Why is the highest band D council tax in the country levied in Sedgefield, at £1,490? It has a Labour district council, a Labour county council and, at least for now, a Labour Member of Parliament. Cannot the Minister speak to that spendthrift Member and try to ensure that people in Sedgefield get a fairer deal?

Every year, the council tax increases. Every year, despite fiddled figures and grant, and wishful figures provided by the Minister, Labour's tax burden increases and it digs itself further into a hole over council tax. In some parts of the country, Labour will face the consequences in May, but in most parts, the poor council tax payer must face those consequences.

Mr. Woolas: First, I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind initial remarks. Let me deal with his points in the order that he raised them. On extra resources, we have a mature working relationship with the Local Government Association that allows us to make a serious analysis of the pressures that councils say that they face. I have made it clear that the new burdens principle will be implemented, but on the basis of net rather than gross new burdens, and on a shared understanding and analysis of those pressures.

We believe that the exercise leading up to the two-year settlement satisfied the Local Government Association's major recommendations, either by establishing self-funding regimes in the case of fees—particularly in regard to licensing—or by providing the extra resources that we were able to announce in the settlement. I notice that the hon. Gentleman did not welcome that extra money but, shucks, I guess I will just have to live with that.

The hon. Gentleman said that council tax had gone up by 84 per cent. I said in my statement that the 12.9 per cent. increase some years ago had been unacceptable. It is also true that significantly more resources had been given to local councils in that period. I also mentioned the 39 per cent. real-terms increase in Government support for local authorities.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the £200 assistance for pensioners, but he failed to mention two important points. One is that about 14 per cent. of council tax is now paid through council tax benefit, and that people on full pension credit pay no council tax at all. All right hon. and hon. Members would like to see 100 per cent. take-up of council tax benefit, and I would ask Conservative Members to join us in encouraging that take-up, as many Conservative-run local authorities already do. Secondly, the hon. Gentleman ignored the other help that pensioners receive.

The hon. Gentleman's fifth question was about billionaires. I feel that it is only right to ask him what is the Conservatives' actual policy on a property tax. I must remind the House that this property tax—the council tax—was introduced by the Conservatives, and we all remember the circumstances in which that happened—[Interruption.] Well, I have asked before in the House about their policy on a property tax. Do they have a commitment to a property tax or do they not? They introduced the eight bands in 1991. It would be perfectly possible for them to put a proposal to Sir Michael Lyons' inquiry for an increase in the number of bands, so as to include a billionaires' band. Perhaps they should propose that, but I suspect that they will not.

I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's accusation that the grant system is politically biased. That is not borne out by the facts, the figures of the House of Commons Library, or the representations that have been made to the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick) and other ministerial colleagues. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Turner) is not in his place, but if he were, he would be reading out statements from the special interest group of municipal authorities—SIGOMA—many of which are floor authorities. It is a bit rich of the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar to make such an accusation, which I deny outright. Indeed, having studied the formulae and the method of grant distribution in detail for nearly 12 months, I defy anyone to come up with a formula that would achieve what he is accusing us of doing. I reject his analysis.

The hon. Gentleman referred to what he described as last year's "fiasco". In my view, however, there is a relationship between the decisions that we took last year on excessive budgets and council tax levels, and our success this year—and in future, no doubt—in keeping council tax levels down. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is not quite sure whether he would prefer there to be higher council tax increases so that he could blame central Government, or lower council tax increases, for which he would no doubt give the credit to Conservative-run councils—but not Labour ones—in the forthcoming local government election campaign. He cannot have his cake and eat it, although he always tries to do so.

The hon. Gentleman's final point related to the comparison with the Greater London authority. I repeat for the benefit of the House that the principles involved this year and last year relate not just to council tax levels but to budget requirement levels—in layperson's terms, expenditure levels—of the authorities concerned. It is important that that point is understood.

Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I thank the Minister for his statement and the measured way in which he presented it, although I cannot thank him for the news that it contained.

I am sure that the Minister recognises that yet again council tax nationally is rising by twice the rate of inflation. He will know that the Liberal Democrats believe that the tax should be scrapped, not simply fudged and tinkered with. What does he have to say to pensioners across the country who, if they were paying the average council tax last year with the £200 rebate and are now paying the new average council tax without the £200 rebate, face a 25 per cent. increase in the coming year? It is fine to cap local authorities, but does he not understand that without that rebate, pensioners, the poorest council tax payers, will be hit hardest by his and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's combined decisions?

Should not local tax be based on ability to pay? Do not the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister understand that the current system is fundamentally flawed and puts the poorest at a disadvantage when it comes to paying for local services? Will the Minister now speed up the Lyons review and make sure that that report comes to the House promptly, not delay its implementation until after the next general election, which would condemn the poor council tax payers of this country to another three years of this iniquitous system? He should bring it to the House with his reform ideas clearly in mind.

When did resistance to capping and all its works, clearly and firmly expressed by the Deputy Prime Minister when in opposition, translate into the current enthusiasm for centralising and suppressing the work of local authorities? Does not the Minister see that capping is a sign of Government failure and not of Government success? Underlying all that is the byzantine grant allocation mechanism that he and his colleagues have devised. It might or might not be politically partisan, but it is certainly partisan as between central Government and local democracy, leading to higher council tax, intolerable burdens on pensioners, cuts in services and, today, the ultimate madness, capping by this Government.

Mr. Woolas: I should start by congratulating the right hon. Gentleman—

Andrew Stunell indicated dissent.

Mr. Woolas: Not yet. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his new position and look forward to debating this important policy subject with him.

At least the hon. Gentleman's points, in contrast to those made by the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles), are based on a policy. At least he has a policy. It is an unworkable policy, and the wrong policy, but it is a policy. He says that the ability to pay should be the criterion for a local tax. We will wait to see whether such a local income tax proposal emerges from the Liberal Democrats' internal debate. He has made it clear, however, that he believes that local tax should be based on ability to pay. Of course, that ignores all those people in hard-working families, with two or more income earners, who would pay for the difference. I suspect that the "scrap the tax" campaign—indeed, I know it for a fact—does not have details of the costs of the extra local income tax.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the timing of the Lyons review. For the sake of clarity, the Government intend to publish a White Paper on local government before the summer recess.

The timing of the announcements by Sir Michael Lyons is a matter for him, but we expect his interim report to be published in the first half of the year, and the final report to be published by the end of the year. That is the time towards which we are working.

The hon. Gentleman criticised what he described as a centralising Government. I suspect that he is not fully aware of the impact of the new local area agreements, which are bringing about an important change in the relationship between central and local government, and the working relationship that we have on a practical day-to-day level with the Local Government Association as we consider how best to implement the reduction in the performance regime and the extra financial freedoms and flexibilities that have been introduced. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman welcomes those, along with his Liberal Democrat colleagues on the LGA.

The hon. Gentleman asked about pensioners. As I said earlier, some 14 per cent. of the total council tax bill is now paid through council tax benefit, and there is additional help for pensioners as well.

The hon. Gentleman accused me, or accused the Government, of having a byzantine formula. It is not always entirely fair to cite the words of the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), who preceded the hon. Gentleman in his job, but she criticised me for making the formula simpler when I announced the abolition of the formula spending share.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): She is here.

Mr. Woolas: If the hon. Lady is here, she can speak for herself. Anyway, I was criticised by Opposition Members for making the formula simpler. I remind the House that the formula that I have announced today is a significant simplification of its predecessor, and that it builds on simplifications introduced previously by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I seek the help and co-operation of the House. I am mindful of the amount of time that Front Benchers have taken, and I see that a good many Back Benchers wish to catch my eye. I am also aware that we have important business to follow. May I therefore ask for single questions and brief replies? I may then be able to allow more Members to make contributions.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): What estimate has the Minister made of the effect of the local government pension scheme on council tax levels in 2006–07 and in subsequent years? Against the background of tomorrow's industrial action in local councils, is he still hopeful that a settlement can be found that will modernise the pension scheme?

Mr. Woolas: Yes, I am hopeful, and the Government, as regulator of the scheme, stand ready to facilitate discussions between the employers represented by the LGA and the representatives of members of the scheme, the trade unions. Our policy is that the taxpayer should not be asked to pick up any additional burdens. This is a funded scheme. We have legal obligations to ensure that it is viable and, of course, legal, and we seek to do that in a way that will secure the future of the final-salary pension scheme to the benefit of all employees and of local authorities.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): The crisis in social services is bound to be made worse by the formula because of increasing demands from old people's and, indeed, young persons' services, but that must be seen in the context of the crisis in the NHS as well, owing to increasingly close links between it and social services—links that the Government and most sensible people want. What steps do the Government intend to take to ensure that those two crises do not simply play against each other and cause a steady deterioration in services, both for those who look to the NHS and for those who look to their local councils?

Mr. Woolas: Of course the Government recognise—and have recognised in their joint work with the LGA—the pressures faced by social services, particularly services for adults and the elderly. It would be nonsensical to deny the existence of those pressures. But those pressures, the result of largely demographic changes, also apply to central Government, which is why our policy is to ensure that budgets are balanced. Behind the right hon. Gentleman's question is a paradox. The solution that he seems to offer is further increases in council tax, but if I were to allow them, his Front-Bench colleague, the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar, would no doubt be the first to criticise me. Joint work is required to deal with those very real pressures. Against the background of an increase in the revenue support grant, I must point out that the amount of money going to social services has not been cut, but increased.

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): May I raise with the Minister the impact of the capping criteria on authorities that have historically had a low council tax, or, in the case of the Lancashire police authority, a low precept? Over a number of years, it has wished to raise its precept to its expenditure and to be in the middle rather than at the bottom of the list of authorities in respect of spending, but it has been unable to do so. That will have a considerable impact over the next few years as a result of the merger of Lancashire police authority and Cumbria police authority, which has a much higher precept. Will the Minister comment on the likely impact of the capping criteria in the light of that merger?

Mr. Woolas: I understand my hon. Friend's point. Lancashire police authority has, in common with others, been reasonable in setting balanced budgets. My hon. Friend's question about the impact of the merger of his police force is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, who will shortly take decisions on the future composition of the police. My hon. Friend's point about the historic level of the council tax having a huge impact on the way in which the precepts have been levied has also been raised by several hon. Members. One of the major reasons I took the decision to abolish the formula spending share was to allow greater transparency so that the House and the Lyons review can make decisions on the basis of facts rather than notional figures.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Would the Minister agree that the precept that he has just announced has been damaged by the Chancellor's announcement about pensioner rebate last Wednesday? Will he answer this simple question: when the Deputy Prime Minister and the Chancellor agreed the block grant figure last December, did the Chancellor have the courtesy to tell the Deputy Prime Minister that the pensioner rebate was to be abolished?

Mr. Woolas: The Government take their decisions on these matters in the round. One also has to take into account the position of the Department for Work and Pensions, which funds the council tax benefit system. What cannot be dismissed is the fact that 2.5 million pensioners, representing 14 per cent. of the total council tax budget, pay their bills through council tax benefit. The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar cannot get away from that. As I said in my statement, no one who cannot afford to pay the council tax has to pay it.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): The Minister will be aware that it has been Government policy since 1997 to drive up the council tax at a rate faster than inflation. When will council tax be high enough and when will the Government stop driving it up beyond the rate of inflation?

Mr. Woolas: I do not accept the premise of the hon. Gentleman's question. Indeed, it provides a classic example of what I call the Liberal Democrat single transferable argument. When the council tax level is beyond what the hon. Gentleman thinks it should be and Liberal Democrats have influence in local councils, he blames the central Government; but when Liberal Democrats do not have influence in them, he blames the local councils. He cannot have his cake and eat it. The Government have increased revenue support grant to local authorities by nearly 40 per cent. In the four years from 1993 to 1997, it was cut in real terms by 7 per cent.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): What note has the Minister taken of Trowbridge town council's 48 per cent. increase in precept, which means that the precept far exceeds the district council element of the council tax bill? Does he not agree that that is simply unacceptable?

Mr. Woolas: I have not received any praise—I suppose that I should not really have expected any—for my decision on Aylesbury Vale and Wellingborough. The hon. Gentleman may think that I am going to study the figures for parish and town councils, but I am not; the legislation does not cover that level. That is a matter for the hon. Gentleman's town council, which will doubtless listen to his representations.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): Hammersmith and Fulham council has already increased its council tax by more than 60 per cent. since 1997. Everyone knows that today's debt is tomorrow's council tax. Is the Minister aware that council debt in Hammersmith and Fulham, which stood at £297 million at the end of 2003, is scheduled to rise to £500 million by the end of 2009? That is an increase of more than £200 million over six years. Does the Minister agree that this gross irresponsibility on the part of Labour-run Hammersmith and Fulham council will cost council tax payers dearly in future?

Mr. Woolas: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that issue, but I advise him not to get into bandying about councils' debt figures. He will doubtless be on the doorsteps in the weeks to come, and I have to say what a superb and well-led council Hammersmith and Fulham is.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): What message does the Minister have for pensioners in my Shropshire constituency, given that they have just had a 4.9 per cent. council tax increase from Labour-led Telford and

[Mark Pritchard]

Wrekin council, and that they no longer have a £200 rebate? Do the Government not realise that such increases are driving many pensioners into poverty?

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising that point again. As I said in my statement, the average council tax increases of 12.9 per cent. that took place some years ago were regrettable. However, he must accept that council tax levels are set by local authorities. Against the background of increasing resources from central Government, and of our successful relationship with the Local Government Association on net new burdens, councils have to take responsibility themselves for the level of council tax.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Will the Minister explain what has changed since before the general election, when pensioners were bribed with a £200 council tax rebate?

Mr. Woolas: In my statement and in previous answers, I pointed out that one has to look at support for pensioners and others on fixed incomes in the round. The hon. Gentleman ignores the fact that the pension credit, help with winter fuel payments and the council tax benefit system have helped to ensure that on the whole pensioners are better off. Through the council tax benefit system, this Government ensure that the poorest pensioners are given help and that those on full pension credit pay no council tax at all.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The 2006–07 settlement includes an element for population growth, but it is based on census data and is then projected forward. That disadvantages local people in high-growth areas such as Kettering, which is affected by population growth in Milton Keynes and the south midlands. Will the Minister undertake to look at this anomaly for next year?

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for making that point, which he has made before in this Chamber and outside it. We did of course make changes to the use of population statistics to ensure that, alongside previous trends, future projections are taken into account to a greater extent in the new settlement—in part because of the point that he makes.

The other point I want to put on record is that the Government are entirely dependent on the Office for National Statistics for population statistics, but no doubt the hon. Gentleman, like my hon. Friends, will want to monitor the situation as the two-year settlement period pans out.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I apologise to the Minister and to the House for being absent when the Minister made his statement. I was chairing a Standing Committee and obviously could not leave the Chair.

I am greatly concerned that City of York council has one of the largest council tax rises this year and that it has ended up on the capping list. The cost of re-issuing bills will be extremely high and will fall on council tax payers, so would the Minister consider removing the cap if the council gave hard guarantees to cut its spending and to make a proportionate reduction in council tax next year? Would he be willing to meet me to discuss that possibility?

Mr. Woolas: Of course I would be willing to meet my hon. Friend. Last year, we gave, and fulfilled, commitments to meet all councils and Members concerned about their local authorities' budgets and about council tax capping decisions. It may be helpful to my hon. Friend if I emphasise the point that local authorities have the right to appeal against the decision, and I have an obligation to give serious consideration to their representations, as well as any made by Members.

Point of Order

5.36 pm

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can you give me some advice and help about Defence questions, held earlier? My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) tabled a question about what recent discussions the Secretary of State for Defence had held with his US counterparts about Iran's nuclear programme. For reasons beyond my understanding, the question was transferred to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which is strange enough in itself but even more perplexing given that the Secretary of State for Defence had answered almost exactly the same question at a previous oral Defence Question Time. He was asked:

"What assessment he has made of Iran's nuclear weapons capability; and if he will make a statement."—[Official Report, 27 February 2006; Vol. 443, c. 7.]

It seems strange that the House was precluded from debating that important issue during Defence questions today due to that transfer by the Table Office, especially as the Secretary of State was asked what discussions he personally had held with his US counterparts at the Pentagon. Can you get us an explanation, Madam Deputy Speaker—if it is other than the fact that the Foreign Secretary has now been de-graded to the point of being the diary secretary for the Secretary of State for Defence?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I am aware of the transfer of that question, together with others, perhaps in identical terms, that appeared on the Order Paper last Thursday. The decision to transfer a question is a matter for Ministers, not for the Chair. However, decisions on transfers should be consistent; they should be made as soon as possible after tabling and quickly notified to the Member concerned. Where there is a genuine element of doubt and an oral question is involved, it is reasonable that the Member should have the benefit of that doubt. I have nothing further to add.

Identification and Support of Carers (Primary Health Care)

5.38 pm

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require that general practitioners or Primary Health Care teams identify certain patients who are carers or who have a carer; to require identified carers to be referred to sources of advocacy, help and support; to require that carers' needs are taken into account in relation to the allocation of appointments, procedures for issuing prescriptions, and waiting room arrangements; to make provision for routinely checking the physical and emotional health of carers; and for connected purposes.

Although there are 5.2 million carers, I want to focus on those who have the heaviest commitment, where caring can have an impact on the health of the carer. One million carers care for more than 50 hours a week, which is more than a full-time job. Research shows that such caring commitments often result in poor health for the carer. A Carers UK report, based on the 2001 census, showed that one in five of those caring for more than 50 hours a week were not in good health, and that figure worsened to one in four carers in some areas of the country. Areas with the worst figures for poor health among carers also tend to have high levels of disability and illness, often linked to the heritage of industrial disease. Those include my local authority areas of Salford and Wigan and many former industrial and mining areas nationwide.

The report noted that older carers are often likely to be suffering poor health, and caring will have a further impact on the carer's health. An American study of carers of patients with stroke disease or dementia found that caring did have an impact on their health. Stress from caring affected the carer's immune system in ways that accelerated the risk of age-related diseases. The stress of caring does not just affect older carers—the Carers UK report found that carers in younger age groups, from 16 years upwards, were significantly more likely to suffer ill-health than non-carers of the same age.

The fact that carers' health suffers through caring is well known to the charities who work to support carers. The Princess Royal Trust for Carers has some 60 centres in its network, which work with primary health care teams to help them to identify and support carers. The trust also has more than 30 projects working directly with primary care. The first projects were established in the early 1990s and that work led to the trust publishing a good practice guide for support workers and GP practices in 1999.

In the same year, the Government's national strategy for carers noted that the NHS was for many carers. The Government highlighted in the strategy the fact that GPs and primary health care teams had a key role that they should be performing with carers within their practice population.

"the single most important point of contact"

The strategy included a five-point checklist for primary care to use with carers. The checklist covered GPs identifying carers, making checks on their physical and emotional health, telling carers that they can ask for a social services assessment of their own needs, routinely asking patients about sharing information about their health with their carer and being aware of local carers' support groups and telling carers about those groups.

[Barbara Keeley]

The national strategy gave that checklist to GPs as good practice for their work with carers. The emphasis on identifying carers within primary care was important because carers play such a vital role in health and social care. They are increasingly being recognised by NHS staff as partners in care. While a proportion of GPs and primary health care teams do work to identify the carers within their practice population, research on the extent of the work being done shows that this is patchy. Some GPs say that they are too busy to undertake the work. My Bill would require that primary care trusts and local health boards ensure that effective procedures exist within primary care to identify carers.

Current good practice suggests that it is worth GPs identifying certain carers so that they can be referred to other agencies for support and for assessment of their needs. In a GP practice population of 2,000, there are likely to be some 200 carers, of whom about 40 will be caring for 50 hours or more per week. The task of identifying the 40 carers with the heaviest commitments does seem manageable.

The Princess Royal Trust for Carers centre in Salford has a primary care liaison worker called Julia Ellis. Julia told me how two primary care practices in my constituency were successfully identifying and referring carers to her centre. Practice nurses from the Limes medical practice in Walkden carry out that work when making home visits to a patient who seems to have a carer. The nurses run through a series of questions with the patient and carer about who does certain tasks for the patient. The nurses then fill in a referral card for the practice to ensure that the primary health care team know about the carer, and they also ensure that the carer is referred to sources of advice and support.

The Dearden avenue medical practice in my constituency has a different approach. Its staff carried out a search on the practice's computer system. For all those patients over 70 who were not in residential care homes, a letter was sent to the next of kin asking if they were the patient's carer. Out of 149 letters sent, 90 were returned from carers. That excellent response rate enabled follow-up information to be sent, telling the carer about support and information available, including having an assessment of their own needs at Salford carers centre.

I pay tribute to the Princess Royal Trust for Carers for its work in primary care for many years in centres such as the one at Salford, and to Carers UK for their campaigns to highlight carers' issues and needs. Although I was pleased to find that GPs and primary health care teams in my constituency are tackling the work of identifying and referring carers, there is much more to be done.

Since I became an MP, a number of constituents who are carers have asked for help with urgent problems with health services. I have found that those constituents tend not to think of themselves as carers; nor have they been identified as such by their GPs. They do not know that there is a carers centre in Salford and a carers support group in Wigan and Leigh, both of which can offer them advice and help. It seems that we have a long way to go before it is routine for carers to be identified and offered the help and support that they need.

Carers are not yet routinely identified and referred for advice and support; nor are they helped to plan alternative care if their own health fails. Last year, Carers UK reported on the experiences of more than 1,000 carers who had to find alternative ways to manage their caring responsibilities during an emergency or health crisis. Some of those carers had life-threatening conditions themselves, but they still had a battle to find information and support.

Carers with substantial caring commitments need to have regular checks on their own physical and emotional health. My Bill would require that carers are offered consultations and health checks and that that is done routinely for carers whose health is at risk because of caring. Carers also need to have regular reviews of how they are coping with their caring commitment in case their own health deteriorates or they stop being able to cope. They also need information on what alternative care is available, and my Bill would enable carers to be referred for such advice.

Research has shown that carers can find it difficult to make an appointment with a GP for their own health needs, as they are more restricted in the times that they can attend and must often make alternative care arrangements. Similarly, it is difficult for them to get out of the house to pick up prescriptions. When attending an appointment with the person who is cared for, the waiting room arrangements can be a barrier for carers, particularly if the cared-for person is an autistic child, chronically or terminally ill, or suffering from dementia. Having to wait to see a GP is annoying for many people, but carers in the situations that I have described find that a wait may be impossible. My Bill would require that primary care services take carers' needs into account in making medical appointments, issuing prescriptions and making suitable arrangements in the waiting room.

The recent White Paper, "Our health, our care, our say", offered a new deal for carers and an updated and extended national strategy. The new strategy will promote "the health and well-being of carers, including the particular needs of younger carers."

I hope that Ministers will study my Bill, as a key step in offering that new deal to carers. I thank Carers UK and Luke Clements for helping me to draft the Bill and the House for giving me the opportunity to present it today.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Barbara Keeley, Dr. Hywel Francis, Meg Hillier, Alison Seabeck, Ed Balls, Tony Baldry, Mrs. Nadine Dorries, Mr. Paul Burstow, Lady Hermon, Helen Goodman, Lynda Waltho and Ms Diana R. Johnson.

Identification and Support of Carers (Primary Health Care)

Barbara Keeley accordingly presented a Bill to require that general practitioners or Primary Health Care teams identify certain patients who are carers or who have a carer; to require identified carers to be referred to sources of advocacy, help and support; to require that carers' needs are taken into account in relation to the allocation of appointments, procedures for issuing prescriptions, and waiting room arrangements; to make provision for routinely checking the physical and emotional health of carers; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 14 July, and to be printed [Bill 154].

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

5.49 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): Today, we debate the central theme of this Labour Government's 10th Budget: education—our No. 1 priority. Our vision is for a nation that is both economically successful and socially just, where everyone has the opportunity to fulfil their potential, no matter who they are or where they come from. Education is central to that vision. It has the potential to transform our lives, individually and collectively. It is a powerful force for both economic success and social mobility, which is why Labour values it so highly and debates it so passionately.

In last week's Budget, we had to make a choice—we could invest in our children, schools and young people or we could put tax cuts before the needs of our young people. We chose to invest in the future and in our economy, leaving the Opposition to make the case for the old Tory politics of cutting public services to pay for tax cuts. The prosperity of our nation requires a Government who are not only strong enough to take the difficult decisions for today, but who have the vision and determination to take the essential decisions needed for tomorrow. Since taking office in 1997, this Government have never failed to meet that challenge, making the case for reform in our education system where it was needed, but also backing that reform with investment.

The priority of this Labour Government is to pursue our vision, in which an outstanding education will be the right not only of a few pupils who have opted out of the state system or whose parents benefited from a good start in life, but of every single child—100 per cent. of our children will be valued highly; 100 per cent. will be fully equipped for the challenges of the future. Because we want every child to have the chance to succeed, schools were at the heart of last week's Budget. The Government have already raised standards in primary and secondary education. There has been unprecedented capital investment since 1997. There are 30,000 more teachers and more than 130,000 more support staff in our schools, and there have been year-on-year improvements in results at ages 11 and 14 and at GSCE. Where only 45 per cent. of pupils got five good GCSEs in 1997, 56 per cent. achieved that level in 2005.

The Education and Inspections Bill currently before the House takes that transformation of schools further still. Schools will be able to take the decisions that they need to raise standards and will be free to form relationships with external partners, such as business foundations, further education colleges and universities, charities and other schools, where that will help them to drive up standards. For the first time ever in our nation's history, we are introducing a new right for all young people to a high quality vocational route from the age of 14.

The Budget heralds more major investment for our schools. We have already doubled the money that we spend on each pupil each year from £2,500 in 1997 to £5,000 today, but we know that, in the independent sector, average spending on each pupil is still £8,000 each year. As the Chancellor has made clear, our long-term aim will be to close the gap between spending on private school pupils and those in state schools. We want all pupils to benefit from the investment and support now available to only some of them. In particular, as a first step the Budget includes capital investment in school buildings and information and communications technology, which will increase by £1.6 billion to a total of more than £8 billion by 2010–11. That will close the historical gap in capital investment between state schools and independent schools so that all our young people can benefit from world-class educational facilities.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The right hon. Lady said a moment ago that the Government have committed themselves—true enough, they have—to a right to a vocational education, including, therefore, a commitment to access the specialised diplomas that will form its essence. Why are the Government not prepared similarly to commit to the funding of personalised learning?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely good point. I want to come on to personalisation, because it is at the heart of our education reforms. The Budget commits the Government to spending £220 million next year, followed by £365 million the following year direct to every head teacher to help to provide tailored teaching and learning in and out of the classroom.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is moving on to an interesting topic, but I want to return to the previous topic of capital investment. Has she analysed the distortion caused by forcing local authorities to have academies? On at least two occasions, I have heard my colleagues say that their local authority has been told that if it will not have an academy, its capital investment programme will be put back by two or three years.

Ruth Kelly: I would be glad if my hon. Friend provided the evidence for that. I would be happy to look at it. The Government's commitment is to raising standards. When a local education authority has a plan that will clearly raise standards, particularly in underperforming or failing schools, the Government welcome that. When it does not, an academy may be the option—when there is persistent educational inequality and disadvantage, which sometimes will have existed for generations.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): On the previous point about matching the funding in state schools to that which currently applies in private schools, will my right hon. Friend indicate the time over which that objective could be achieved? Does she think that it can be achieved entirely out of general taxation?

Ruth Kelly: As usual, my hon. Friend makes a salient point. I have just laid before the House detailed, concrete commitments on capital investment, which, as a first step, will help to close the gap—and, in fact, close it—between private sector capital investment spending today and our ambition for capital spending on state schools. Clearly, there are also revenue implications. As he knows, we do not, in general, set out our revenue plans beyond the period of the comprehensive spending review, but we have given a commitment for the next two years to invest heavily in personalised education, out of general taxation, so that every child can benefit from more catch-up support, more individual teaching, more small group and one-to-one support—particularly for those falling behind—and additional activities for the most able. I am talking about personalised provision, with pupils from the most disadvantaged backgrounds as the first priority. Combined with the investment already allocated in last autumn's schools White Paper, we have now given a total of £1 billion to support that approach to individual teaching and learning.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): I may have misheard my right hon. Friend, but, from reading the vast amount of documentation that we have had since the Chancellor's Budget speech, I understand that the figure that she gave is the added amount that the Chancellor announced. When combined with the amount already being spent, the figure is much larger, is it not?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The amounts that I have just outlined are in addition to the amount for personalisation already allocated through the direct schools grant. That brings the total over the next two years—just for personalised learning—to more than £1 billion. As he will know, last week I asked Christine Gilbert, the chief executive of Tower Hamlets council, to lead an expert review team to investigate how we can take forward the vision for outstanding, tailored teaching and learning. Her report, which is due towards the end of the year, will set out a vision for the next generation—teaching and learning in 2020.

As the Chancellor said last week, investment in schools is the most important and pivotal investment that we can make for our economy and our future. However, I am disappointed to tell the House that on the central issue in British politics today, the Conservatives have failed to rise to the challenge. They have never been prepared to make the investment that is necessary for every child and for the nation's future prosperity, and now they are unable to make up their minds whether to back the investment announced in the Budget. I am delighted to see the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury, the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) on the Front Bench, waiting to hear what I am going to say. On Budget day, when she was asked whether the Conservatives, in government, would spend less on education, she said, "Um. Ah. Certainly." Under pressure, talking about Tory cuts, she added:

"undoubtedly that could be a possibility".

However, later that night on "Newsnight", the shadow Chancellor—who might just be waking up to the fact that more investment in schools is needed and vital for our country's future prosperity, and that his party might also need to be back on the centre ground in British politics—said he would happily back our plans for investment in education. That is a party in chaos—yet another flip-flop.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): As the Secretary of State is being party political, may I remind her that one of the Government's key promises in 1997 was that class sizes in primary schools would be under 30? However, by 2001 that key pledge was abandoned and has thus not been met. Any aspiration must be matched against the reality of what the Government say and what they do not deliver.

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman is talking complete rubbish. Our party's election manifesto in 1997 said clearly that for every five, six and seven-year-old, class sizes would have a cap of 30. Not only have we delivered that pledge in government, but we continue to invest in teachers and support staff to reduce class sizes. Once again the Conservative party is failing to prove itself to be a credible party of opposition when we discuss education.

John Bercow rose—

Ruth Kelly: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, who I know will talk fluently and at length on the issue.

John Bercow: I will not talk at length because I do not suppose that I shall be allowed to do so, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The right hon. Lady has made it clear that she wants to focus on the most disadvantaged young people and, clearly, specificity is of the essence. Given that children in young offenders institutions are receiving on average only eight hours education a week, and that in the interests of both reducing recidivism and increasing opportunity for those disadvantaged young people we need to do better, what specific financial commitment is she making to increase provision for them?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman might not have thought that that was long, but I certainly did.

Ruth Kelly: I am delighted that I gave way to the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) because he makes an extremely important point. If we are to reduce recidivism, we need to invest in offender learning. I draw the attention of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues and the House to the Green Paper that we recently published on reducing reoffending through skills and employment. We outlined in the Green Paper our commitments and the fact that the eight hours that are provided to offenders need to be increased in both volume and quality to ensure that all offenders learn the skills that they need to get a job after leaving the institution. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government take that extremely seriously.

On the point about flip-flops that I was addressing, I thought for a moment that the Tory policy on vouchers to subsidise private education had been scrapped. However, I am now not quite so sure because just the other day, when browsing the net on my personal computer, I came across an interview on Mumsnet with a certain David Cameron, or Dave. Dave said that he wanted that sounds like vouchers to me. It is anything to anyone. I urge anyone in the House who is interested to visit www.flip-flop.com.

"public money spent on private independent schools"—

Schools are at the heart of our vision for a world-class education system, but they are only one part of it.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ruth Kelly: I am now dealing with further education. If the hon. Gentleman wants to discuss further education, I will be glad to take his intervention—[Interruption.] I have moved on.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con) rose—

Ruth Kelly: I will, of course, give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Willetts: Before the Secretary of State moves on from schools, may I ask her about a matter that is of great concern to many parents? What assessment has she made of the effect on schools of the strike action that is planned tomorrow? We have heard of at least one London borough that expects a quarter of its schools to close. Will she join me in condemning any strike action that affects the most vulnerable people in the community, including, for example, children with special educational needs who will not be taken to their schools?

Ruth Kelly: Clearly, schools must make decisions on health and safety grounds that are right for their staff and pupils. I urge any staff involved to think seriously about the consequences for schools, especially those that serve special needs children.

Our schools are at the heart of our vision for a world-class education system, but they are only one part of it. Labour Members are clear that further education is also crucial. It is the real engine of social mobility in this country. It gives a second chance to those who missed out at school and helps people to build new careers. It enables those stuck in unfulfilling jobs to retrain so that they can get on.

Today, I have published a White Paper on the future of further education. It sets out an ambitious programme of investment and reform and gives the college sector the status and attention it deserves. The Government have chosen to invest in the college sector, just as we have in our schools. Since 1997, there has been a 48 per cent. real-terms increase in investment. An additional £350 million of capital over two years for colleges was announced in last year's Budget, and new resources are set out in this year's Budget and today's White Paper.

Labour Members have an ambitious programme of investment for our colleges—we have made our choice. The investment that we have already delivered has paid off. More people are joining FE courses—6 million now compared with 4 million in 1997—and more young people and adults are starting and completing good qualifications every year. However, we face unprecedented challenges, so we must do much more. Our post-16 staying-on rate is one of the worst in the industrialised world, and we need to transform the skills of adults if we are to remain competitive in the new globalised economy, with new players such as India and China becoming more powerful every day. Standing still is simply not an option.

I want to see all young people in education or training. I want all adults to be able to continue to learn new and valuable skills and all employers to fulfil their responsibilities to train their work forces. Today's White Paper will make a reality of those ambitions. There will be £25 million to fund a new entitlement to a free first level 3 qualification for all 19 to 25-year-olds, together with an extra £11 million to provide maintenance support to help with living costs. There will be £11 million to help colleges to improve their work force by recruiting mid-career professionals from industry and top-flight graduates. There will be £20 million to address the issues identified by the women and work commission in facing up to the scandal of unequal pay.

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): I absolutely agree with the Secretary of State about the importance of the White Paper that was published today. One of its elements is the return of learning accounts. When the policy was in practice before, it was affected by the severe problem of fraud, which led to a loss of confidence in the accounts. Will she set out what difference there will be between the learning accounts to which the White Paper refers and those that existed in the past?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes an important point. It is right that funds are in the hands of individuals so that they can access the courses that they think best meet their needs. The vision of a demand-led system—by both individuals and employers—is at the heart of our approach for the further education sector. Clearly, the individual learning account experience was subject to fraud, and we learned lessons from the Select Committee inquiry into that. In future, all courses will have to be quality assured. A register of quality-assured providers will ensure that it is not possible to defraud the system. At first, the new accounts will be available only for level 3 courses, rather than all courses, and we will pilot the approach carefully before extending it across the country. If, as I think we will, we develop a watertight system that puts power in the hands of the individual, we will move towards a further education system that is in general much more responsive to individual need and demand and that helps us to meet the skills challenges of the future.

We will not only put more power into the hands of the individual in the further education sector, but we will ask colleges to be more responsive to employers. I would like to see courses that are chosen by employers and delivered in the workplace so that companies can access all their training needs, from adult literacy to degree-level engineering, in a convenient and timely way. All colleges will be asked to specialise in their strong areas so that they all have a real centre of excellence. We will raise the bar on standards by taking tough measures to improve colleges that are underperforming. This is a radical package for the further education sector, and it is a Labour package. This is a Budget that secures fairness for every child and every learner by investing in every child and every learner. The Conservatives had the chance to invest in the further education sector when they were in government, but did they? No. In fact, funding was cut by 14 per cent. in real terms under the previous Government.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): If the Secretary of State thinks that the reforms were so desperately needed and so important, why has it taken the Government nine years to introduce them?

Ruth Kelly: Why has it taken the Conservative party nine years to wake up to the fact that more investment might be needed in our schools and further education colleges? Over the past nine years, funding in education has risen by 48 per cent.—almost half—in real terms. At the same time, we have introduced a new level 2 entitlement for all young learners and an entitlement for adults who do not have the basic skills required, to gain them for free. We are also piloting a new approach to level 3 in the regions. The White Paper relates to colleges that are needed to deliver the skills needs of the nation.

Peter Luff: Does the right hon. Lady think that perhaps the time has come for a more radical assessment of the relative roles of higher education and further education? The overlap is now considerable. The message of a 50 per cent. target for HE seems to diminish the value that the Government attach to FE. Is the White Paper radical enough to address the skills needs of our country?

Ruth Kelly: I think that it is. When the hon. Gentleman has a chance to read the White Paper, he will see that we plan to use FE colleges as a major way of delivering HE for those learners who are already in employment and need skills delivered in the workplace, and for those areas where students and employees do not have ready access to HE institutions. That is right and it will help us to achieve our target. If anything, the target of 50 per cent. is too low an ambition rather than too high an ambition.

Mr. Sheerman: Before my right hon. Friend leaves the subject of FE, may I congratulate her on the White Paper? The reasonably broadminded coalition on both sides of the House would no doubt congratulate her on the quality of the recommendations. However, does she think that there is a problem with rebuilding and refurbishing the FE sector estate? She knows about the serious financial problems with borrowing the money in the FE sector. I have not been able to find anything in the document to put that matter to rest.

Ruth Kelly: I agree that the sector needs more capital investment, and capital spending in the FE sector will rise by £1 billion over the next five years, £350 million of which was announced as additional investment in last year's Budget. My hon. Friend is also right that the FE sector finds it difficult to compete on the same terms as schools for 14 to 19 education in particular. When he examines the White Paper closely, he will see that we are planning to level the playing field and make things fairer between schools and the FE sector, and sixth-form colleges in particular, in the approach to 14 to 19 capital, with local authorities in the lead, delivering their vision for capital spending across that age group. I hope that he accepts and recognises that that is a major step forward for capital investment in the FE sector.

John Bercow: On employer involvement, in the formulation of the content of the specialised diplomas, how will the right hon. Lady decide which employers to consult, by what means and over what period?

Ruth Kelly: Again, the hon. Gentleman makes the important point that employers in each sector should be intimately involved, not only in delivering part of the diploma, but in designing the curriculum content. That is why I have asked every sector skills council, which the Government have set up in every major area of the economy, to lead in bringing together a partnership of those interested employers to agree the content of each and every one of those specialised diplomas. By 2013, every young person in the country over the age of 14 will have the choice of learning on one of those 14 specialised diplomas, to which he so rightly referred—bold thinking, but the need for much higher quality and better vocational education is clear. If we are to compete against China and India, we need to invest in engineering and other major parts of the economy.

In proposing our reforms, we have always been clear that they need to be backed up with investment. We have done that against a backdrop of an Opposition whose policy on investment is in complete disarray. The Conservative party refuses to match the investment that we are putting into our education system. I ask the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) to contradict me if what I am saying is not true. It is a party that yet again puts tax cuts before the investment that is needed in our nation's future.

Michael Connarty: My right hon. Friend may be coming to this, but it is worth making the comparisons in concrete terms for the House and the record. My understanding of education spending trends is that between 1992–93 and 1997, the percentage of gross domestic product spent on education fell from 5.4 to 4.7 per cent. under the Conservatives. In the period in which Labour has been in office, it went up to 5.6 per cent. by 2004–05. What is the percentage aim in this Budget, and where will education fit in in the GDP of this country?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a compelling point. It is true that when the Conservatives had the chance, they cut investment in education. Not only that, in their most recent manifesto of 2005, they did not mention skills. Those did not get a look-in.

My hon. Friend asks about our ambition for the future. As he knows, it is to match spending in the state sector with spending in the private sector. Over the course of this Parliament, we have said that we intend to continue to raise the proportion of GDP that is spent on education. We have also said that by 2010–11 we will have fulfilled the ambition on the capital side. We have gone much further than the Conservatives in outlining our plans for the future. We are putting no limits on the ambition that we have for our children or for ourselves as a nation.

We are making the hard choices now for stability and prosperity in the future. There is investment and reform for today and tomorrow, and aspiration and achievement for all. This is a bold and progressive Budget, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): As we are debating the Budget, I draw the House's attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

I want to focus on education, and I ask the Secretary of State when the decision was taken to put it at the centre of the Budget. Of course we welcome the fact that it is centre stage, but one suspects that the Government thought that they would like to do health, but that was a bit too embarrassing, so they then thought they would like to do pensions, but that was too difficult. It seems that by a process of elimination they eventually decided that education had better be the theme.

We welcome the announcements on extra expenditure on education in so far as we understand them. I had hoped that we might know a bit more about the detail after the Secretary of State's speech, but, sadly, we do not. Although we welcome the extra spending, it has to be accompanied by reform. To secure the advantage of the extra expenditure, there has to be real reform of public services.

It was striking that in the Budget speech last week, the Chancellor spoke a lot about education and education spending, but he never once mentioned the Education and Inspections Bill, which was supposed to represent the pivotal moment when the Government committed themselves to serious reform of education. He offered spending without any commitment to the reforms on which the House had voted only a few days earlier. One might have expected him to show at least a little bit of gratitude to Opposition Members for having helped him to secure those reforms.

Mr. McFadden: The hon. Gentleman says that he welcomes the new investment in education. Will he clear up the Conservative party's position on the goal of matching investment per pupil in the state sector with investment in the private sector? Does he support that?

Mr. Willetts: Yes, I will turn to that in a moment. I shall try to go through all the different announcements that we have had from the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills and clarify what each of them means.

First, there is the increase in expenditure next year. Although this was not said by the Chancellor in the House, the Red Book says, and the Secretary of State confirmed just now, that the additional resources of £220 million and £365 million are "to provide further support for personalisation in schools in England."

How will the Secretary of State ensure that that money is spent on personalisation? Will she put conditions on it? What if a head teacher who receives the money decides that there is another priority for his or her school? Will the Secretary of State require the money to be spent on personalisation, and if so, how is she going to do that?

For Budget after Budget we have had announcements of specific pots of money attached to specific purposes, but never an explanation of why the priority in question has been chosen. I remember, for example, the Chancellor announcing in the 1999 Budget debate £2,000 for every school to buy books, saying that it would lead to a total of 10 million new books in all. I never knew how the Department was going to ensure that those 10 million new books arrived. I do not know whether it set any conditions or followed the matter up. I would just like to know from the Secretary of State exactly how she is going to ensure that this money is spent on personalisation, or whether this is a pretence in which we are all supposed to share, whereas in reality it is a cheque for the school—and a good thing, too—but nobody will inquire how the head teacher has spent the money. Conservative Members trust head teachers, and we have no desire to set conditions on the money that will go to schools as a result of this announcement.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the fact that from where I sit, the Secretary of State appears a trifle rouged. Is not the whole point of trust schools the fact that they control their own resources, and should not be micro-managed by the Secretary of State? Will my hon. Friend endorse that point?

Mr. Willetts: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. Conservative Members trust schools—that is why we voted for trust schools, although of course it is a policy that dares not speak its name. It did not even appear in the Education and Inspections Bill, but anyway we backed it, because we believe in giving schools more freedom. If that is the philosophy that the Secretary of State claims she now believes in, why does she have to set conditions on the money that she is sending to schools? Is that consistent with the view of education that lies behind the Bill for which Conservative Members were happy to vote?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I had better give way to the Chairman of the Select Committee.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman trusts head teachers, and so do I, but we would both be concerned if there was not a balance in these matters and, for example, money flowing to schools for special educational needs was not used for that purpose.

Mr. Willetts: Yes, but I am trying to establish what conditions, if any, will be set. Head teachers around the country, who heard this announcement last week, would like to know how much flexibility they are to have in spending the money, and on that, I am afraid, Government Members remain silent.

Michael Connarty: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will clarify that point, because I am sure that the record will show that he has just contradicted himself. First he demanded of the Secretary of State the terms on which the money given for personalisation will be followed through and delivered, then he seemed to say to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) that he did not agree with personalisation and that the money should be spent in any way the head teacher wishes, not on personalisation. Is he for or against personalisation?

Mr. Willetts: Pay attention at the back of class! It is very simple: Conservative Members do not believe in attaching strings to the money. However, we particularly dislike fake announcements, such as when the Chancellor says, "I've got £2,000 for school books," or "I have £200 million for personalisation," and everybody is supposed to conspire in the pretence that the money has a special purpose, when the Department makes no effort whatever to set any conditions.

All I am trying to do, for the sake of establishing the position of head teachers throughout the country, is find out whether any conditions will really be set. I hope that they will not be, in which case the Secretary of State should stop pretending that this money is attached to whatever is the hot policy area of the moment. I hope that that is totally clear.

Peter Luff: I hope that my hon. Friend will not let the Secretary of State off the hook on this important point. Paragraph 6.58 of the Red Book talks about the money being targeted towards schools with "high levels of deprivation". If that is the mechanism used to distribute the funding, it looks as if it will contribute to the ever widening gap between schools in Worcestershire and schools in Birmingham, for example. We need an answer to that question.

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend is quite right. It would be helpful to have a bit more information about how the money is to be distributed and what conditions are to be set for it. We look forward to receiving that information as a matter of urgency. I had rather hoped that we would hear more about it today.

Mr. Chaytor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman is a member of the Select Committee, so I will give way to him and then try to make a little progress.

Mr. Chaytor: I am grateful. If the hon. Gentleman is so strong in his belief that head teachers need greater freedoms, how does he defend his policy on setting, whereby he insists on prescribing to head teachers exactly how they should organise the teaching in their schools?

Mr. Willetts: I thought that in all parts of the House there was some support for setting as part of what is called personalisation. I am asking whether the extra money that will go to schools is supposed to be spent on personalisation, and if the Government claim that it is for personalisation, how they will set conditions on how it is spent.

I turn now to the medium-term proposal on capital expenditure. We are a bit baffled as to exactly what is going on here. Perhaps the Secretary of State could help us. She was Economic Secretary to the Treasury, and before that an economics journalist, so if anybody can enlighten us, it is her. As I understand it, we have been told that we are to have a total of £34 billion of capital expenditure over five years, which we welcome. We have been told that the money will rise from £5.6 billion this year to £8 billion in five years, but for some reason we are not to be provided with the crucial information on how the money will be broken down over that period, which schools and people planning capital expenditure need if they are going to get proper value from it.

There are a limited number of ways in which one can spend sums that start at £5.6 billion, end up as £8 billion and add up to £34 billion, so why does the Secretary of State keep the House in suspense? Why does she not fill in the gaps, so that schools and people who wish to help finance capital spending in schools can do some serious planning? That would be very helpful for many people who care about the quality of education. Again, if she wishes to intervene, I would welcome further information.

The last of the Secretary of State's three announcements on spending is the figure for the long term—the proposals for increasing expenditure to reach the level in the private sector. When I heard the Chancellor announce that in his speech the other day, I thought that I had heard it before. Indeed, what do we find but that in 2001 the Prime Minister, speaking at the conference of the Association of Teachers and Lecturers, said that his aim was "to get to the situation where we have a state education system that is as good in its facilities and its investment as the independent sector"?

When asked what that meant, a senior Government source—for all we know it was the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden), who I think was then one of these advisers, and an expert in the black arts—said:

"The prime minister was indicating that as we continue with real-term, year-on-year spending in state schools, we would hope to narrow the gap with the independent sector."

In 2001 the gap in spending between the state sector and the private sector was approximately £2,000 per pupil a year. In the five years since the Prime Minister made that pledge, the gap has widened to £3,000. Now that the Chancellor has turned up and repeated what the Prime Minister said five years ago, we are rather interested to know why the Government should do any better this time than they did when they made the announcement last time.

Of course we want the gap to be bridged and we want to see that level of expenditure, but it is hard for us to judge how the Government are setting about achieving it. One possibility—although I would never suspect the Secretary of State of such cynicism—is that we simply take today's expenditure on education as a percentage of GDP and project it forward, and there comes a point at which simply by holding expenditure constant as a percentage of GDP, it eventually reaches £8,000 per pupil per year. In fact, on our calculation that happens shortly after 2020, so perhaps the Government expect it to happen shortly after 2020. Indeed, in his briefings on the Budget, the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) gave 2020 as one of the dates when the target would be achieved.

That aspiration is in reality a forecast, and the Government need do nothing other than keep public spending on education at today's level. The Secretary of State may tell us otherwise, and if so, I would very much welcome that. How does she intend to achieve that aspiration, and over what time scale? We are happy to sign up to such an aspiration, but while the Government talk only about inputs, spending and ratios, we want standards in state schools to reach the standards in private schools. That is what parents care about most, and that is how we should approach the objective that has been set.

When the Secretary of State and the Chancellor reflect on these matters they ought to take careful account of the wise advice in successive reports by the Education and Skills Committee. In two separate reports on public expenditure it has issued salutary warnings that the Chancellor and the Secretary of State have not taken fully into account. Its report on public expenditure on education and skills for the Session 2004–05 begins with a crucial paragraph entitled "The effectiveness of increased expenditure", which states:

"The Chancellor's budget book for 2004 claimed a direct relationship between the increased investment in education since 1997 and improvement in GCSE results in particular. Our evidence showed that with lower levels of investment"— that is something of which the Opposition are accused—

"GCSE results had improved to at least the same extent in earlier periods in the 1990s."

We therefore secured similar improvements.

The report continues:

"The Government needs to take great care in making claims about the effectiveness of increased investment in education in increasing levels of achievement which the evidence cannot be proved to support. Links between expenditure and outcome remain difficult to establish."

That is extremely wise advice. When the Prime Minister said that he was going to focus on outputs, not inputs, we thought that that was part of what new Labour was supposed to be about. However, what we heard from the Chancellor last week and the Secretary of State this afternoon was entirely about inputs, not outputs. Why did the right hon. Lady not take to heart the advice in the Select Committee report?

The Select Committee returned to the subject a year later and, importantly, warned the world of education that the rate of growth of education spending would slow down. Its 2006 report on public expenditure on education and skills opens by making the point that the Government "sets great store by stability of funding; it needs to ensure that budget holders across the education sector are aware that funding will not rise at a significant rate over the next spending review period and beyond."

It is great to see the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), the Committee Chairman, in the Chamber. Paragraph 15 of the report goes on to say:

"The Government has already accepted that spending increases will be more modest in the years ahead. The DfES needs to be explicit in stating that growth in expenditure on education and skills will slow down significantly in the coming period. For schools that may mean growth of 2–3% a year in cash terms compared to 5–7% growth in recent years."

The Select Committee rightly called for a grown-up debate so that people who work in education can accept that the rate of growth of education spending will slow down a great deal.

That was extremely important advice, but last week the Chancellor and the Secretary of State, who has talked about a "huge new resource", painted a picture for people in the world of education that is very different from the reality set out soberly and frankly in the Select Committee report. I would be happy to join the Secretary of State in a grown-up debate about how, if the rate of growth of spending is to slow down, that money can be used most efficiently to raise standards in education.

Instead of following the Select Committee report, the Government have bandied figures about as if there is there is going to be an extraordinary splurge in public spending. The figures show that the rate of growth of public spending will not be as great in the next few years as it has been in the past few years. It would have been grown-up to follow the Select Committee advice and confront the world of education with that reality, rather than try to avoid it. The Chancellor frequently enjoys accusing us of boom and bust in our management of the economy, but the record shows that in the financing of public services the Government are responsible for a cycle of boom and bust.

May I invite the Secretary of State to focus on science—a subject to which the Chancellor referred in the Budget? The state of science is a subject of widespread concern, and something that worries Members on both sides of the House. Specific science initiatives were launched which, in so far as we can understand them and the figures behind them, we welcome. However, I hope that the Secretary of State will forgive our scepticism about the special schemes that are always being announced.

During the election campaign, less than a year ago, the Prime Minister said on 14 April 2005:

"Today we pledge an important new element in this knowledge investment—a £250 million three year programme for England to renovate or build at least one new science lab in every secondary school in the country, to give a further boost to school science and to give all schools new facilities even if they are not scheduled for early complete refurbishment for the longer-term capital programmes."

During the election campaign, £250 million over three years was promised for science labs. Ever since, people have tried to obtain information about that £250 million programme and what is supposed to be happening. Finally, Lord Sainsbury sent a letter to John Dunford last month that made it clear that there was no special £250 million fund whatsoever. Instead, Lord Sainsbury said that "the Office of Science and Technology and the DfES will be undertaking a pilot project to build a demonstrator school science lab."

If that is what happened to the £250 million scheme last year, why should we have any faith in the announcements that the Government have made this year?

Mrs. Dorries: Over the past five years many science departments in universities have closed, and the largest proportion of science students are from the independent sector, so the position is far worse than my hon. Friend suggested. There is little point investing in science labs in the state sector, because there is nowhere for those students to study science if they obtain qualifications.

Mr. Willetts: I agree, and I hope that when the Financial Secretary to the Treasury makes his winding-up speech, we will obtain an authoritative statement about what happened to the £250 million that was announced during the election. I am afraid, however, that we must leave the judgment to John Dunford, the general secretary of the Association of School and College Leaders, who said:

"During the election campaign, the DTI announced out of the blue that it was putting £250 million into improving school science labs. After repeated requests to the DfES and DTI, we have at last discovered, as we feared, that this money does not exist."

If that is not the case, I hope that the Financial Secretary will set the record straight.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Government, with Wellcome Trust money, have renewed and rebuilt laboratories, and have also built new laboratories in every university in the county? Has he visited a university that does not have a huge amount of building under way? His constituency may be a bad example, but in my constituency of Norwich, North, five science labs have been built in schools, and I have opened every one.

Mr. Willetts: I am pleased that that has happened in the hon. Gentleman's schools, but we have still not received an authoritative answer to the question of whether we should take seriously the pledge made by the Prime Minister during the election.

John Bercow: Again, we need to focus on outputs, not merely on inputs. As the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's international student assessment shows that the United Kingdom has fallen from fourth to 11th in the international league table for science, ought we not to be told by the Government why?

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend is right. I was hoping to ask the Secretary of State for a little more information about what she was doing to tackle that. I intended to devote a section of my speech to the 3,000 new science teachers mentioned in the Chancellor's Budget statement, but not mentioned in the Red Book. Perhaps we will hear more about them in the winding-up speech.

I turn to the subject of further education, about which the Secretary of State spoke and on which we have had a White Paper today. I agree with the right hon. Lady about the importance of FE. I served on the governing body of an FE college for six years, after it was incorporated. Many FE colleges greatly welcomed incorporation, although I fear that the present direction of policy is slowly and insidiously to take away many of the freedoms that FE colleges had an opportunity to seize then.

FE has rightly been described as sometimes being the middle child in the world of education, which does not get the attention that it merits, between schools and higher education. Sir Andrew Foster's report on FE was excellent. I hope the Secretary of State will agree that if we ever want to assess the Government's performance when it comes to opening up skills and opportunities for our young people, nothing beats table D4 of Labour Market Trends. That says it all. I shall give some edited highlights.

The table is entitled "Economic Activity and Economic Inactivity", broken down by age. It shows that among 16 and 17-year-olds, 95,000 are unemployed and not in full-time education. There are a further 122,000 who are economically inactive and not in full-time education, which adds up to a total of 217,000 16 and 17-year-olds alone. That compares with a figure of 170,000—quite bad enough—when the Government came to office. I should like to hear from the Secretary of State why she thinks that figure had deteriorated so much during her years in office.

The next line in the table provides figures for 18 to 24-year-olds. A total of 997,000 18 to 24-year-olds are neither working nor studying nor training. Again, that is a bad figure; the total was 912,000 when the Government came to office. After nine years of initiatives, the new deal and all the other investment, the number of young people who are neither working nor studying nor training has significantly deteriorated since the Government started. Instead of the complacency that we heard from the Secretary of State, I hoped that for once she would tell us why the figures are still deteriorating. None of us can take any comfort from the fact that the position is so bad. The Opposition are entitled to be sceptical about the Government's chances of tackling this very serious problem.

On page 27 of Sir Andrew Foster's report there is a little box that tells the story that we hear from anybody working in the world of FE. The box is entitled, "List of organisations with a monitoring/inspection/improvement role in FE colleges". I will not detain the House by reading out the full list. Suffice it to say that 17 different bodies are listed in the report as having a role in the regulation of FE. My understanding of what today's White Paper proposes is that one of the bodies, the adult learning inspectorate, is merged with Ofsted, but one new body is created—the quality improvement inspectorate—leaving us still with a net total of 17 bodies improving, regulating and auditing FE. That is far too many bodies supervising FE. It is clear from Sir Andrew Foster's report that that is the problem that he wants tackled.

In some ways, the best bit of the report is appendix 2, where the real message comes across. It is entitled "A view from abroad", which presents evidence from other countries. In the United States,

"There is no formal inspection process, national funding regime or national qualifications system".

There is

"a strong emphasis on self-regulation and a lack of top down control".

In Denmark it is the same story. In Australia

"There is a much simpler accreditation and accountability system".

In the Netherlands,

"Although inspection is more frequent than in England",

there is

"greater autonomy at institute level".

The report is clear. There should be more autonomy for FE colleges, and fewer bodies endlessly inspecting, auditing and checking them—but there is nothing in the White Paper that tackles that problem. Instead, we still have a multiplicity of agencies.

The Secretary of State spoke today about some of the measures in the White Paper. One of the features of it is the focus on the under-25s. We would like to hear more about how that balances out—what it will mean, for example, for programmes and courses that are particularly valued by older people, and whether the shift in funding will mean more of the kind of problems that were brought to all our surgeries in the past couple of years involving older people who enjoyed courses at FE colleges that did not lead to an official vocational qualification, but had found that their costs rose or their courses closed because the Learning and Skills Council was no longer willing to fund them.

Many people get real social value from a range of courses—be it learning the piano or the guitar, or basket weaving. We would like to hear from the Secretary of State whether buried in the White Paper is a further shift of funding away from such courses, so that when people come to our surgeries again next year to ask why, yet again, the cost of those courses has gone up, we can be clear about when the Government made the statement, and what its implications were.

There is a big focus in the White Paper on national vocational qualifications. Is the Secretary of State, like me, concerned about many employers' lack of confidence in NVQs? The paradox is that the funding is being shifted to NVQ levels 1 and 2, when those qualifications command no premium whatsoever in the labour market. They are not worth any increase in pay. That tells us something about what employers think of those NVQs. Why are the Government trying to funnel Learning and Skills Council funding into courses that, sadly, are of the lowest value in the labour market, and away from courses that have other values?

I hope that in the course of the Budget debate we will get more information about these important points, which will enable us to get behind the rhetoric of the Budget statement last week and the Secretary of State's speech today, so that people working in education can have a little more hard information on which they can plan. The right hon. Lady failed to provide that information in her speech. I hope that we will hear more in the winding-up speech.

Let us be clear that as regards the world of education, we have a Chancellor who can only talk money, does not understand the importance of reform, and failed to commit himself to the Education and Inspections Bill in his Budget statement. We have a Prime Minister who talks reform but can deliver it only with Opposition help and support. It is only the Opposition who have a commitment to the proper funding of education, combined with real reform of education. That is why only we can deliver higher educational standards.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I remind the House that there is a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches, which applies from now.

6.48 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow the principal Opposition spokesperson on education, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills.

Many hon. Members are aware that one of the greatest post-war achievements in education was the setting up of the Open university by the Labour Government of Harold Wilson. Not everyone will recall that under the Government of Margaret Thatcher, there was a period when the Open university was at real risk. However, it was not abolished and I trust that all the major parties are firmly committed to its continuing success. I want to discuss the economy and participate in the general Budget debate rather than focusing my remarks on education.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on his 10th Budget statement. Labour Members have a lot to be proud of—for the first time in our history, this country has had 10 years of uninterrupted economic growth. The UK is at the top of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development for stability in respect of growth and of inflation.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Strang: A 10-minute limit has been imposed and many hon. Members want to speak. I would like to give way, but I want to discuss the general economy.

Peter Luff: On a point of order, I am sure that you want to be helpful, as you always are, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the Member who has the Floor. If the right hon. Gentleman were to give way, injury time would be added to his speech, so he can give way without incurring a time penalty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not want to take out too much time in answering a point of order, but I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman knows the well-established rule of the House that injury time is available for two interventions. However, it is still entirely up to him whether he gives way in a particular situation.

Dr. Strang: Injury time does not extend the length of the match. The debate will still finish at 10 pm, so an intervention means that fewer hon. Members can take part.

[Dr. Strang]

The UK is at the top of the OECD for stability of growth and of inflation, and interest rates and unemployment remain at historic lows. Average wealth per head has risen from the lowest in the G7 to second place—the G7 consists of the UK, the US, France, Canada, Italy, Japan and Germany. Furthermore, households across the income scale continue to see their living standards rise. A strong and strengthening economy, alongside the sound management of our public finances, means that this Government have again been able to invest in Britain's future.

The Budget has served another purpose by shedding a little light on the policies of the official Opposition. After all, although Conservative Members are eager to tell us that they have changed, they are rather shy about what they have changed into. We now know that the Conservative party would reduce spending by £17 billion in the year ahead. On top of that, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has calculated that a Conservative Government would require public spending to be £16 billion lower in 2007–08, which would eliminate all possibility of additional investment in infrastructure, science or education.

A key benefit of the economic strength and stability maintained by this Government has been the steady rise in the number of people in work. The UK has the highest employment rate in the G7, and the number of people in employment is close to record levels—up by 178,000 since last year. More people are in work, and with the national minimum wage, child benefit, the child tax credit and the working tax credit, this Government have made work pay. People are no longer better off on the dole. Alongside the high level of employment, the number of unemployed and the rate of unemployment have stayed and remain low.

There has been a slight rise in unemployment in recent months. There has also been a large migration of workers from central and eastern Europe into this country, and, generally speaking, those people are now productive members of our labour force. There has been speculation that the scale of that influx might have been a factor in the recent slight increase in unemployment. It is early days, but the Department for Work and Pensions has published two working papers since the enlargement of the European Union in May 2004. I am pleased that the indications to date are that this migration is not the cause of the small recent rise in unemployment and that the overall economic impact of the migration has been "modest but broadly positive".

The current budget balance is clearly important. We can argue about the scale of borrowing that it is prudent for the Government to undertake in any financial year, and we can debate what is a sensible maximum for the national debt as a percentage of gross domestic product. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has articulated what is described as the golden rule with respect to our budget balance. I shall leave it to the economists in this House to argue about the length of the economic cycle, but it is worth making the point that, even with the previous dating of the economic cycle, the average current budget balance was zero and the cumulative deficit over the period was £1.9 billion.

Hon. Members will be aware that the current budget balance depends upon two variables that stretch into hundreds of billions of pounds. Indeed, both current public expenditure and current receipts are in the region of £500 billion. To complain about the re-dating of the economic cycle on the basis of £1.9 billion is to fail to understand the errors inherent in any economic projection—it is difficult to say exactly where we are to the closest £1 billion—which is especially true when the projection is the difference between income and expenditure.

One of the key themes of this year's Budget has been Britain's competitiveness in the global economy, and, of course, our economy would not have grown and would not continue to grow if there were a lack of confidence in its management. I have said a few words about the current budget balance, but, of course, we must not lose sight of the balance of payments—I am referring to our trade balance, which one might call the external balance. I encourage my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to address the importance of the trade balance in the modern world, because, as hon. Members know, there has been a continued and substantial deterioration in our balance of payments. In the past five years, the deficit has increased from more than £19 billion in 2000 to more than £47 billion in 2005, and the trend was rising before that. At some point, the Government and hon. Members must address that point.

In one sense, I am sure that hon. Members agree that it would be a good thing if we were to increase our imports from the developing world. The commitment of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to the developing world is well known, and I believe that hon. Members on both sides of the House have acknowledged it. Thanks to the Labour Government, we are recognised as one of the leading countries in the developed world in addressing the challenge of global poverty. I hope that I speak for hon. Members of all parties in saying that the UK should seek to avoid economic activities that run contrary to the legitimate interests of people in the developing world. The policies that govern our trade must be as constructive towards the developing world as possible.

In the limited time remaining, I want to discuss climate change, which we must consider when we talk about economic growth in the UK, Europe and the whole world. We certainly want our economy to grow in a way that minimises carbon emissions and our demand on finite resources, but we have not reached the point at which we need to implement drastic policies to contract the economy for environmental reasons. However, we must use energy much more efficiently, because we are exceptionally wasteful. We have not addressed basic issues such as fitting insulation to council houses. Time is limited, so I cannot discuss the use of finite resources such as fossil fuels.

We need to address those important issues in the coming weeks. Thanks to this Government, living standards continue to rise. Our aim should be to secure continued stability and sustainable economic growth.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): The Budget contains many welcome proposals on education, and I shall go through some of them in more detail. However, it is frustrating that, when the Government have some good tales to tell on education, they insist on over-hyping and over-selling their announcements. That is entirely counter-productive, because it hands a stick to the Opposition with which to beat the Government about the head, which is pointless. Re-announcing previous spending and artificially inflating the figures just leads to cynicism. If they were frank about their announcement, we could discuss the points of fact, welcome some of the commitments and debate policy priorities, which is what we should be doing in this kind of debate. Instead of that, we must spend some time unpicking the spin.

Let me begin with the Chancellor's announcement that he is handing an extra £34 billion to schools. Of course, that got fantastic headlines, but the figure is based on adding up all the capital spend over the next five years, with many of the announcements having been made prior to the Budget. The extra amount in each year is actually just £1.6 billion, representing the rise from the planned £6.4 billion for 2007–08 to just over £8 billion in 2010–11.

Then there is the impressive-sounding pledge to increase spending on state school pupils to the level spent in private schools, which, as the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) pointed out, the Prime Minister promised to do some time ago. But there is no timetable for closing that spending gap—it is a vague aspiration. If Liberal Democrat Members expressed such an aspiration, the Secretary of State would accuse us, with some enthusiasm, of making ludicrous and uncosted spending commitments, yet the Government seem perfectly happy to express such aspirations. The pledge is to raise state school spending, at some future date, to the level of today's private school spending. That is a big enough task in itself. According to the Institute for Fiscal Studies, it would, even after the announcements in this week's Budget, require an extra £17 billion on top of planned spending. That would take 16 years to achieve if spending grows in line with the growth in the economy. Even then, it will not close the gap with the private sector unless the private sector does not significantly increase its own spending over that period. I suppose that we must at least be grateful that these myths were exploded within 24 hours, in contrast to the myth about the spending on school science labs, which took rather longer to decode, as the hon. Member for Havant pointed out. Such claims are unhelpful and breed cynicism.

Michael Connarty: I would not like to accuse the hon. Lady of trying to debunk a promise on the basis that it is good for the Liberals but does not reflect the Government's position. The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) quoted the Prime Minister as saying that we will narrow the gap. The Chancellor said in his Budget that we will do away with the gap and match spending on public sector students to the level in the private sector. I should have thought that that is a significant move forward. I certainly welcome it and I hope that the hon. Lady will do so without being churlish.

Sarah Teather: I think that the Chancellor actually said that he would match the level of funding to that of today rather than talking about the gap. As the Secretary of State said earlier, there is no timetable for narrowing that gap. It depends on the rate at which private sector spending increases.

Despite the spin and nonsense, the Budget contains genuine bonuses and good proposals for education with which I wholeheartedly agree. I shall highlight a few of those, because it easy for us to spend a great deal of time castigating the Government about things that we disagree with.

First, let me highlight a proposal that nobody else has mentioned and that is unlikely to gain any headlines, spun or not, but which is none the less welcome—that is, that we should move towards a simpler and less burdensome assessment of research in our universities. We will need to look at the detail of that. However, it seems eminently sensible to move towards a metric system in place of the existing research assessment exercise and to run the old system in conjunction with the new. That is likely to be welcomed by all, especially universities. We look forward to the Government clarifying those proposals.

Secondly, the Budget includes a genuine acknowledgment of the depth and scale of the problem of the shortage of specialist science teachers. Although that is rather late, as it comes 18 months after Professor Smith's report, it is welcome, as are some of the proposals. Liberal Democrat Members have for some time pointed out that it will not be possible to fill all the gaps in the system merely by recruiting new specialists, and that we must also invest in retraining teachers currently teaching in areas outside their own specialism. We made an election pledge to do that in our 2005 manifesto. The Budget announces pilots to begin that process. We look forward to the results of those pilots. I urge the Secretary of State to extend the scheme to language and English teachers, where there is also a critical shortage. I am pleased that the Government have acknowledged the shortage of specialist science teachers, particularly in physics and chemistry. The Institute of Physics and others have called on the Government to break their target down for recruitment to identify those areas of specialism in particular, and it is welcome that they have done so.

The detail of the commitment to recruit, retain and retrain new specialist teachers remains unclear, as the hon. Member for Havant observed. Will there really be 3,000 new teachers, as reported by the press, given that the detail is not in the Budget papers? If so, what steps are the Government taking to entice people into teaching and to prevent them from leaving? Last year, they missed their own target for recruiting specialist science and maths teachers—and, indeed, specialist language teachers, where they fell short by a greater amount. What new activity are they proposing to ensure that they reach this target? Surely they need to look at this as part of a general problem with recruiting and retaining highly qualified teachers. We have a critical shortage of head teachers and, despite six-figure salaries being offered, many posts lie empty for extended periods. The Government need to get to the bottom of why so many people do not want to do the job. I suspect that when they ask teachers and teaching unions why schools find it so difficult to recruit highly qualified teachers, they will find that, despite the spin in the White Paper about freeing up schools, it is teachers who are desperate to be freed from the endless edicts from Whitehall and want far more freedom to teach a curriculum that meets the needs of their students.

The money allocated to personalised learning is welcome, but the details of how it will be allocated are not clear, and I would be grateful for the Minister's clarification. John Dunford from the Association of School and College Leaders has described the current system for targeting extra funds on disadvantaged students as spraying funds around like Dick Cheney on a quail shoot. He points out that money is failing to reach the most disadvantaged students, with some schools doing comparatively well despite the fact that they are in low-performing areas. It is not clear from the Budget documents or from previous announcements whether the Government intend to target money based on data surrounding schools or on deprivation figures for the local authority. We urge the Secretary of State to go further and consider targeting on the basis of individual pupils. We are examining the detail of how such a scheme could work in practice. It could absorb many of the existing funding streams for disadvantage and focus on underachievement as well as on disadvantaged students, no matter what school they study at, to give a greater incentive to take those students and to provide the support that they need.

I am sure that the Secretary of State will agree that what would make the most difference in this respect is smaller class sizes, with very young children being the most important age group. That is why we would like class sizes for infants to be reduced to 20. We accept that it is an expensive commitment, so we would want to use the money allocated to the child trust fund to pay for it. We believe that it would be more effective to invest money in a child's education at five than to give them something that they can cash in when they are 18.

I have mentioned some of the proposals that I welcome and others where I disagree with the Government's focus. Let me conclude by saying a few words about some glaring omissions as regards the proposals on further education. I had hoped that they would be clarified by today's White Paper, but that is not so. The greatest disappointment in the Budget, and indeed in the White Paper, is that while it repeats the earlier aspiration of closing the funding gap between schools and colleges for the same provision, there is no timetable and no concrete commitment to achieving it—it is another uncosted aspiration. The young people who study in FE colleges are disproportionately from less affluent backgrounds, and each is short-changed by about £400 a year.

The White Paper contains some welcome warm words about a new set of principles for funding 14-to-19 learning such as laying out comparable funding for courses irrespective of institution, recognising genuine costs and advocating an approach that should not limit students' choices. However, the task has been hived off to a technical funding group and I am worried about how much will get implemented and over what time scale. Students and colleges need these changes now. Programmes such as the increased flexibility programme are not funded to the level of true costs, with many colleges, including the College of North West London in my constituency, reporting that they subsidise the programme heavily, with a dramatic impact on courses in other areas. The Government cannot push on with an agenda of contestability and rely on the good nature and social justice ethos of colleges without adequately funding them.

If we are looking for a place from which to squeeze money, perhaps the Learning and Skills Council should be a prime target for cuts. I welcome statements in the Budget about slimming down that obese organisation, but its costs are astronomical. They run at more than 10 times the costs of the equivalent body in higher education. The LSC is a bureaucratic monster, unaccountable to local people, barely accountable to Parliament and unpopular with colleges. The Government should take a firm hand with it. One of my favourite idiot edicts from that organisation said that science and maths courses should be a low priority in London and proposed that colleges should cut them. Thankfully, it appears to have seen sense, but that is indicative of an organisation that is grossly out of touch.

The new first level 3 entitlement up to the age of 25, which is included in the Budget, is welcome and has been our party policy for some time. However, the allocated £25 million looks likely to cover only those already paying for the course. Given the statements of the Chancellor and the Secretary of State about the importance of that qualification to the economy, will the LSC be charged with recruiting more students to study at that level? If so, where will the money come from? Are colleges expected to take it from existing adult provision and cut that even further? We already have a crisis in adult provision, not only in basket-weaving or underwater swimming, but in core courses, which are vital to the economy.

The Budget announces the roll-out of the train to gain programme, but the Government do not seem to have taken account of the IFS report, which said that the scheme had little if any impact in the pilot areas because those who trained under the pilot scheme—the national employer training programme—would have done so anyway. What changes have the Government made to the scheme to take account of the IFS evaluation? They cannot bleat about the importance of evidence-based policy if they choose to ignore evidence that is presented to them.

The Budget contains some welcome proposals, marred by the usual dodgy statistics and over-inflated claims. However, it also contains some glaring omissions in policy areas that specifically target under-achievement in the most disadvantaged groups. If it had a school report, it would read, "Not bad, but could do a lot better."

7.12 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): In the short time available, I begin by saying that, in 10 minutes, I shall probably appear to be rather negative about the Budget, but I shall try to be balanced. The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) has already given a good advertisement for the independence of the Select Committee on Education and Skills by drawing attention to the two recent reports on public expenditure as it relates to education. Every year, our Committee examines spending to ascertain whether it is good value for the taxpayer and whether we can have confidence in the Government's assumptions. It is our job to be independent and objective and to tell the Government how we feel about the comparison between their statements and what they deliver.

Our report, which was published only two weeks ago, stated:

"The Government sets great store by stability of funding; it needs to ensure that budget holders across the education sector are aware that funding will not rise at a significant rate over the next spending review period and beyond."

We pointed out that it appeared as though health spending had not only overtaken education spending as a percentage of gross domestic product but that that trend would continue. That was our view until only two weeks ago.

Listening to the Budget debate and the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer made me think that we had reached the right conclusions based on the evidence that the Secretary of State and the permanent secretary—who has now moved to the Home Office—presented to the Committee. The Chancellor made a range of commitments last week and it is our job as a Select Committee to track whether the Government follow them through. We will monitor that progress carefully.

After consulting some of the usual suspects, who immediately analyse the Budget figures, one expert from the London School of Economics suggested that, if one took the Chancellor's commitment to make expenditure of £5,000 a year per state school pupil catch up with the independent sector's £8,000 a year per pupil and timed it for five years, it would cost between £17 billion and £20 billion. If that is the case, it would mean a genuine increase in education spending across the piece, perhaps overtaking health expenditure to account for approximately 7.2 or 7.3 per cent. of GDP.

I warn the Government that we have a job as a Committee and when the Secretary of State appears regularly before us to discuss the Department's work, we will ask her how far she has got on spending between £17 billion and £20 billion and reaching the education funding target of 7.2 per cent. of GDP. The Chancellor must have known what he was doing last week and we therefore take comfort in the fact that we have a Government who have reasserted their commitment to prioritising education spending.

Some discussion about the personalisation agenda has already taken place. I intervened on the Secretary of State because I wanted to ensure that we were clear about the figures for that, and that those that she used did not constitute the total amount that would be spent over the two years but built on what had already been promised as spend. I was reassured by her response and I am pleased with the amount. However, I ask her to check regularly to ascertain that the money flows to fulfil the personalised agenda. Our Committee is in the middle of considering special educational needs and some of the most deprived—in every sense of the word—members of our community. Those people need the greatest amount of personalisation and we must get that right.

Our debates are sometimes taken out of context. We often evaluate a Bill in isolation. I heard some colleagues discussing the new education measure out of context, as if it had nothing to do with the Children Act 2004 or "Every Child Matters", which works towards transforming our education system and the way in which we view children. As we move on with policy, I suspect that we will be conscious that the joined-up government that we now apply to under-18s must apply much further through the age range, especially for special needs.

We shall call the Secretary of State to appear regularly before the Committee to discuss science in schools. It worries all of us that, in the past 10 years, there has been a 20 per cent. decrease in students who study physics, a 34 per cent. decrease in those who study chemistry and a 32.4 per cent. decrease in those studying engineering. That is a serious decline. I appreciate that the Government have invested money in some of those programmes, as my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) mentioned. However, the situation is grave and applies not only to the UK, but to most countries in the developed world. It is not a problem in China and India, and that is worrying.

Perhaps the most worrying figure in the Budget was the 3,000 extra science teachers. I have combed through all the relevant documents and I cannot find the money for that. I am sure that the Secretary of State will assure me that the money is there. I want to celebrate 3,000 extra science teachers because I know how urgently we need them. Is the money for them part of the £18 million announced to support teaching and learning in school science? If so, that amount just sounds a bit small.

As Chair of the Select Committee, I would be neglectful if I did not welcome what I see as the adoption of most of the recommendations of the Foster report in regard to personalisation, to science and to further education. In some areas, the Government have gone beyond the report's recommendations. Much of the further education sector, in wanting to rebuild, wants to have a stake in the 21st century so that the kids in the sector can feel good about their environment. However, many representatives of the FE sector have a problem with borrowing the money and ensuring that they can pay it back over 20 or 25 years. The truth of the matter is that they are a less certain bet for the financial institutions in the City than are the academies.

I also welcome the change in the research assessment exercise, but I urge the Secretary of State to be careful to get it right, because this is very important to our higher education sector. Yes, there is great discontent with the research assessment exercise—my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North conducted a very good inquiry into that issue when he was chair of the Science and Technology Committee—but if we get it wrong it would upset the whole of our research effort in British higher education. We have so much to be proud of in terms of the investment that the Government have put into it over the past few years, so the message is that we are very encouraged and we could return to being the top spender on research. Let us just make sure that the Chancellor's currency is good tender at the local banks.

7.21 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): I want to focus not so much on education but on the Chancellor and his Budget as a whole. While not quite a personal manifesto for his leadership campaign, his Budget speech gave us a vision of what Britain would be like under his premiership. He told us what he thinks about the key challenges that Britain will face in the coming years, and we now know exactly what to expect from his Government, with an emphasis, above all, on extending the power of central Government that he will control. I came away from the House after his speech with a feeling of alarm about Britain's ability to deal with the key challenges of this new century and about our long-term prospects as a major economic power.

The Chancellor's strategy for this country appears to have been devised as though Britain were still in the 1970s and still competing with a handful of high-cost west European powers. We need to be clear about this: Britain is entering a period of unparalleled global change and competition. The Government, and especially the Chancellor, like to refer to global opportunities. That is right: the rapid economic development of places such as China does offer unparalleled opportunities for Britain. But those opportunities will become threats if the Government continue to ignore the way in which the rest of the world is developing.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) has just celebrated the ever-rising level of public expenditure. I should like to explain how that might not be the answer. We have grown used to facing competition from low-cost countries in lower-skill industries, but we shall increasingly find ourselves challenged right across the board as emerging economies begin to produce highly skilled, highly educated, cheap-to-employ graduates. There will be an increasing number of attractive alternative destinations for major business investment, and a country with an uncompetitive economy, and with high taxes and regulation, will lose out. Soon, Britain's problems will shift from retaining low-tech manufacturing to retaining high-tech manufacturing and even financial services and research and development centres. Britain needs to focus above all on ensuring that our economy remains competitive by keeping costs down and on ensuring that our education system is producing intelligent, highly skilled young people who will be able to compete with the brightest and best that other countries are producing.

Unfortunately, the Budget speech does nothing to address these issues, despite its rhetoric. Reference to 4 million overseas graduates being invited here to be educated does not address the fundamental problems that our economy faces. For a start, the Chancellor has made no commitment to reducing the British tax burden in either the short term or the long term. Instead, he proposes to increase tax again. Indeed, he boasts about the fact. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) pointed out on Budget day, we are therefore still on course for having the highest ever tax burden in Britain, overtaking the tax burden of low-growth Germany. Predictably, the Chancellor has also ignored the direct pleas of the main business organisations to reduce corporation tax. There is a clear trend elsewhere in the world to reduce corporation tax, but that requirement does not appear to trouble him at all.

It is bizarre to believe that we can compete against the rising economic powers in Asia with our current taxation system when it is obvious that we cannot. It is all very well to take credit for the rise in gross domestic product per head, relative to other countries, but that is in the past. We must look to the future. Britain is beginning to fall down the league tables of international competitiveness from which the Prime Minister used to quote so regularly when he was Leader of the Opposition. According to the Economist Intelligence Unit, Britain has fallen from second to eighth in the global competitiveness rankings since the Chancellor took control of the economy in 1997.

The Chancellor's strategy will fail. Every year, Britain will continue to become less competitive, and he will delay taking the decisions necessary to meet the challenges of this new century. Of course economic stability comes first, but we have to reduce the tax burden as a proportion of national income so that Britain can once again become the most attractive place for business investment.

The Chancellor seems to think that, however much he raises taxes, it has no impact on incentives, on the health of the economy or on competitiveness. That is wrong, and we should not make the same mistake as the Government by assuming that we can reduce taxes only by the amount that we cut spending. That is the myth peddled by the Government; it is not true. In Ireland, for example, taxes have been reduced, yet tax revenues have increased. Let me quote the EU Commissioner for the Internal Market and Services, Charlie McCreevy, who used to be Ireland's Finance Minister:

> "Back in the late 1990s when, as Ireland's Minister of Finance, I started cutting taxes, many people feared that the loss of revenue to the Exchequer would be massive and that the policy would have to be abandoned. But the opposite happened. Far from the policy causing an erosion of the Exchequer's revenue stream, reduced tax rates generated higher economic activity, greater taxpayer compliance and a surge in the tax take for the Exchequer."

That is the policy that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench will be pursuing and why, under a Conservative Government, we will spend more on the public services than a Labour Government will ever be able to afford.

We can begin to reduce our tax burden very quickly by significantly cutting down on waste rather than on front-line services. Everyone knows that the Government are mired in waste. No doubt the Chancellor will claim that the Gershon review will reduce waste and improve efficiency—it has certainly confirmed that the waste is there. But it is becoming more and more obvious that the review, with its limited ambitions, is a public relations stunt created so that the Government could pretend to be doing something about waste and declining public sector productivity, when in reality they are doing nothing at all.

The amount of regulation on business needs to be drastically reduced, including the vast amount of regulation that pours out of the European Union, which the Government seem to do virtually nothing to halt. Indeed, the notorious Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill would give the Government unprecedented powers to overturn or repeal any Act of Parliament that affects domestic legislation, but it would do nothing to address the problem of EU regulation, which the Chancellor himself says accounts for more than 50 per cent. of the regulatory burden on business.

It is right to put improving education at the heart of any economic strategy, but simply throwing money at the problem, which might earn the Chancellor cheers on Budget day, will not sort it out. We need meaningful reform of the system so that pupils leave school with a proper grasp of maths, science and English, which they need for the modern world. Free A-levels up to the age of 25 is all very well, but a mere drop in the ocean when it comes to the UK's real competitiveness. Over time, it will become increasingly evident that the Government's strategy will not be sufficient to deal with the challenges of the 21st century.

Are we facing an immediate economic disaster? I doubt that there will be a single devastating event that highlights the Government's mistakes, but we will see, and are seeing, a long, steady period of eroded competitiveness and relative decline. The Chancellor readily quotes our growth performance against slow-growth countries such as France and Germany. But what about Portugal, Ireland, New Zealand, Canada, Australia and the United States? All those countries have mature economies, like ours, which are performing much better than ours. We should be competing effectively against them, but we are not doing so. We will simply not be able to carry a tax and regulatory burden that makes it difficult to do business here, and a dysfunctional education system that cannot produce enough well-educated and capable school leavers.

John Bercow: If the Government believe, as they claim, that selection within schools through grouping and setting can be a spur to improved economic performance, why are Ministers not prepared to invest some political capital into the process by issuing proper guidance?

Mr. Jenkin: We know why. This Government are paralysed by their internal splits and needed the votes of Conservative MPs to secure a majority to get their Education and Inspections Bill through.

We know the scale of competition that we will face in coming decades. The Chancellor pretends that he knows. People should be increasingly alarmed by the prospect, for years to come, of this Government implementing the sort of policies that are in the Budget, which fail to tackle the problems that need to be addressed.

7.32 pm

Mr. Stephen Byers (North Tyneside) (Lab): I draw the House's attention to my declaration in the Register of Members' Interests.

The Chancellor's statement last week demonstrated the extent to which economic stability has now been embedded in our country, in stark contrast to the situation that constituents such as mine witnessed in the 1980s and early 1990s. From that position of economic strength, we can plan ahead with confidence for the challenges that this country faces—and we face several new challenges. I want to deal with the pensions challenge, which will need to be considered in the near future. In my view, it is perhaps the biggest challenge that we face as a country. Two distinct but linked issues must be considered. First, how can we come up with a set of proposals that will offer security and dignity for today's pensioners; and, secondly, how can we construct a new regime that is fair, affordable and sustainable for the pensioners of the future?

The Government already have a good record with regard to pensioners. When we came into office in 1997, we were acutely aware of the way in which pensioners had been let down by the Conservative Government. In 1997, one in four pensioners—2.8 million—were in poverty. It was therefore right that a top priority for an incoming Labour Government had to be how to get money quickly to those pensioners to lift them out of poverty. We used the minimum income guarantee and, more recently, the pension credit to target resources and ensure that those pensioners were taken out of poverty. We were successful. As a result of those policies, nearly 2 million pensioners have been lifted out of poverty.

Of course, all pensioners benefit from and welcome some of the universal provision that we have exceptionally made available—free television licences for the over-75s and the winter fuel payment, well regarded by pensioners throughout the country—[Interruption.] I will come to the council tax rebate in a minute. The challenge now is to achieve a national consensus on the way forward for tomorrow's pensioners and, at the same time, to give today's pensioners the security that they deserve, which, in my view, this Government should continue to deliver. Affordability and sustainability must be at the heart of our consideration.

We must also be aware, however, that because of the way in which pensions policy has developed, with which I agree, and because the benefits that we provide are means-tested, a large amount of money is unclaimed by pensioners—money to which they are entitled and which the Government have allocated for pensions. The Department for Work and Pensions produces a useful example of the levels of take-up across a range of income-related benefits. The latest figures relate to 2003–04. I want to take the lowest estimate of unclaimed benefits—some estimates would be even higher. A minimum of 210,000 pensioners do not claim housing benefit to which they are entitled, which amounts to some £310 million. A minimum of 1,600,000 pensioners who are entitled to council tax benefit do not claim it, which means that at least £870 million of council tax benefit is unclaimed by pensioners. On the lowest estimate, 1,200,000 pensioners do not claim pension credit and the minimum income guarantee, which amounts to £1.6 billion.

That is money that the Government have put aside for pensioners. If we take those three benefits together, £2.8 billion is unclaimed by pensioners. In terms of affordability, that money could be made available to pensioners. The total cost of the £200 council tax rebate is £800 million, and we should use some of the unclaimed money to support a continuation of that rebate for pensioners.

Mr. Jenkin: I am listening carefully to the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I question whether the Chancellor does not budget for a shortfall in the number of claimants of means-tested benefits. However, has not the right hon. Gentleman made the strongest arguments possible against the continued extension of means-testing, for which his Government have been responsible, and in favour of the application of universal benefits for pensioners, which they very much prefer?

Mr. Byers: That relates to what will be my next point, on a fair deal for the pensioners of tomorrow.

We must do all that we can to make sure that pensioners claim unclaimed benefits. We all know the nature of pensioners, however—they are reluctant to go through a means-tested process, so those sums are unavailable to them. If we can make them available for universal provision—of which the £200 rebate is a good example—we should do so. However, almost £2.8 billion is unclaimed, so we should also consider those pensioners aged over 75, many of them women, who do not get the basic state pension. We all know that the age group with which we are concerned will have been at home and will not have paid their national insurance contributions—the pensioners in poverty today. If we can extend universal provision to them, at a net cost of £1.4 billion, we will tackle what is left of pensioner poverty in our country. We can do both of those within the amount of money unclaimed at present.

I accept that there is real concern about the nature of means-tested provisions. I approve of the approach that we have adopted since 1997, which ensures that money goes quickly into the pockets of pensioners in greatest need. However, it was never a long-term solution to the problem of establishing a fair pensions regime. Some of my friends here will be surprised to hear that I agree with Brendan Barber, general secretary of the Trades Union Congress, who said:

"You cannot build a long-term pensions system on mass means-testing of pensioners".

I do not think that, when we come to consider a new regime for pensions, we can continue as we have since 1997. There cannot be minor adjustments to the present regime, or incremental change. We need to think fundamentally about the sort of pensions system that we want for the future.

I think that the tests set out by the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions are the right ones. Does the new system promote personal responsibility? Will it be fair? Is it affordable? Is it simple? Is it sustainable? I believe that, along with the recommendations of the Turner commission, those tests strike the right balance between the respective responsibilities of the Government, employers and employees. That is why I approve of the package produced by Adair Turner.

I hope that when the Government produce their White Paper, they will be prepared to embrace the thrust of Turner's recommendations. In my view, the Turner report provides the blueprint—the package of measures that can deliver fairness and justice for pensioners long into the future, which is what we should be seeking.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Byers: I will give way only once, to my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love).

Mr. Love: One of the issues sidestepped by the Turner commission was that of the subsidy given to pensions, which is concentrated massively at the top of the pension range. Has my right hon. Friend any view on how it could be redistributed to help those in need?

Mr. Byers: I take my hon. Friend's point, and I have some sympathy with it. I hope that the Government will not duck that issue, among others, when the White Paper is published. I hope that they will take it on and that when we talk about a fair and just system for the future that is affordable and sustainable, they will consider issues such as tax relief. That is one way in which we can secure a system that is grounded in fairness, which is what we must try to achieve.

I raised this subject today because I believe that the Labour party, in particular, cannot compromise on its duty to pensioners. We owe them a responsibility—a responsibility grounded in the traditional values of the Labour party. The Labour party is about ensuring, and recognising, that we can achieve far more when we act together than we ever can as individuals. Pensions present a good example of the way in which the people of today who create the wealth should look after those who, in years gone by, have provided for our country in good as well as more difficult times. It is for the Labour party to repay its debts, and I believe that a pensions policy based on the thrust of the Turner proposals represents a very positive solution.

Let me make a final comment on the Budget. I was delighted that the Chancellor reaffirmed the commitment to the eradication of child poverty by 2020, and the commitment to halve the number of young people in poverty by 2010–11. He proposed increases in child benefit and more help to get single parents into work, lifting another 300,000 children out of poverty. That will make an important contribution, but we need to do more. We can build on that proposal, but the important message of the proposal and, indeed, the Budget is that we cannot have a strong economy if we have a weak and divided society.

This Budget and this Government are committed to social justice and wealth creation working alongside each other. Long may that continue.

7.45 pm

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers), just as I followed him around India a few weeks ago. I found rather more in his speech than I expected with which to agree, although I did not think much of his opening remarks. He knows as well as I do that the stability we now enjoy is a product of the hard-won supply-side reforms of the 1980s and the economic policies of the early 1990s, and that the pensions crisis of which he rightly spoke is entirely the making of the present Government.

I want to discuss two themes that are central to the Budget, education and international competitiveness. They are linked by the key theme of the skills that we need to make the United Kingdom fit for purpose in the 21st century. I will not succeed in saying all that I hoped to say in 10 minutes, but I have been helped by two excellent speeches—by the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), who spoke of the skills issues that face our country, and my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), who spoke of the challenges of globalisation and the response that we should make.

I wish to make three key points, the first of which is local. Worcestershire schools suffer monstrous discrimination, and the Budget does nothing to change that. The second is national. As the hon. Member for Brent, East said, the Chancellor was right to emphasise the importance of skills and education, but I doubt that his approach is radical enough to rise to the challenge. The third is international, and relates to what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex. The country has not yet woken up to the challenge of globalisation and, I fear, is sleepwalking complacently towards mediocrity.

My conclusion is that the Budget does some sensible things and many foolish ones, such as introducing retrospection in inheritance tax rules and causing massive inconvenience by bringing forward the date for completion of income tax self-assessment forms. It simply does not match the scale of what is happening in the wider world: as I have said, it is a Budget for mediocrity, not excellence. It is a Budget of councils, reviews, consultations and even national debates, but not of the action that we need in order to take on the world.

Why is that? The Chancellor fails the test of the greatness to which he aspires because he is a compulsive meddler. He also thinks that he knows how to spend our money better than we do. His dogmatic insistence that the growing levels of public spending—or investment, as he mischievously describes it to make it sound even more virtuous—are compatible with our country's international competitiveness is simply wrong. We should be sharing the proceeds of growth between increased spending on public services and tax reductions, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition rightly proposes.

I am afraid that, for all his fine phrases, the Chancellor is not a big-picture man. He is a micro-manager, and micro-management often makes life very difficult for business. It sometimes brings disaster in its wake for enterprising companies. Let us look at what the Chancellor has done to Evesham Technology in my constituency. There is a long letter on his desk—I hoped to quote it at length, but I have not enough time—from the finance director. In his persuasive letter, he says that the home computing initiative

"relies on this exemption"

—from income tax—

"launched a mere 27 months ago in a blaze of publicity by Patricia Hewitt."

It has gone.

"It took from January until June 2004 for the model"

—for delivery of the system—

"to take shape with the creation of HCI compliant documentation, marketing materials, web sites, order entry portals etc and the first real revenues . . . did not start flowing until July 2004.

In May 2005, due to the changes in the Consumer Credit Act, the documentation had to be redrafted and further legal costs incurred."

The scheme was successful, however, so Evesham Technology

"invested over £100,000 in new printing equipment . . . £50,000 in display equipment" to demonstrate it, but both investments are worthless today.

The tragedy is that the company was "in the final stages of implementing a new manufacturing line to assemble LCD monitors in the UK. That investment and the jobs it would have created is now extremely unlikely to happen."

The Chancellor's micro-management is to blame—constant, endless tinkering with the tax system, instead of the stability that we crave.

My other local point relates to education. I am a reasonable man and I freely admit that school spending has risen sharply under this Government. Capital investment is higher that it was in 1997—owing, of course, to the golden economic inheritance of this Government, which I hoped would have provided a Conservative Government with the same ability to increase expenditure on education. I welcome what has happened, but I do not welcome the way in which Worcestershire pupils are being left behind in spending per pupil. I complained about that under Conservative Governments in the past, but it has become worse under this Government. In 1997, the cash gap between funding per pupil in Worcestershire and the national average was £150; now, it is more than £400, and it is a whopping £840 in the case of neighbouring Birmingham.

Given that the new Secretary of State for Education and Skills was educated in Worcestershire and that the Minister for Schools is a Worcestershire MP, I thought that things might get better, but I was wrong. Their plan for the next two years is for Worcestershire again to have below-average increases in funding per pupil, thereby making a difficult situation worse. What is more, if I have read the Red Book correctly, propositions for the distribution of funding as listed in paragraph 6.58 mean that local education authorities that already get high funding levels will get still higher ones.

I have wondered why that should be so. Why should this discrimination against my county continue? I thought that perhaps those in London just did not understand the scale of urban and rural deprivation in my county. Perhaps they view it as some rural paradise where affluent upper-middle-class parents send their children to fine private schools and live in large mansions and farmhouses, far from the gritty reality of urban Britain. Perhaps they do not understand the level of poverty and deprivation in Redditch, Worcester, Wyre Forest and, yes, in my constituency of Mid-Worcestershire. How else can we explain the bewildering paradox whereby we are considered too rich to get a decent amount of cash for our kids, and too poor to qualify for the area cost adjustment?

My suspicions were confirmed in a dramatic way by a presentation only two weeks ago, by Dugald Sanderman, joint head of school and LEA funding for the F40 group of local authorities. He chose to illustrate their funding needs through a picture of a large house in leafy Evesham—ironically, it is, I think, lived in by a Labour supporter—set against a background of tower blocks. In another picture, taken from a marketing brochure for the market towns of Worcestershire, the lovely sights of my constituency, which I invite every Member to come and see, are set against a bleak urban landscape. It took me just a few seconds on the internet this morning to find a house in Birmingham that would have served just as well as a counterbalance to that urban shot. It has six bedrooms, four bathrooms, four reception rooms, a reception hall with library, a gallery landing with seating area and a heated swimming pool, and is selling for £1.4 million.

[Peter Luff]

That was the most dishonest presentation of the reasons for education funding distribution that I have ever seen. Dr. Goebbels would have been proud of it, and Dugald Sanderman should hang his head in shame for making such misleading presentations. It was of course Goebbels who said that if one tells a lie big enough and keeps repeating it, people will eventually come to believe it. I will not let this lie gain any ground. It must be squashed. We need a fairer deal and I hope that it will be forthcoming.

The hon. Member for Brent, East spoke well on national skills and I share her concern. I shall restrict my remarks to one simple point. Lord Leitch said at the time of his interim report:

"The scale of the challenge is daunting. Delivering current plans will be difficult. Even then, it will not be enough to supply the skills that employers, employees and our nation need in order to advance. The UK must become world class on skills—for all of our sakes."

Mr. Love: One great concern about skills training is where the funding will come from for a major expansion. If we look at who funds, and who benefits from, skills training, we see that employers are at the top of the agenda. Does the hon. Gentleman support the view that employers must make a greater contribution to skills training?

Peter Luff: I have come to the reluctant conclusion that co-funding of many aspects of our education system will become the norm, so the hon. Gentleman makes an important point. I do, however, favour a radical reform of the higher education and further education sectors—I hoped to have time to explain it tonight, but sadly, it is denied me—that would achieve both savings and better outcomes.

On international competitiveness, as I hinted, the Trade and Industry Committee recently visited India and examined trade and investment relations between our two countries, which are simply not good enough. Despite our strong historical link with India, we are losing ground. We will produce a report on this issue in May. India is but one of two large economies and a whole host of smaller ones that are lifting themselves out of poverty and on to the world economic stage. Our children will grow up in a world with three economic superpowers: the USA, China and India. Europe, never mind the UK, will be in fourth place at best.

Britain faces many urgent challenges if it is to address that threat, but if we are to maintain the prosperity that we are in danger of taking for granted, we need to do five things. We have talked about them endlessly, and the sheer repetition and tedium of doing so means that we might lose sight of their urgency. We have discussed the skills base, and our creaking infrastructure is taken for granted as being a problem; our regulatory burden, however, is not. The Chancellor keeps talking about his intentions—he did it again in this Budget. In its audit of the Chancellor's previous nine Budgets, the London chamber of commerce says that he pledged to cut red tape on 25 separate occasions, but that over the same period 27,569 new laws have been passed, averaging 9,216 pages of regulation a year.

Mr. Byers: I want, if I may, to take the hon. Gentleman back to the subject of India, about which I thought he was going to speak for slightly longer. Does he agree that there is great merit in UK universities establishing business schools that focus on India? We lack such schools, and the Indian high commissioner is a great advocate of such an approach. I should be interested to know whether the hon. Gentleman, as Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee, feels that there is merit in that idea.

Peter Luff: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that intervention and I am happy to agree with him yet again. We will be taking an additional evidence session from the higher education sector after Easter to explore precisely that point and others. We believe that that is one of the major missed tricks in our relationship with India in terms of offering India services, bringing Indian students to the UK and the whole gamut of such issues. The Government have been timid in their approach and a lot more could be done. For example, given that Indian students who come to Scotland can stay for two years and earn money to pay for their fees, why is it that they cannot stay in England at all? True, the right to stay is being extended to one year; however, why is there one immigration law for Scotland and another for England? Such issues need to be addressed to ensure that links between India and the UK are improved dramatically. I entirely agree with the right hon. Member for North Tyneside in that regard. I wanted to say a lot more about the HE sector, but time is against me.

The other issues that we need to address in facing the challenges presented by India and China include productivity, research and development, innovation and taxation. My hon. Friend the Member for North Essex was right to talk about taxation. This Budget marks the doubling in size since 1997 of the published tax code—from some 4,500 pages to approximately 9,000. Of course, that is on top of the growing burden of business taxation. The thresholds for corporation tax are unchanged; they have not even been uprated for inflation. Fiscal drag, one of the Chancellor's favourite stealth taxes, will increase the overall cost of doing business in the UK—at precisely the time when our major competitors are cutting their tax burdens.

So our skills are too low, our infrastructure is inadequate, our regulatory burden is too high, our productivity is inadequate and our taxes are excessive. One can see why the view that China and India compete with us only on price and that they are in some sense stealing our manufacturing jobs—or our call centre jobs—is a dangerous one for us to cling to. The challenge is far more profound than that. For example, twice as many engineering graduates leave Indian institutions of higher education every year as are employed in total in the Indian call centre sector. That is a real challenge that we have to face up to.

I hoped to say more about what I see as a declining work ethic in this country, welfare dependency, a client state, a lack of international enterprise and a failure of imagination on the part of our HE sector in respect of India, China and other economies, but there is not time. I summarise my views by quoting Jonathan Guthrie, who wrote the following in the Financial Times on 23 March:

"The Chancellor billed the Budget as a blow struck in the UK's battle to compete with such economic parvenus as China and India. But his rhetoric was undermined by a lack of measures to achieve this goal. Instead, Mr. Brown waffled on about loft insulation. The thought that British workers are increasingly snug during the winter cannot be causing too much panic among the tycoons of Shenzhen and Bangalore."

7.58 pm

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to today's Budget debate. Clearly, today's theme has been education, but the Budget's overall theme has been how we cope with rapidly changing world circumstances.

I welcome the particular emphasis this year on climate change and the strong indication that this policy area will be further developed over the coming weeks and months. A number of Members have already urged the Chancellor to go further, and I agree with many of their sentiments. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) pointed out last week in a thoughtful and well-argued contribution, it is also necessary to reach as far as possible a general consensus both inside and outside this place on how we are going to make the necessary changes.

A recent poll about people's perceptions of climate change, carried out by the University of East Anglia, showed that a very large percentage of people—more than 90 per cent.—recognised that climate change was a major problem. But when asked who should deal with it, most pointed to multilateral institutions and to their own Government, rather than to action on the part of individuals. However, we know that we can make significant progress in reducing energy demand and, in turn, carbon emissions if we can greatly increase domestic energy efficiency and change entrenched daily habits such as the so-called school run.

Our Government clearly have a role to play in moving energy efficiency forward, not only by setting better standards in building regulations, as was done in the Budget, and providing lower tax rates for more energy efficient technology, but also at times by encouraging a different mindset in our citizens. I am reminded of the long, often fractious debate about smoking in public places. I observed the implementation of the ban in Scotland just yesterday; there was surprisingly little fuss and already a growing perception that the vast majority of the population, including the majority of smokers, now see the ban as a necessary step to better health for the country as a whole.

We need to expand the debate on climate change to all sections of our community, but we also need to accept that it will include making tough decisions, which is why I welcome the indexing proposals for the climate change levy. I hope that the Government will feel able to go much further both on vehicle taxation, especially as the relative cost of driving has gone down in recent years, and on aviation.

In the longer term, we need to consider a much larger expansion of congestion charging and investing more in the Cinderella of public transport—no, not cycling but buses. I am delighted that the national bus scheme for the elderly and disabled will be extended to England. As Members are aware, Scotland will start its scheme next month, although I hope we can manage to make sure that if senior citizens want to travel between Gretna Green and Carlisle, that will be included in the scheme. We already enjoy a free scheme throughout the whole of Strathclyde, which has made a tremendous difference to the quality of life for many of our senior citizens. Some ingenious journeys have been undertaken. I heard last week that two ladies from Kilmacolm in West Renfrewshire regularly take a bus via Glasgow to Campbeltown to buy fresh fish—a journey of more than 200 miles.

On a more serious note, greater use of buses by one section of our community will help to change the mindset about that mode of transport and will, I hope, also encourage younger generations to see its benefits for their daily journeys. I impress on the Government, however, that both in Whitehall and in the Scottish Executive we need to tackle the continuing problems caused by the deregulation of bus services, so that services are seen to be regular and reliable at all times of the day and night, to encourage greater use.

I welcome the continued support for microgeneration. We need to show long-term support for that industry if its market share is to grow to the extent that it becomes part of our everyday choice in providing energy for our local communities. Unfortunately, as I found recently, it is still difficult to purchase the right type of energy-efficient light bulb. If anyone has managed to buy the equivalent of a 100 W bayonet bulb, they are doing well because those bulbs are certainly not to be found in most shops.

We should be looking more widely at the construction of major developments. We need to reach a point where they create an energy demand on our national network as near zero as possible. There are some good examples that we can follow from this country and around the world, and we need to ensure that such provisions are fully integrated in our planning and building proposals. Today we heard the good news that wind turbines are being installed faster than predicted, which shows a real interest and keenness to pursue that market.

My second point relates to globalisation, which has already been broached by the hon. Members for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) and for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin). Our economy is heavily dependent on world trade, particularly in our services sector, so any rise in protectionist sentiments is clearly of concern. Symptoms of the problem are already evident in the current World Trade Organisation negotiations, which at best will achieve a much narrower set of agreements than was originally hoped. The underlying problem is a growing disconnection on a global scale between growth and employment creation rates. The UK's main strength over the last eight years has been to focus our principal priority on creating more jobs, but that picture has not been replicated elsewhere.

Various speakers have mentioned the growing markets in China and India, but although the Chinese economy continues to grow at 9 per cent. a year, the country has not reduced its national poverty levels since 2000. Despite the explosion of its export market throughout the world over the last five years, the number of its people employed in manufacturing has reduced, so I suggest to Opposition Members that the Chinese may have to focus quickly on an increase in taxation and the creation of a vibrant and strong public sector if they are to deal with the vast number of urban unemployed that will face them in the next few years.

The consequences will undoubtedly affect us all, which is why it is crucial that at international level, whether through the EU, the International Monetary Fund or the World Bank, we consider how to align labour policies more closely with developments in trade, and ensure that we have the ability to react quickly to rapid change. That is why the specific measures announced on extending research and development support to medium-sized enterprises and the strong emphasis on supporting science at all levels is so crucial.

A number of those measures are specific to England, but the move to enable pupils to study three sciences at GCSE is sensible. There is growing concern about the small number of undergraduate students choosing science, and we need to reverse that trend. Last Friday I had the pleasure of opening new X-ray labs in the chemistry department of Glasgow university, and when I discussed that issue with the staff they said that they had no problem in recruiting students. The key to that was the fact that their four-year course allows students to specialise after their first year at university. The world of university science is very different from that of the school, and choices can be made better when students are following their university course.

Glasgow offers a good example of universities working together. Under the Westchem initiative, Glasgow and Strathclyde universities share their resources and offer a joint service to the private sector, ranging from BP to local small and medium-sized enterprises. As was pointed out earlier, there has been a considerable increase in investment, with new cutting-edge equipment that allows enterprises to compete at a global level. We need to make sure that such initiatives are expanded throughout the UK.

As the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) said, the Government have made radical proposals for university research funding—the new health research fund and changes to the research councils—and I would be grateful if my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary stated how the Government intend to consult the devolved authorities when working through those plans, to co-ordinate policy throughout the whole UK.

I commend steps to increase training for those with no or low skills. If we are to remain a competitive economy we need to ensure that everybody has the opportunity to move out of low-paid work. That relates particularly to women, who represent the vast majority of those in low-paid work. The equality agenda is also a prosperity agenda for this country, and I commend the Budget.

8.7 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Glasgow, North (Ann McKechin), who made a number of telling points, picking up on the equally telling points made by my hon. Friends about globalisation and the dangers of protectionism, which is rising greatly in some parts of the European Union—greatly to the disadvantage of the competitive position of Europe overall.

It was interesting that the latest edition of The Economist, which has generally been favourable to the Government, has the headline, "Gordon Brown's Do-Nothing Budget". An article in the magazine stated that > "there are worrying signs of deterioration . . . an unsustainable boom in consumption and the housing market . . . the economy toils under the growing burden of taxes and regulation that he has imposed".

I want particularly to deal with the latter point.

I think we would all agree that there is a certain imbalance in the structure of the British economy. The importance of the financial services industry has become utterly pre-eminent, as the decline in manufacturing and manufacturing employment has taken place in this country. The Chancellor has appointed a panel to look at the financial services industry—some great and good individuals who will meet somewhat infrequently—but our real concern, which we must really examine, must be that the burden of regulation does not become too oppressive in this country. Unlike manufacturing, which is difficult to move, it is much easier for the financial services industry to move to Shanghai, for example, to locate the headquarters of a bank. It is not only the tax regime that we have to worry about, but the regulatory burden.

In the past few years, a culture of regulatory self-protection has grown up in this country. Instead of appointing a panel, the Chancellor should have looked carefully at the functioning of regulation, especially across the economy and the vital financial services industry. There should be an additional, fundamental remit for the Financial Services Authority on competition and competitiveness. The FSA should have independent directors, principles-based direction and a moratorium on EU regulation, accompanied by mutual recognition of other regulatory systems.

The British Chambers of Commerce has expressed disappointment that the Chancellor did not produce specific targets across Departments for the reduction of regulation on business. After all, 2006 is meant to be the year of delivery for deregulation. The BCC argues that the cost of regulation has grown by some £50 billion since 1998. The Government have not sought an official measurement of the administrative cost of regulation imposed on business, which disproportionately affects small businesses. The obsessive micro-management that has become a characteristic of this Government is a beanfeast for lawyers and accountants.

It is worth remembering what the Labour manifesto said in 1997, which echoes the powerful point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) earlier:

> "The myth that the solution to every problem is increased spending has been comprehensively dispelled . . . More spending has brought neither greater fairness nor less poverty. Quite the reverse . . . The level of public spending is no longer the best measure of the effectiveness of Government action in the public interest . . . New Labour will be wise spenders not big spenders."

The irony of that manifesto commitment when set against this and recent Budgets cannot be lost on anybody.

The most extraordinary aspect of the Budget was that the Chancellor failed to mention the health service, which accounts for a huge part of the budget, even once. Indeed, the next day he was interviewed on the BBC, and when asked why he did not mention health, he said:

"I do not re-announce things in the Budget".

The Chancellor is not known for his sense of humour, but that is absolutely mesmerising. This Government are obsessed with re-announcing spending, and the Chancellor came into office double and treble-counting spending statistics. The truth is that health spending will rise by 2008 to some £94 billion out of £552 billion, yet there will be fewer beds in the NHS than there were in 1997, and despite that great spending, we have a massive spending crisis.

I do not wish to personalise any remarks directed at the Secretary of State for Health, who has an unenviable job because the NHS is a huge monolith controlled by Whitehall. However, as she has rattled out the endless statistics about the health service in the past few months, I have been reminded of Madam Ceaucescu announcing massive increases in potato production in Romania. The Secretary of State was interviewed yesterday on television, and said that the devastating cuts in employment in the NHS, the reductions in wards and beds and the hospital closures were all to do with improving patient care. It was like the Tsarina in pre-revolutionary Russia believing that everything was marvellous because the Potemkin villages had been put up—unrelated to any reality.

The truth is that the NHS has concentrations of real problems because of a funding formula that actively discriminates against parts of the country. In my constituency, for example, we have a per capita spend next year of £1,051. For the Prime Minister's constituency the figure is £1,442 and for that of the Secretary of State for Health it is £1,306. Even for that of the Secretary of State for Education and Skills it is £1,245. It is curious that all the spending has moved towards the urban parts of our country, especially the north. In the south we have devastation and cuts, with all the implications that flow from them.

Peter Luff: I am listening with rapt attention to my hon. Friend, but I would not like him to leave the House with the impression that only the south has a problem. The problem is rurality. I have done a lot of work on the health service funding formula, and it is clear that it discriminates against rural areas, wherever they are.

Mr. Spring: I accept that point, although I also recognise that the problem appears greater in the southern half of the country, even in areas of high population. That is exacerbated by the fact that the tremendous changes in the bureaucratic structures of the health service have played a huge part. If the Chancellor is to give out huge sums of money, they should be followed by changes in the organisation and structures of the health service.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman suggests that the problems are worse in the south. Will he admit that in the past southern health trusts have overspent and been bailed out by northern health trusts, but we never knew that until the reforms had effect?

Mr. Spring: I invite the hon. Lady to visit my constituency and see the devastating effect of ward closures and the threats to community hospitals on the demoralised and upset staff, who are voting with their feet. The successive changes to the formula have moved funding away, linked with a lack of recognition of the age profile in certain areas. Of course the huge increases in spending need to be monitored, and that too is ultimately the responsibility of the Chancellor.

One of our local papers recently had the headline, "Staff exodus in NHS feared". People are leaving the health service because they feel so anxious about their jobs. The chief executive of my local PCT wrote in a local paper the other day that the PCT was "fully aware" of staff being stressed. There is no point in rattling out vast sums of money without recognising the devastating impact of the effect of the spending formula. It is causing real distress, and I dare say the Chancellor recognises that, which is why he left out any comment on a situation that is making headlines all over the country. People are desperately concerned about it. It is the price we are paying for not reforming our public services. The tax burden has increased, but we are not getting value for money out of the huge increases in the spending of taxpayers' money that we have seen in the past few years.

In conclusion, I shall return to how The Economist sees matters. It states:

"Mr. Brown's reversion to tax-and-spend, together with the ever-rising burden of regulation, is starting to do increasing damage to work incentives and business interests. The price for past excess, both by consumers and by the chancellor, will be future slower growth. As the feel-good factor fades, the politics of plenty will give way to the politics of austerity."

We know about the declining competitiveness and productivity and the effect of micro-management, and all its consequences for the wealth of our country. The Economist concludes:

"The chancellor was fortunate to inherit a strong economy whose public finances were improving sharply. If Mr. Brown's inheritance as prime minister is a weakening economy and a chronic budget deficit, he will have only one person to blame: himself."

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): The Chancellor has obviously been spending his time at Cape Cod in Massachusetts to the benefit of this country by talking to people at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology about subjects such as innovation and the creation of new products and so on. He has brought that to this country in an interaction at Cambridge university with MIT, whereby young people can interplay between the two institutions on their courses, come up with new, bright ideas and show a way forward for international co-operation in research. Again, that is mirrored across the world, as we find that published papers on industrial and scientific matters include the names of people not just from one country, but sometimes from 12 countries.

A huge amount of interaction is going on. Academics are pretty good at knowing who is doing similar work, interacting with one another, deciding who is best at it and so on. I serve on a Department of Trade and Industry taskforce committee, and the Government are now considering which countries to interact with in different areas of scientific endeavour on everything from cancer research and health services to innovation and the development of various products.

[Dr. Ian Gibson]

The innovation agenda is not easy to carry out—it is a very complex process—and I want to concentrate partly on the education end of it. It is easy to have very bright young people making inventions, publishing information and getting it out into the world, but few countries have been able to turn what they find out into a product that is interesting and useful for society.

In this country, we talked for a long time about spin-out companies and we looked at those companies around Cambridge, Oxford, Newcastle, Manchester and Dundee. The figures show that this country has had more spin-out companies than anywhere else in the world in the past few years. There is no doubt about that, but the problem is that not one of them has turned into what we think of as a success: a big pharmaceutical company. Those companies are successes—they produce new products, such as vaccines and so on.

This may not be appetising to Opposition Members, but we should applaud the collaboration and interaction between this country and Cuba, which is developing various vaccines. There is now an attitude in this country, which has not been present for some time, that we should interact with those other economies to produce products not just for our own country, but for other countries as well. That is to be applauded, and the Government have been part of that approach.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North (Ann McKechin) said, we are doing something similar in the field of climate change, where new technologies are being developed—under pressure, of course, to bring down our CO_2 emissions, which is happening. Microgeneration and new homes with solar panels, as the Chancellor said, are very much part of understanding the science and technology engineering that is now available to improve the lot of not just our people, but people across the world.

All that is part of a magic paper produced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "Science and innovation investment framework 2004–2014: next steps", but it is not a blueprint. We are not saying that we will carry out a, b, c and d, right through to z. There are experimental areas where we can improve, but there is a recognition that has never been known before in my experience of politics in this country.

I spent my time as Chairman of the Select Committee on Science and Technology trying to find out who spoke on science and technology for the Opposition parties. I could never find anyone. They must recognise the problems associated with such issues, but the Government have recognised them for some time now and are putting more resources and effort into them.

Innovation is a complex process to undertake. One of the factors is a well-trained, highly motivated and well-funded scientific and technological work force in universities and in our science and technology-based companies, not just those in the pharmaceutical industry. All the issues that are involved in innovation could be described in their own right—that would take a long time—but I want to concentrate on one of them.

The hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) talked about universities that have very many bright young people who think not just about innovation. I applaud that fact; curiosity-driven, blue-skies research is absolutely essential in creating an environment that takes people into a high-calibre university structure. This country's science and technology infrastructure is at a very high level, and it will improve over the years with Budgets such as this one and other resources.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Gibson: I will not give way; I am bashing on.

When we talk about young people, the real problem comes from the research assessment exercise. Not only has that exercise made teaching less productive and something not to put as much effort into as publishing research papers and getting high grades and therefore the money, it has also effected the young people who are part of that process and employed on temporary contracts. I understand absolutely why young people do not want to go into science after university. They want to go into the City and elsewhere because there is no permanent career structure for them. I know that there is no permanent career structure for anyone—particularly, MPs, of course—but people are owed five to 10 years in a job to exploit and understand the areas in which they are interested.

Of course, the problem starts in our school system, where people are turned off science and do not want to study at our universities. I have talked about higher education, but this is also relevant in primary schools. Young people are interested in science; they are fascinated by it. They watch David Attenborough's programmes about the world. They want to go on field studies and see what the world is like. They want to talk about intelligent design—whatever that might mean—and compare it with Darwinism and so on. They want to talk about stem cells. There are many areas of fascination.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I am glad that my hon. Friend mentions those programmes, but does he agree that that the problem is that the BBC shows them so late at night, at a time when most children cannot stay up to watch them?

Dr. Gibson: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I would make watching those programmes compulsory in schools. The problem in schools is not a lack of interest among young people about science, climate change and so on. For example, there are a huge number of university forensic science courses. Forensic science is developing in our universities because of Amanda Burton on television. Everyone wants to be Amanda Burton, and there is no doubt about that when we see certain people in white coats who look much more glamorous than others.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend is making a powerful case about the potential of universities to do even more, but is he concerned, as I am, that it is more difficult for them to attract and retain high-quality lecturers? Attention needs to be given to university pay scales, certainly those of principal lecturers, because they have weakened considerably since I taught in higher education. We need to do something on that score, do we not?

Dr. Gibson: That is an absolute factor for many people, but many other people are in higher education not for the money, but for the fascination of finding out about the world, why things exist and where they came from. That excites young people, too, but they never get the chance to get their hands dirty doing practical work. Schools need high-flying lab facilities so that the teacher is not doing things for young people but young people are doing things for themselves. When young people find something out and want to find something else out and the teacher says, "You must carry on with what the curriculum tells you to do," that is nonsense. They should be allowed to develop and explore attitudes and phenomena for themselves. That is what is missing. The science and technology curriculum in British schools is rotten. That puts young people off, as well.

In that climate, is it any wonder, that teachers will be hard to get. Some of the students I taught used to say, "Oh well, I can't get on to a PhD, I can't do medicine, I'd better go and teach." We have got to change that attitude. One of the greatest things is for a person to be able to teach a class and inspire them. That is hard work and it may not be paid well, but, by gosh, when one meets students whom one has taught or young people whom one has gone into a school and helped—many people do that now—and one sees what they turn out like, it is wonderful. I even produced a Nobel prize winner. I do not know how. I must have said something interesting at one time, among all the mess and so on.

There is a real opportunity to be creative. I went to a dinner the other night with creative arts people. They were all making graphic designs all over the place—they were wonderful young people. I was furious because I want to go to a dinner where there are young scientists who are inventing things and getting rewarded for that with a free dinner and the odd glass of something.

We need to consider the regional development agencies. I am in a fantastic fight with one at the minute. Why is Norwich not a science city when there are six other such cities in the country where the scientific excellence is no better or worse than in Norwich? I will tell Members why: the person who runs the regional development agency in East Anglia was good at making crisps and is good at selling holiday homes, but knows absolutely nothing about science and how it can change the world for many people.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): In the few minutes that the hon. Gentleman has left, will he tell us why he thinks a smaller and smaller proportion of students are studying science and maths at A-level? That is causing a problem with the feed through to university courses and therefore a shortage of people to inspire a new generation. Will he also comment on the ratio of investment in science in universities? Often the investment levels do not allow universities to do the excellent work that he recommends.

Dr. Gibson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for those questions. That is absolutely true and that is why we have to put more investment in. More and more investment is going into schools for science. There are more labs being built. I think that £60 million has been spent during the past few years. The labs in private schools are excellent. There is plenty of money there. That is what we need. It is the same in universities, too: we need to put more money in and get more technicians and technologists, and not just high flying Nobel prize winners and so on. We have to change the whole ethos in our universities.

I finish on this note. Somebody said that nothing was being done on health. That is absolute nonsense. I have a copy of a document that is quite clear about health. It talks about creating a "world-class" environment for health research and development. It says that there will be a joint document and joined-up thinking in relation to the money for health and the Department of Trade and Industry. We are going to tackle health issues, including strokes and Alzheimer's. We are going to do the research and are going to be part of that world movement. There is a lot going on and the Government are part of that and are going to employ an independent person—a tsar—to make things happen. At last, we are going to have a joined-up health research and development budget.

8.32 pm

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): I do not want to pour cold water on that wonderful speech, but I might bring Members back down to earth ever so slightly. The Budget was based on a 2 per cent. inflation figure. I know that the retail prices index basket has to include a large number of items to come to an average inflation figure, but my constituents on low and modest wages are paying council taxes at twice that rate. The petrol that they are filling their cars up with to go to work has increased at four times that rate. They are paying gas and electricity bills that are rising at 10 times the official inflation rate. The figure of 2 per cent. bears little semblance to reality for them. For some of the heavy energy users—the businesses in my constituency, which have seen prices rise by 100 per cent. in the past year or so—a 2 per cent. inflation figure is something of a fantasy compared with the 25, 26 or 27 per cent. surcharges that they are having to put on the cost of goods as they leave the factory gate.

The Budget was very thin. The Royal Bank of Scotland described it as "Heavy on Light Measures". It also analysed it as a modest "give-away" of some £380 million in the forthcoming year, with a net tightening of £740 million over the course of the next three years. That means that the Chancellor took 61 minutes to announce an adjustment of perhaps 0.07 per cent. of total receipts. However, even that RBS analysis masks the multitude of minor micro-management adjustments that were announced and further disguises the many omissions from the Budget.

One key omission was the lack of any significant measure to encourage more investment at home. The differential between investment from the UK overseas and investment from overseas coming to the UK was some £21 billion last year. It seems extraordinary that £3.47 billion of UK money was invested in UK offshore islands and some £6.27 billion was invested in Bermuda. Perhaps the Chancellor's biggest omission was his failure to consider a way of closing that gap to stop that £10 billion or £11 billion being parked—sorry, invested—in Sark and Bermuda.

[Stewart Hosie]

We also note that the pre-Budget report increased the tax in the North sea by some 25 per cent. Last week's Budget was an opportunity to redress some of that and to encourage the exploitation of heavy oil, which sells at some $10 a barrel less than other oils, in the central North sea. It could also have encouraged the development of new resources west of Shetland and exploration in the very deep waters west of Scotland. However, the Chancellor chose not to do that. Instead, through changes to taxation on blended oils, he actually grabbed £200 million. If that £200 million had been invested rather than grabbed, the Government could have removed the supplementary charge from tariff contracts to encourage the development of the small fields that are required to use existing technology, levelled the playing field for new entrants by increasing the extent to which unrelieved allowances are reimbursed, extended research and development tax credits to North sea activities, encouraged investment in heavy oil extraction and introduced a floor of $30 a barrel below which the supplementary charge would not apply. However, the Chancellor took the £200 million instead, and thus set back exploration and development and, potentially, threatened jobs.

Michael Connarty: As the secretary of the all-party offshore oil and gas industry group, I have to challenge the hon. Gentleman's assertions. The United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association made none of those points in recent meetings, but pointed out that this was a bumper year for profits for all people in the North sea. Of course it would like to have the money, but it is strange that the hon. Gentleman is pleading for the private companies. People would say that, when those companies make such a profit, they deserve to spend a little £200 million for public services.

Stewart Hosie: I am not a defender of big oil. I am here to defend jobs and future exploration. During my recent meeting with UKOOA, it made much the same point, but went on to say that some delay in exploration and development will occur as a result of the taxation that is being levied. I am happy to compare my meeting with UKOOA with the hon. Gentleman's at a later date.

Having made my points about oil, I acknowledge that there were things to welcome in the Budget, not least the joint study with Norway on carbon capture. As I have said previously, that will commence with emissions from power stations to utilise some of the 750 gigatonnes of capacity in wells in the North sea. However, if the Government were serious about encouraging the use of more renewables in the fight against global warming and climate change, the Budget would have been the opportunity to address an imbalance in connection charges, which are the single biggest financial obstacle to efficient, large-scale, offshore wind production of electricity as part of the UK's energy supply. It is ludicrous that generators can be subsidised by £8.20 a kW in the south of England, yet perhaps charged £24.89 to connect to the grid in the north of Scotland. That problem must be addressed if we are seriously to examine the massive potential for offshore wind and help to tackle climate change and global warming.

I said at the outset that the Budget was predicated on an inflation rate of 2 per cent, but it also seemed to be predicated on the massive expansion of public-private partnership schemes. Although those schemes might seem attractive to the Government right now in accounting terms, if they are anything like the scheme for the royal infirmary of Edinburgh, under which a building with a capital value of £184 million will end up costing the taxpayer £1.26 billion, I suspect that they will be far from cost-effective in the long run. Indeed, such schemes might burden future generations of taxpayers with a massive debt.

A Budget that is predicated on the expansion of such PPP schemes, in addition to selling off some £30 billion of assets, five-year borrowings of £175 billion and a 5 per cent. cut in departmental spending, is fraught with danger. It is doubly fraught if it is based on a 2007 growth forecast of between 2.75 and 3.25 per cent because the low end of that range is higher than the industry consensus. If the Government's forecasts on growth and the tax take are wrong—we know that they were last year—the economy could well be on a knife edge. We would be mortgaged to the hilt and massively in debt, with the family silver sold off. With spending forecast to rise by £25 billion, £26 billion, or £27 billion every year until 2010–11, public sector debt forecast to rise year on year to £610 billion by 2010–11 and the treaty debt calculation due to rise year on year to £700 billion by 2010–11, there will be no room to manoeuvre if any of the calculations are wrong. No amount of changing economic cycles or fiddling golden rules will hide that.

We welcome the announcement that the Office for National Statistics is to be made fully independent, but are slightly intrigued, given that the Chancellor, speaking to the Select Committee on the Treasury last March, denied that it was not fully independent in the first place. Indeed, he railed against the "unfortunate allegation" that the ONS was not independent.

The ONS must be truly independent, not simply to ensure accurate, robust and reliable UK figures, but to ensure that it collects the correct data so that we can do a proper assessment of the Scottish, Welsh, Northern Irish and English regional economies as well. That is vital, especially for us in Scotland. We recently identified three things for which English-only spending was attributed to Scotland. The numbers were simply fiddled and the accounts looked wrong. Those three things were the moneys that went to inward investment for England, to the English Tourism Council and to the English Prison Service. It was right and proper that all that money was spent wholly in England, and right and proper that none of it was spent in Scotland. It was ludicrous, therefore, that some of it should have been calculated or assessed as unidentifiable and an allocation then awarded to Scotland for spending that did not take place.

There is a further reason why the ONS must be independent. The Department for Work and Pensions was asked to justify allocating £60 million of European structural funds expenditure to Scotland. It told us:

"The allocation within the limit Departmental Expenditure Limit ... over country and region ... is based on DWP staff numbers in those areas."

Every penny could have been spent in Scotland, or none. The truth is we do not know because the money was allocated on the basis of how many DWP staff were employed in the nations and regions of the UK.

We welcome moves to extend the research and development tax credits, but with UK R and D at 1.1 per cent. of GDP, it will do little to redress the balance against Japan, Germany and the US, with figures over 2.5 per cent., and nothing to redress the balance against Denmark, Sweden and Finland, which sit at 2.6, 3.9 and 3.5 per cent. of GDP respectively.

We also note with dismay that council tax assistance for pensioners has been removed this year and are shocked, once again, that the link between pensions and earnings has not been restored. I noted that the right hon. Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers), in his leadership speech, mentioned moving towards a fairer citizens pension, and I agreed with much of what he said about that.

I also noted in the Chancellor's Scottish press release mention of 400 civil service jobs being relocated to Scotland. I recently asked every Department how many jobs had been relocated to Scotland in the past five years. The answer was 94. I am not sure where the round number of 400 came from. Perhaps he used the same rigorous analysis as he did to calculate the Gershon savings.

It is also disappointing that there was little mention of manufacturing. Some 100,000 Scottish manufacturing jobs have gone since Labour came to power. As the Government know, manufacturing production in Scotland has shrunk for three full quarters. There is a full-blown manufacturing recession. It is disappointing that they have not chosen to debate that and disappointing that a solution was not mentioned in the Budget or its documentation.

Finally, in terms of Scotland, because mention of it was thin on the ground, there is £87 million in Barnett consequentials. That is £15 a head over two years. In a year when the Government are taking £2,000 a head out of the North sea, it seems a poor deal indeed.

8.43 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): It has been interesting to listen to the tone of the debate, but at least we are talking about resources. If we go back pre-1997, as some Conservative Members did, I remember that we were talking about high interest rates and hospital closures. The Government have been attacked on their handling of the NHS, but do hon. Members remember people sleeping on trolleys because they could not get beds? That is the Tory record that the Conservatives want to inflict on us if they ever get into power again. The House will no doubt remember the 3 million to 4 million unemployed. Many of those were young people.

The Government have pumped significant resources into education—a subject that we have discussed a great deal tonight—and the NHS. However, while I accept that they have pumped a lot of money into research and development and skills, they are still not doing enough, as has emerged in tonight's debate. The west midlands economy, for example, has a turnover of £77 million, which suggests what can be generated in a region that I have always considered to be the country's economic powerhouse. The midlands must keep an eye on investment, whether in research and development or in skills, on which tonight's debate has centred.

It could be argued that the west midlands is starting to swing away from manufacturing into service industries, but the region's MPs must make sure that there is proper investment in skills and manufacturing so that we can bolster manufacturing. As the House probably knows, Peugeot has still not made a declaration about the Coventry plant. I do not want to be alarmist, but people in Coventry want to know what is going on. I accept, however, that Ministers have taken part in discussions with the company about future investment. We should not forget the problems with Rover in the past few years, including recent problems in Coventry when some Jaguar operations moved from the city to other parts of the west midlands. We have not lost jobs overall in the west midlands, but we did lose jobs from the home of the Jag. Only two or three days ago, however, Ford announced more investment in research and development operations at Whitley, where 2,000 to 3,000 jobs will be created. Overall, Coventry has received about £4 billion in investment in the past few years, which says a lot about the Government, who have been accused of burdening business with red tape by some people.

I welcome the fact that free travel for pensioners is to be extended following a campaign that has lasted many years.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): While the Government's proposal to extend free travel for pensioners is welcome, does my hon. Friend not think that we should work towards synchronising free travel for senior citizens across the country? He will know that in Scotland they already enjoy that benefit.

Mr. Cunningham: Wherever possible we must work towards harmonisation in the UK, and free travel is one service where we can achieve that. Most people, including pensioners, like to travel, so why not offer free extended travel across the border? From certain parts of Northumberland it takes only an hour to travel to Edinburgh, which enhances the case for free travel.

I accept that the Government have done a great deal over the years for pensioners. However, as my right hon. Friend the Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers) said, politicians from all parties must stop playing political football with pensions and achieve consensus so that we can solve the problem. I do not accept that it is all the Chancellor's fault, because there are a number of factors at play. Nevertheless, there is a pensions problem and people up and down the country are awaiting the outcome of the Federal-Mogul case. Some hon. Members will have constituency experience of that case, as many people have been waiting two or three years to find out the future of their pension. Federal-Mogul is locked in the American courts, so I welcome the fact that the Government established the Pension Protection Fund. However, we must consider whether we should increase that fund, as there will be many demands on it in future. I believe that we should certainly look at ways and means of doing so.

I recognise the Government's tremendous investment in the health service, but we must be extremely careful about reorganisation. In the midlands, we believe that the important thing is not to lose touch with the sharp end. Whether it is the reorganisation of the police force or the health service in the west midlands, we must not lose touch with the sharp end; otherwise the public will become disillusioned with the service that we are trying to provide.

The other issue that is causing concern in places such as Stafford is the amalgamation of the ambulance service. People think they have a very good ambulance service and are worried that if it is amalgamated with the west midlands service they may not enjoy a service of the same standard in the future. We west midlands politicians must continue to put pressure on the Secretary of State to make sure that that does not happen.

We cannot duck the issue of budget deficits in the health service. Those are not necessarily caused by the Government. The introduction of any new system—in this case, a system of payment by results—inevitably causes turmoil. That is recognised by most people who know about change and management. A further problem that has emerged in the health service, although we do not yet know the scale of it, arises from the use of a different method of accounting. It appears that in some instances deficits have been hidden for a number of years and are only now coming to light. The management of the health service needs to be sorted out, and its financial structure must be better managed and accounted for. I hope that compulsory redundancies can be avoided and that we can get some form of agreement with the trade unions.

We heard earlier about a possible series of strikes over local authority pensions. We must get talks going to resolve the matter. It is not in the interest of those who will receive the pensions, any more than it is in our interest, to see such disputes continue. People feel that their pensions are to be changed, despite promises made to them by employers. We should repeat to the public sector what we have said to the private sector: employers should try, as far as possible, to meet those aspirations and the commitments that they gave.

Finally, the Budget was steady—some might say neutral. It contained some encouraging items, such as nursery provision and an increase in family tax credits. The Government have continued to focus on poverty. Britain might be wealthy but there are pockets of great social deprivation, and as politicians of whichever party, we should never lose track of that. I welcome all the measures in the Budget that deal with social deprivation.

8.52 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I remind the House of the interests declared in the register against my name.

The matter that I draw to the attention of the House is the credibility of the Chancellor in the context of his Budget speech. I shall highlight a few issues that were included in his speech and a few that were not. On the subject of today's debate, education, there is a credibility issue relating to the skills gap to which a number of hon. Members have referred.

I am pleased that we have had an opportunity to focus on the skills gap, not least because in the survey of more than 1,000 businesses that I undertook in my constituency in the run-up to the Budget, the overwhelming cause of concern was the poor quality of school leavers presenting themselves for employment. This is not a criticism specifically of the schools in my constituency, which do a very good job. However, of the businesses that responded to my survey, 64 per cent. raised skills as the main problem for them, and of that group, 72 per cent. said the problem was getting worse, not better. This is a fundamental issue for the competitiveness of the United Kingdom, and it needs to be addressed.

Instead of raising the skills of our work force, one of the ways in which the Government have been tackling the skills gap has been to import skills from elsewhere. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski), whose constituency borders mine, regularly reminds the House that the shortage of dentists has been filled by dentists from his homeland, Poland. I have always taken his comments with a pinch of salt, but the point was graphically illustrated by the recent publication of an e-mail in which the British ambassador to Warsaw, Ambassador Crawford, stated that Her Majesty's Government have "created more jobs for Poles in the past year than the Polish Government".

Much has been made of the announcement of extra money for schools and the aspiration to raise school spending per head close to the level achieved in the independent sector. I welcome more money for schools, although I have not been overwhelmed by the increase, which appears to be close to 1 per cent. of the total schools budget, but it is welcome none the less. To echo the comment made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), I urge the Government seriously to examine the allocation policy.

In Shropshire, our children receive approximately £3,300 a pupil—that places the local education authority 10th from bottom of the 150 education authorities in this country—which is barely 75 per cent. of the average spending per pupil in this country as a whole. One area in my constituency is among the top 25 most deprived areas in this country. The issue does not solely relate to urban areas, because deprivation occurs in rural areas, too, and I urge the Government to examine the funding formula.

On further education, the Secretary of State for Education and Skills has referred to a level playing field, which I would welcome, too, but I do not welcome the levelling of buildings. In my constituency, Bridgnorth college was closed last year and the site is being prepared for levelling. I urge the Financial Secretary to make a commitment in his winding-up speech that the proceeds raised by the sale of the sites of colleges of education that are being shut down in rural areas will be reinvested in the area where the facilities have been shut rather than being transferred to supposedly more deserving areas, which leaves even less provision for those in rural areas.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) has welcomed the Chancellor's announcement of independence for the Office for National Statistics. Like all Conservative Members, I welcome that decision, because it was a Conservative policy, and it is reassuring to see the Chancellor in this, as in so many other areas, picking up our policy—the current consensus in politics is clearly working. That change was needed because of the credibility gap, which is of the Chancellor's own making.

Since the Budget, many commentators have referred to problems with the presentation of statistics. On Sunday, The Business carried an article in which its correspondent, Allister Heath, discussed the way in which the Chancellor has chosen to portray productivity in this country as improving rather than the actual trend, which is declining. When the Chancellor was appointed too many years ago, he saw productivity as one of the main benchmarks for his success, and the article discusses that point:

"His main trick was to break down the UK's productivity performance into three periods: 1972 to 1986; 1986 to the first half of 1997; and Labour's election to the third quarter of 2001, a period he claimed to be the first half of the current cycle. This allowed him to claim that the growth in output per worker had hit 2.13 per cent. a year in the final period against 1.93 per cent. and 1.5 per cent. in the previous two . . . The truth, as the official figures for output per worker reveal, is the exact of the opposite of the great performance that Brown chose to boast about. Productivity growth averaged 2.6 per cent. a year between 1992 and 1997", which was the last period of Conservative government, and fell to

"2.1 per cent. a year between 1997 and 2001."

It declined further to 1.3 per cent. between 2001 and 2005. In the past 12 months, it has declined even further to 0.4 per cent. So much for the Chancellor's productivity growth. I look forward to seeing how the ONS will portray that.

I turn to something that I suspect arrived in the Budget as an afterthought—the assault on the trust industry. Several Members have referred to the impressive growth in, and our reliance on, financial services. The trust sector is a critical part of that. By seeking to impose such significant taxation changes on accumulation and maintenance trusts and other trust types, the Chancellor will drive a coach and horses through that industry and force it offshore. He may not have appreciated that many of these trusts have nothing to do with inheritance—they are to do with protecting assets, initially for minors and then for other young people while they are still in their formative years. Some were set up during the crusades to help estates not to fall into the wrong hands in the event of knights being toppled from their chargers overseas. This is a serious measure to propose with the flick of a pen.

In the brief time that I have left, I should like to raise three issues that were not mentioned in the Budget. First, there is the credibility gap over pensions. The right hon. Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers) devoted much of his speech to that. I think that he was a bit economical as regards the way in which the Chancellor chose to present some of the pension-related measures in the Budget. A year ago, the Chancellor made great play of the fact that the council tax rebate for pensioners was being doubled from £100 to £200. That was not mentioned last week when it was abolished, with the result that pensioners' council tax will have soared by more than 20 per cent.

The right hon. Member for North Tyneside also talked about Labour's responsibility for dealing with the pensions crisis that has been created. There is indeed a responsibility. I look forward to seeing what happens with Turner and deeply regret the fact that the Chancellor did not refer to that.

I reiterate my concern that the Chancellor did not mention the NHS in his speech. I hope that he will be listening tomorrow when protestors from all over the country come to highlight the cuts that are being made in our community hospitals.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate. I will keep my remarks well within the 10-minute limit to allow other hon. Members to contribute.

I want to focus not only on education but on manufacturing policy, and particularly the interrelationship between the two. My basic point is that I find nothing more heartbreaking than able, well-educated young—or not so young—people in my constituency being faced with the stark choice between leaving their community to get a decent job or forfeiting that opportunity to be nearer to their families. People should not have to choose between their community and their career. Social justice does not depend on the town one calls home—good jobs must be available wherever people live.

As we have more than doubled the national average of people employed in manufacturing in Burnley, I am firmly convinced that British manufacturing can succeed in the 21st century. As an Amicus MP, I am proud to be part of the trade union that campaigned sincerely and hard for that success. I simply do not agree with people who say that manufacturing is something of the past—a 20th century preoccupation that is destined to be replaced. Although the sector may have declined as a proportion of our economy, it is still strong and important, and with the right policies it can have a bright future.

The best of British manufacturing is definitely still the best in the world. I am proud to say that we have some of that excellence in my constituency, with companies such as Baxi Potterton, Aircelle, Tenneco Walker, TRW and Smiths Aerospace, to name but a few. The challenge we face, in Burnley or in Britain as a whole, is to ensure that we innovate to stay ahead in a fast-moving, competitive world. We do not want to—and we should not—compete on the basis of wages. Instead, we must compete by simply being the best. I want consumers around the world to choose British—preferably Burnley—products because they are the smartest, cleverest and most desirable bits of kit that money can buy.

To achieve that, our firms need continually to innovate and train to stay ahead of the competition. Most of the responsibility for that lies with managers. After all, they need to do it to satisfy their shareholders, but the Government can help and the Budget does that. It helps by extending the research and development tax credit to companies of between 250 and 500 employees; reaffirming our commitment to science and extending the remit of the technology strategy board; streamlining our support for small businesses and increasing the focus on the effect of Government procurement on the economy; supporting the manufacturing advisory service, which, in the north-west alone, has helped companies achieve £120 million in productivity improvements; and, of course, continuing to resource the regional development agencies.

[Kitty Ussher]

In my constituency, the RDA is leading an exciting project, which is in its early stages. It is working with the University of Central Lancashire and the learning and skills council to bring a university campus to Burnley—with, I hope, a professorship in advanced manufacturing—alongside an enterprise centre and a revamped Burnley further education college. In the world of advanced, 21st century manufacturing, the availability of appropriate skills will ultimately determine where a firm locates. That is why the Chancellor is right to make this a Budget for education. School results are already improving under the Government and we must continue the reforms so that everyone, regardless of where they live or the school they attend, has the best possible education. I welcome the Budget's provisions to give more cash to schools.

The main point about education that I want to highlight relates to the new deal. Although the Conservative party mocked and scorned it, hundreds of thousands of people are now in work, contributing to society and supporting their families because of the new deal. In my part of the world people are in work, but I often hear the complaint that the jobs are simply not good enough. People welcome the minimum wage, but they do not want to work in minimum wage jobs. The most important determinant of one's salary is the amount of training under one's belt. I have therefore long believed that the Government should not step away when someone enters employment. It is in the interests of Britain and the individual that the support should continue. We have conceded the principle for tax credits and we now need to do it for careers advice.

Once someone is in work, the priority must be to get the necessary training to climb rapidly up the ladder, bring more income home and get the skills that employers need for their companies to compete more effectively. The best way to get a good job is to get a job. We have invested in lifelong and adult learning, but we can be smarter. After all, the Government know who the low earners in the economy are because they have everyone's tax records. Why not use that information, in the confines of the law on data protection, to provide individualised careers advice, training and support for the lowest earners in society—a new deal for those already in work? I warmly welcome the Chancellor's announcement in the Budget of the prospect of expanding the new deal for those in work who want to improve their skills. I look forward to the results of the review by Lord Leitch on what can be done.

Social justice should not depend on the town we call home. We need to spread power, wealth and opportunity throughout poorer as well as richer areas. By taking action to strengthen manufacturing and give personalised help for people to access the training that they need to get the good jobs that they want, we shall move a little further towards achieving that objective, at least for my constituents.

9.8 pm

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): It is a pleasure to participate in this important debate. I am also pleased to follow the hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher). I was especially interested in her comments about the role of manufacturing in British industry. Like her, I believe that there is a future for British manufacturing, but the key is continued investment in research and development so that we can innovate in the way she suggested. That flows into the general comments that I wish to make about productivity. However, unlike the hon. Lady, I draw different conclusions about the Budget's impact on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) cited many statistics, to which I would add one more. Output per worker failed to increase at all in the year to the third quarter of 2005, adding to the slip in productivity that we have seen over the past few years. The emphasis on productivity is essential for the future of jobs and wealth creation in this country, in terms of ensuring that we have a growing economy to which we can positively look forward. A number of elements will influence our productivity. One is research and development, to which I will return in a moment. Another is the focus on skills. We must ensure that we have a work force that is fit for purpose for delivering the productivity growth that will be essential if we are to compete in the global economy.

The Government have announced their White Paper on further education today. They have obviously recognised the problem, in that they state:

> "The number of adults in the workforce without the skills at Level 2 for productive, sustainable employment in a modern economy is much too high: in that area we rank 17th out of 30 countries."

However, the situation is even more challenging than that might suggest. We need to look forward to what will happen in the future, and Lord Leitch's interim report on the country's long-term skills needs to 2020 is extremely informative in that regard. He highlights the fact that improving the skills only of young people will not be enough, given that 70 per cent. of the working-age population in 2020 will have already completed their compulsory school education, and that half the 2020 work force is already over 25 years old. Lord Leitch states:

> "These demographic changes make it essential to improve the skills of older groups in the workforce."

I entirely agree with that. It is a pity that the Government have missed the opportunity in either the Budget or today's White Paper fully to address the need to invest in skills for older people.

Sir Andrew Foster's report on further education colleges highlights the fact that 14 per cent. of adults of working age have no qualifications, and that more than 5 million adults have literacy and numeracy skills below level 1. Lord Leitch predicts that, by 2020, without significant additional steps being taken over and above what the Government are proposing,

> "at least 4 million adults will still not have literacy skills expected of an 11 year old, at least 12 million will be without numeracy skills at this level (equivalent to three in ten adults) and 6.5 million will not have qualifications at the equivalent level to five good GCSEs."

He goes on:

> "In comparative terms, the UK will continue to be an average performer—positioned, at best, in the middle of the OECD ranking".

Globalisation continues to place an emphasis on the need to be able to compete in the global marketplace. That will involve greater flexibility in the skills of employees. During the course of an employee's lifetime in the workplace, there will be a continuing need for them to change and to be flexible. That is going to be more difficult for those who do not have basic numeracy or literacy skills. According to the CBI, eight out of 10 jobs require basic competence in literacy and numeracy. Then there is the personal impact of the lack of those skills on individuals. Many employees without basic skills in reading, writing or adding up live in daily fear of being found out. They do not take promotion for fear that they will be unable to meet the challenges involved. They are afraid of being found out and perhaps losing their jobs.

Those are the direct personal costs involved. It is interesting to hear that some companies are seeking to address the problem by offering what one might call shadow information and communications technology courses. There might be computers in the training room, but the emphasis for the employee is very much on basic skills in reading and writing, rather than on computer skills. I suppose that that highlights the ingrained challenges.

While there is a recognition of the problems, the Government seem unable to deal with them. At the end of last year, a report by the adult learning inspectorate described the Government's skills for life programme as a "depressing failure", adding:

"The programme is not yet meeting the needs of the most acutely disadvantaged adults it was designed to help."

I welcome the Budget's proposals for funding for free tuition for 19 to 25-year-olds embarking on their first level 3 qualification and the roll-out of the adult learning grant, but they simply do not go far enough. As I have highlighted, half of our 2020 work force is already aged 25 and over, and therefore will not be directly affected. The proposals do not deal with the basic skills that I have highlighted because they are pitched much higher. The initiatives do not address the fundamental issues of upskilling and ensuring that we meet the productivity challenge.

Greater emphasis on work-based learning is needed, and employers and firms have a crucial role in making sure that their human resource and employment capital— their employees—are utilised and incentivised to the full. In many ways, the problem is that the Government have not provided enough encouragement and incentivisation for business to do that. Against the backdrop of heavy regulation and a heavy tax burden, firms are being actively discouraged from investing properly in their workers and ensuring training for their work force.

Training is not the only area that lacks investment. To return to manufacturing, there is also a real gap in research and development, which is needed to underpin continued growth, employment and wealth. The much-vaunted Lisbon agenda to promote a strategy for jobs and growth in the EU set a target for R and D expenditure of 3 per cent. of GDP by 2010. The problem is that that target will simply not be met. Despite being an apparent advocate of the Lisbon agenda, the Government's national action plan highlights their failure by admitting only to an "ambition" that R and D expenditure will reach 2.5 per cent of GDP, and then only by 2014.

When a lack of policy focus by the Government is combined with increased regulation and bureaucracy and an environment of increasing taxes, it is hardly surprising that industry is not investing sufficiently. The Budget announced some small-scale initiatives, but those hardly even scratch the surface. The long-term future of this country requires a rigid focus on innovation and human resources to drive the economy forward. The problem is that despite the initiatives, this Government's approach has been pedestrian. Time is not on our side, which makes it even more disturbing that despite all the indicators and warning signs, this Budget shows no signs of any change of gear from the Government. It is a failure of leadership, a failure of policy and a failure of delivery, which I fear will cost this country dear.

9.18 pm

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): To give colleagues some time, I will be brief. Rather than dealing with the macro-economy, I will address three specific points relating to my constituency. I welcome the remarks of the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire)—although I did not agree with his approach, I also tend to focus on the skills gap and specific issues around education. I also want to deal with the Budget proposals on sport, about which no one has yet spoken, and which are important for my constituency.

My constituency has a large skills gap at every level: at university level, in higher skills and in intermediate and basic skills. I am pleased that University College Northampton now has full university status, and I hope that that will both plug the skills gap at the higher level and serve to drive up standards across the whole school sector. I also welcome the Government's extra funding for our schools—a total investment of £115 million in a major schools reorganisation, with the aim of improving on a history of under-achievement in schools in Northampton.

In that context, I welcome the announcements about extra spending in schools, which will build on the Government's good track record. I would, however, like more clarification. Our schools are all tied into a major private finance initiative scheme. I hope that there will be flexibility in the structuring of the extra finance so that we can improve some of the specifications of the PFI contract, or make it possible for head teachers to work collaboratively to commission some of the improved services that they want across the board.

I also welcome the changes proposed for further education, especially the recognition of the important role played by the sector in driving up skills standards and dealing with some of the areas of disadvantage with which other education sectors have not been able to deal. I welcome "train to gain", because I think it important to ensure that when people are in work they do not simply stay at the level they have reached. It is well recognised that the Government have an obligation to improve their skills so that they can progress in their careers, and can retrain to meet changes in their sector of employment.

I welcome the tighter focus on skills, but if FE colleges are to have more targeted ends, they will need more flexible means of getting there. I fear that some of the proposals in the White Paper will increase bureaucracy. That must be trimmed. If the FE sector is to achieve its target of improving skills in this important area, it must be freed to do so. In particular, it must be given the support it needs to tackle disadvantage and reach some of the marginalised groups. Northampton college has been especially successful in that regard.

I particularly welcome the extra money for sport. Sport is often seen as an add-on, but, as we have seen, it is important in improving educational achievement for some of the most disadvantaged young people by giving them a different route into school, and giving them a sense of achievement and purpose. It can also be important in regenerating the economy in certain areas. We have observed the progress made by the street football schemes, and by some of the retraining schemes to help young people in the east end of London to become referees and coaches.

In Northampton, in preparation for the Olympics, we set up a partnership—it is cross-party, and the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley) has been very supportive—between the public and private sectors. It includes the district and county councils, the chamber of commerce, the schools and the university, and it is being supported very generously by Barclaycard. Its aim is to develop sports and related services in our area to take advantage of the Olympics, while considering the potential for economic regeneration, educational issues, the culture, the legacy, the cultural festivals and the opportunities for universities. I was encouraged to hear the Chancellor's proposals for schools festivals and the expansion of sporting facilities.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will respond to those points and will listen to some of the representations from Northampton. I want to ensure that we can take some of the opportunities offered in the Budget. I want the sporting provisions to help boost our economy and give fresh chances to young people, many of whom missed out the first time, so that they can find a way back into education.

I welcome this forward-looking Budget, which tackles some of the difficult areas in our economy, and I look forward to its implementation.

9.24 pm

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): Despite criticism of this Budget from all sides, it confirms the stability of the British economy, which has taken us through some very stormy times. I point out to those who look back to previous Administrations that such stormy times would have brought their weakly based economies crashing down. I am thinking of the far east crash, the stagnation that the EU has faced for almost a decade—it could have moved forward if only it had taken the Lisbon agenda as seriously as we do—and the energy price hike that we are all suffering, but which we will see through.

In this and previous Budgets there has been a constant focus on the supply side, which shows that the Government are on the right road. Many of today's contributors have shown that much of the scaremongering is not based on truth. The hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) must stop blaming the Government and take note of the fact that the UK private sector has not got the guts to make the investment that private sectors in other economies, which are going ahead of us, are making.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North (Ann McKechin) explained the world demographic situation, and in my view we have reached a tipping point. Within the next four to five years, through the growth of the city of Quonqing alone, more people will be living in an urban setting than a rural one. Many of them will not have jobs because the lack of concessions from rich countries in the EU and north America has stripped away their agricultural base.

On science, last Friday I visited a company in my constituency that emerged from the fall-out from ICI. AstraZeneca Novartis has developed Amistar, which is the world's biggest selling fungicide. Amistar and subsidiary products are being developed in Grangemouth, in my constituency, and being sold to 100 countries, thereby earning $1 billion a year.

Some have argued that health is not on the Budget agenda, but as has been pointed out, a lot of money is being invested in health. The figures show that when the Conservatives left office, such investment accounted for 5.4 per cent. of gross domestic product; it now accounts for 7 per cent. In real terms, investment has increased from £51.9 billion to £81billion—so health is getting the investment that it needs, and if there are problems with overspend, they must be examined at a local level.

Education is the main issue on which I want to focus, and the problem with education expenditure is that it is not evidence based. The Education Committee said in its 2004–05 report that it had some concerns about the basis of the Government's investment in academies and special schools. I raise this issue today because I do not believe that the investment is being made in schools in England that is required to turn education round; rather, money is being invested in structural change, and massive sums are being invested in academies and specialist schools, which have yet to show that they can achieve what they are supposed to achieve.

Earlier, a Conservative Member quoted the Prime Minister, who said that the worst thing that could happen to a child aged 11 was to be labelled a failure. However, we have failed to deal with that major problem. There are now more pupils in grammar schools in England than when we came to power in 1997, yet we continue to invest in structural change. Instead, this Government should be making proper quality assurance assessments. Such a body is to be set up, and someone described it as a quango, but quality assurance is about what happens in schools, the process that children experience as they go through school, and what happens when they leave.

I am very pleased that the Government have at last decided to introduce synthetic phonics, which were piloted in the central region of Scotland when I was a teacher. They were then used in west Dumbarton, where the percentage of children who do not achieve the required level of literacy at age 11 has been reduced to 6 per cent. as a result. The target is a 100 per cent. literacy rate. I hope that England will experience a similar benefit through the use of synthetic phonics.

Despite "Every Child Matters", the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and the various measures being adopted in schools, the Government remain obsessed with structure. Some of the Select Committee's criticisms have never been answered. Sums of £50,000 from the private sector are matched by £100,000 from the Government, with £126 per pupil for the next four years. That is a massive investment, yet there is no evidence to show that pupils achieve in the speciality of the school. The general standard is raised, but when such massive investments are made in certain schools that is bound to happen. Academies are not achieving what was hoped for them, yet they can cost from £25 billion to £35 billion, completely distorting local authorities' investment priorities.

I want the Treasury to look seriously at evidence-based assessments of what we are getting for our money, and to examine what happens in schools and the outcomes for every pupil, not just for the few who have the privilege of private education or massively distorted capital investment.

9.30 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): The project to remodel the Chancellor was making good progress until last Wednesday. The trademark red tie had been dropped for a lilac one, a kick-start in consumer spending through investment in casual wear, and a warmer, more cuddly Gordon on display in place of his traditional position—but then he spoke, and it became clear that nothing had changed in substance. No one is more impervious to change than the Chancellor. No Chancellor is more dogmatic or closed to fresh thinking. Yet again, we saw a Chancellor fixed on spending more, raising taxes and borrowing more. He has failed to learn the lesson that he cannot increase spending on public services without reforming them first.

The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) made a telling intervention on the Secretary of State. He asked when the Government would achieve their target of closing the funding gap between private and state schools. The Secretary of State's answer was evasive, but the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) was convinced that the Chancellor would not have made such a commitment without working things out first—without knowing what he was doing. It is a pity that the Chancellor did not tell the Secretary of State first.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) highlighted the global challenges from India and China. He talked about highly skilled work forces. Indeed, on the day that the further education White Paper was launched, it was entirely appropriate that time and again Members on both sides of the House referred to the importance of skills and training in the work force. My hon. Friend also referred to the importance of making sure that the tax regime is competitive and addresses the global challenges posed by economies in eastern Europe, China and the far east.

The right hon. Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers) made a powerful speech about the risks of extending means-testing and the impact on the take-up of benefits. He made a persuasive case for adopting the Turner report as the basis of pension reform. The Chancellor said little about that in his Budget speech, but I hope that he heard, or will read, the remarks of the right hon. Member for North Tyneside. The Chancellor made no reference whatever to the council tax rebate that he announced last year and dropped this year, so I was pleased that the right hon. Member for North Tyneside advocated its extension in the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), the Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee, used his tremendous expertise and knowledge of India to highlight the threat that it poses to our economy. He suggested that we need to adjust our economy and skills base to reflect that challenge. He also spoke eloquently and robustly about the education funding issues faced by his local authority and the gap between Worcestershire and neighbouring authorities.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, North (Ann McKechin) referred to the importance of climate change. She touched on free bus travel. As somebody who lives in a borough where the increase in grant from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was less than the cost of concessionary fares announced by the Chancellor last year, I take comments about free bus travel with a pinch of salt.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) made a significant speech about the importance of maintaining the competitiveness of London as a global financial sector. He emphasised the need to take real action to reduce the burden of financial regulation. He also talked, with experience from his constituency, about issues with the health service. He highlighted, as several hon. Members have done during the debates on the Budget, the Chancellor's failure to mention the health service in his speech on Wednesday and his ignoring of the problems that we see in hospitals throughout the country.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) spoke eloquently, as ever, about the science base and the importance of science to our country. I know that he speaks with both professional and political experience of that.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) talked about the importance of reskilling older workers. It is important in the context of today's White Paper on further education to understand what impact the commitment to level 3 entitlement for those aged up to 25 has on the provision of training for older workers. Will they be left out? I know from talking to businesses in my constituency that are concerned about the challenge posed by economies in eastern Europe, India and China that they too are concerned about what happens to workers who lose their jobs and need to improve their skill base to compete in an increasingly global economy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) talked about the skills gap, and highlighted issues that he had found among employers in his constituency, including the need to raise skill levels in local people. He referred especially to the importance of ensuring higher standards of numeracy and literacy in the work force. He made a powerful point about productivity, which has fallen by a fifth since the Chancellor came into office in 1997.

The theme of productivity was also picked up by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire), who identified the need to look beyond 25-year-olds. He said that a high proportion of 19 to 25-year-olds were either in education or already in the work force, and asked how they would fare under the White Paper published today.

I wish to question the effectiveness of Government spending in raising standards in public services, and highlight the issue of competitiveness in the global economy. The Chancellor's unswerving belief is that the more one spends, the better the results. Indeed, even the Education and Skills Committee's first report of the 2004–05 Session admits that there is no evidence to demonstrate that the spending increases under this Government have led to a step change in standards at GCSE level. Why has the increase in spending on education not flowed through to the step change in performance that our constituents and taxpayers have come to expect?

Too often, spending priorities have been set by Departments to meet targets imposed by the Treasury, with no regard for effectiveness. Let us take just one example. Through ring-fenced programmes, the Government have spent nearly £1 billion to tackle the scourge of truancy in our schools, but since 1997 truancy has increased by 30 per cent. The money has been spent not on tackling the underlying causes, but to meet targets imposed on the Department for Education and Skills by the Chancellor.

Even in this Budget, when the Chancellor boasts about how much additional money is going directly to schools to spend at their discretion, he also boasts that he is giving them extra money to spend on personalised learning. That money will be spent at his direction, not at the discretion of head teachers. When will the Chancellor learn that the best person to decide how money is spent effectively in schools is not him, but the head teacher?

Until the Government give head teachers greater freedom, we will not see improvements in exam results in line with the money spent on our education system. As this year's GCSE results show, the category of state schools with the most independence from the Government, city technology colleges, have the highest value-added scores and those with the least freedom from Government interference, community schools, have the worst value-added scores. Labour Members who block reforms aimed at improving the autonomy of our schools are blocking the step change in performance that our children need for their exam standards to increase.

On public spending, we have a Chancellor who is stuck in the past and who has yet to learn from his mistakes. As the Committee established, extra spending in schools has not translated into a faster rate of improvement in results. There continues to be a culture of central Government knowing best, and dictating how much money should be spent and how, rather than leaving those decisions in the hands of professionals. The failure to reform public services has meant that additional expenditure has failed to achieve a step change in performance. The Government have shied away from the reform of the public services needed to ensure that taxpayers get improvements in line with the increased expenditure: another lesson that the Chancellor—the road block to reform—has failed to learn.

To fund the increase in spending, we now have a tax burden at its highest since 1984. The Red Book forecasts an increase in the tax bill of another £5.5 billion. Some Labour Members will want taxes to be higher to pay for ever higher public spending, but that short-sighted view has already put at risk our global competitiveness. Having had the 10th lowest rate of corporation tax among our competitors in 1997, we now have the 10th highest rate. The burden of taxes in Britain is now greater than that in Germany. In an attempt to plug the shortfall in public finances, we now have one of the most complicated tax regimes in the world.

Increasingly mobile flows of capital mean that businesses have much greater choice about where they locate. Increasingly, tax is becoming an important issue in determining where businesses locate. Increasingly, businesses are deciding not to locate in the UK. Is it a surprise, therefore, that Apple, Microsoft and Oracle have located their European headquarters in low-tax Ireland? One of the factors driving the growth of the Bermudan insurance industry is its favourable tax regime compared with that of the UK.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): What about inward investment?

Mr. Hoban: The hon. Gentleman asks about inward investment, but he forgets that a lot of last year's inward investment flows fall from the merger of the British and Dutch branches of Shell. The business decided to locate in the Netherlands rather than the UK, because the tax regime in the Netherlands made it attractive to do so there.

The City of London corporation's report on the global competitiveness of the financial services sector highlighted the increasing importance of the Government's decisions on personal and corporate taxes for Britain's competitive position. The head of tax at PricewaterhouseCoopers said:

"A lot of UK tax is paid by a relatively few companies, and many of those have a choice about where they site some of their operations—the tax situation could persuade them to site discretionary additional businesses elsewhere."

Labour Members may think that that is scaremongering, but Colt telecommunications made an announcement last month to explain why it would move its corporate headquarters overseas. It clearly identified:

"an opportunity to materially reduce its costs by a change in domicile."

The tax regime in the UK has made it unattractive for some businesses to remain in this country, with an impact on corporate taxes, national insurance, employment taxes, pay-as-you-earn, VAT and other duties.

The Chancellor, true to his Labour heritage, is proving himself to be an old-fashioned Labour Chancellor—taxing and borrowing more to pay for more spending. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex said, he needs to learn that in an increasingly global economy, higher and more complex taxes drive businesses from the UK, thus harming our economy and threatening future funding of public services. There is nothing in the Budget to demonstrate that he understands the challenge that we face. Indeed, the tax burden is forecast to rise by £5.5 billion, not to fall. When the competitive threat is pointed out to the Chancellor, he is astonishingly complacent about it.

In the booklet about the future of financial services in London published with the Budget, the Chancellor boasts about the cut in corporation tax, but he does not tell readers that other countries have been cutting their corporation tax rates as well. That is why we now have the 10th highest rate of corporation tax among our competitors, rather than the 10th lowest, which he inherited from the Conservative party in 1997. On taxes, the Chancellor has failed to learn from his mistakes. He is stuck in the past, failing to act on the realities of a global economy, by not creating a tax system fit for the 21st century.

This is the Budget of a Chancellor who is so dogmatic in the pursuit of his own ambitions that he ignores the evidence. He is stuck in the past, failing to learn from his mistakes, failing to adjust to the global challenges from India, China and eastern Europe and failing to tackle the skills issues and deal with our increasingly complex tax base. High increases in spending have not led to the step change in public services that our economy and our country need, because reforms have been blocked. Money has been wasted, and to finance that spending he has taxed so much that our competitive position has been eroded. He has spent too much, taxed too much and borrowed too much. He is the road block to reform.

9.44 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): This has been a shortened debate, but in a series of time-limited speeches—there have been 15 from Back Benchers on both sides of the House—there have nevertheless been some important contributions. The themes ranged widely, but at the heart of the Budget and this debate on it, is the economy. As the Chancellor reported in the Budget, the British economy is stable, strong and strengthening. In each of his 10 Budgets, he has been clear that his first priority for the UK economy has been, is, and will remain, stability. The decisive macro-economic reforms that he introduced in 1997 to monetary policy, to fiscal policy and to the planning and control of public expenditure were designed first to establish and then to lock in stability and steady growth.

For 50 years, Britain's economy was prone to high and volatile levels of inflation. For 18 years under the Tories, until 1997, Britain was the least stable of the major developed economies—first in, last out, hardest hit by the recessions and world economic shocks. In contrast, in the Budget last week, the Chancellor reported that we have met our inflation target this year and in every year since 1997. In just a decade, long-term inflation expectations have virtually halved to 2 per cent. Today, long-term interest rates are the lowest that they have been for 40 years, at just 4 per cent. He reported that inflation is currently 2 per cent., which is on target. He reported that, in the latest quarter, the UK economy is growing at an annual rate of 2.5 per cent., which is on target. He reported on broad tax revenue projections since the pre-Budget report, which are on target, and he reported on public finance figures against our fiscal rules, which are on target.

No wonder we heard so little from the Tories on the economy in this Budget debate and no wonder the Leader of the Opposition responded to the Chancellor with personal attacks and not criticism of policy—a mistake that the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) repeated tonight. They have nothing to say of their own on how to reinforce the science, innovation and research base of Britain, how to tackle the threat of climate change—

Mr. Jenkin: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

John Healey: I will later. They have nothing to say on how to make Britain a leader in the development of new energy technologies or how to remove and reduce the scar of child poverty in our country. Many of the contributions tonight did not add much to that. I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I will come to the remarks that he made if he and other hon. Members allow me.

Mr. Jenkin: On science, now that those in the civil service Box have had a chance to respond to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), will the Financial Secretary explain what has happened to the manifesto commitment to spend £250 million on new laboratories in schools?

John Healey: If the hon. Gentleman looks at the public finance figures, he will see that, by 2007–08, we will be spending £6.4 billion in capital investment in our schools. A high priority for that investment is science funding and science labs.

I will talk about the speeches from Front Benchers first. The hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) urged us to have a debate on policy priorities and to deal with the hard facts. There is nothing vague, as she put it, about the Chancellor's Budget commitments on education. First, there will be extra cash going directly to all head teachers from next month, with more to come next year. Secondly, there are hard figures on boosting the capital spending from £5.6 billion in our schools this year to £8 billion a year by 2010–11, matching in five years for our state schools the capital spend per pupil currently going into private schools. The hon. Members for Brent, East and for Havant (Mr. Willetts) asked about the new money that will go directly to schools. There will be £220 million in the next financial year and £365 million in the year after that to boost personalised learning. More will go to schools with the greatest need and those with the pupils who are the lowest achievers.

One of the most important things that the hon. Member for Havant tried to do in his speech was to make clear the Conservatives' approach to the Chancellor's commitment on schools, but we still need clarity. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, when the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury was asked on Budget day about the implication of the third fiscal rule that the Conservatives had, she confirmed that the Tories would spend less on education than the Chancellor set out. When the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), was asked during the winding-up speeches in the next day's debate:

"Does his party support our goal to raise the level of state spending in schools up to the level of private schools", he said:

"Of course we support the goal".—[Official Report, 23 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 508.]

I welcomed what the hon. Member for Havant had to say about schools, as far he could. He said cautiously and vaguely that he was happy to sign up to the aspiration. However, just to be clear, will he match the long-term pledge to raise the level of funding for pupils in state schools to that for pupils in private schools? Will he be clear that he will back our immediate commitment to do so on capital spending for schools by 2010–11, or does he maintain the policy of putting tax cuts first?

Mr. Willetts: I thought I had made that clear in my speech, but I will try to give absolute clarity. Yes, we accept the increase in school spending and the capital spending pledge. We need more information about the time scale for the aspiration, although, of course, we support it. For us, the crucial aspiration is to match the standards in private education, not just the spending.

John Healey: We have made progress since Budget day. Clearly the hon. Gentleman has disowned the comments made by his colleague, the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State earlier described the Conservative party's policy changes as flip-flops, and I have to say that she was right. The situation should concern everyone. I guess that there are some people who want to believe what the Leader of the Opposition says and his promises, but, frankly, the fiasco of the policy flip-flops following the Budget shows that when the Tories are put under pressure and the going gets tough, they give in.

The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) was right to warn of the challenges in the global economy, just as the Chancellor did in his Budget speech. The hon. Gentleman was also right to say that we need to boost research and development. However, he spoiled his comments by talking about the tax burden. He knows that this Labour Chancellor cut the main rate of corporation tax, the rate of small business corporation tax and the rate of capital gains on business assets. He knows that the tax burden is still lower than it was at its peak under Baroness Thatcher in 1984. He also knows that, according to the OECD, the net direct tax burden for the average working family has halved since the Labour Government came into office.

Other speeches made by Opposition Members shone little light on the policies that we could expect from a Conservative Government, but let me deal with as many contributions as I can in the time available. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) freely admitted that spending on education has gone up under this Government. Whatever position he claims for Worcestershire pupils, they would have been—and would be—far poorer under a Conservative Government than the Labour Government of the moment.

The hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) was right to raise concerns about regulation, but his overstated rhetoric spoiled his case. The Budget produced specific targets for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs to reduce administrative costs in the tax system. It also included plans for further simplifications. Similar hard analysis and plans for the other areas of the Government in which he is interested will be published during the rest of this year.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) called the Budget thin. He was especially concerned about attracting investment into the UK. Perhaps he could look at the publication "Science and innovation investment framework 2004–2014: next steps", which we published alongside the Budget, and in particular at page 66, which sets out the answer to his concerns. I am glad that he welcomes the Budget publication on consulting on the future of carbon capture and storage.

Stewart Hosie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

John Healey: I will not because I want to respond to other hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) spoke with passion from his constituency perspective. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills responds to him on his point about further education for his constituents. However, he began by questioning the Chancellor's credibility—the same Chancellor whom Alan Greenspan has described as "without peer" on economic policy making.

The hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) criticised the Government on skills. The proportion of 16-year-olds achieving five good GCSEs or better has risen from 45 to 55 per cent. under this Government. Some 1 million adults have improved their literacy or numeracy skills under this Government. The proportion of adults with a degree has increased from one fifth to more than a quarter under this Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who courteously said that he could not be present for the wind-ups, made an informed and expert contribution as Chair of the Select Committee on Education and Skills. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers) looked forward to the Government's response to the Turner report in a characteristically reflective, and rather broad and sweeping, contribution.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) set out a long-term concern about pensioners receiving further support, especially those who have been failed by their occupational pension schemes collapsing. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) spoke about firms in her constituency and drew on her national policy experience to explain how the Budget announcements may help them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty) shares the Chancellor's passion for education, even if he does not share every detail of the Government's planned reforms. He told of us lessons in Scotland that could be learned in England. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North (Ann McKechin) was right about the Budget's theme, which is how Britain can meet the changing pressures in the world, and she was right to point to our contribution on climate change. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) was concerned to see young people in her area share in the greater investment that the Budget makes in sport. I will ensure that the Minister for Sport writes to her with further details so that she can see how that might take place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who is Chair of the Science and Technology Committee, observed that the priority, plans and funding contained in the 10-year framework have never been seen in Britain before. My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) recognised the UK as one of the leading countries in dealing with climate change and rightly urged us to use energy more efficiently, not just in business, but in households and the public sector.

As we enter the 10th year of a Labour Government, this is the 10th consecutive year of uninterrupted economic growth. It is also the 10th successive year that we have grown faster than the euro area. Not only has there been growth in every quarter in every year since 1997, but growth has averaged 2.8 per cent.—a rate that is significantly higher than the average of the period 1979 to 1997, when it was at just 2.1 per cent: a period of government that left Britain seventh out of seven in the G7 for national income per head. Now Britain is second only to America in the G7. Now there are 2.4 million more jobs in the economy. Now there are more than 500,000 more firms in business and 1.7 million more home owners than in 1997, when Labour first came to office.

The choice at the heart of the Budget debate is whether to cut planned public spending to cut taxes on principle, whatever the needs of the economy, our infrastructure and public services, or whether to invest to meet the long-term challenges that we must face in Britain: investment in science, innovation and skills, investment in tackling the threat of climate change, investment in the long-term infrastructure needs of the economy and, above all, investment in the talent and the potential of every one of our young people. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor confirmed in the Budget and as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills said, education—

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Tuesday 28 March.
